"Mr. Wilkes has sent to Macdonald to collect the wagers backed by him on the fight between the Englishman Benwicket Association this evening to demand the belt for Heenan. Mr. Wilkes says he never saw a fight in which both combatants and the swelling in his face had much improved, as on the present occasion. Heenan's head he should be would have bought quicker and would have whipped him in less than an hour. Heenan's left eye is also in statues by all he Americans here.

"Mr. Dean Richmond has sent the belt he must be built and void, he recommends me in England to subscribe a certain sum for Heenan, to purchase for Heenan, and to let Sayers keep his. The Americans say that he shall not receive a penny of the subscription, which will be so entitled to bear nothing but the highest commendation to Heenan's courage and skill. Strangers Sayers was well known to possess endurance and courage, but Heenan's unexpected power and science made his bravery. Heenan wants to fight Sayers immediately, but he will not do so, as he has received no offers.

"Morrissey is dreadfully put out; he had been with Heenan's party, and gave them instructions to telegraph to Heenan's weak points. He has left for Liverpool to-day against him, to the tune of $10,000. During the fight by the combatants, Heenan's friends were cheering for Sayers. He has lost two very much in consequence. The opinion is that the fight will not be authorities will certainly prevent it. It is not yet known what disposal has been made of the five thousand sovereigns Heenan is breaking his head. As he forcetted his ball, which was knocked up in the ring.

THE NEW ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

An Arctic conference in London writes as follows to Mr. Henry Grinnell:

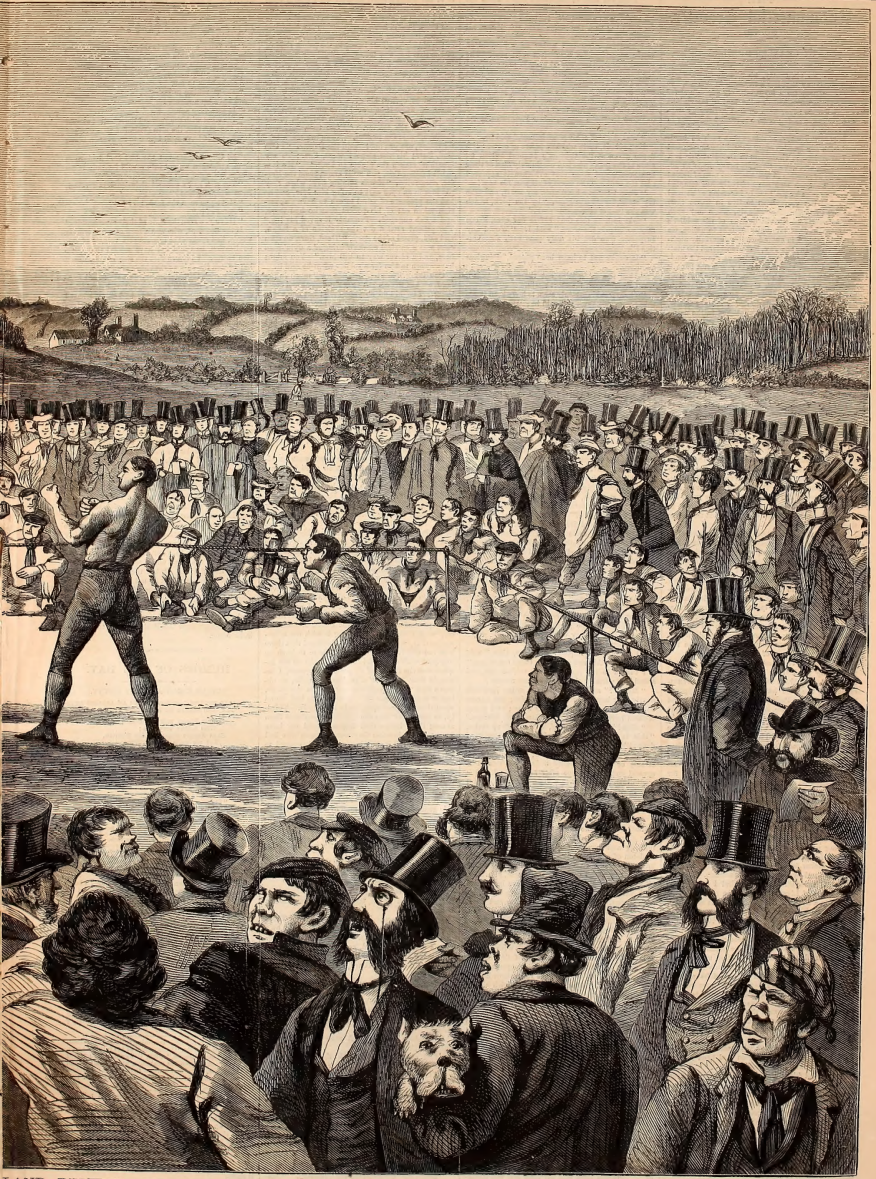
"Dr. Hayes's Expedition has attracted attention here among Arctic circles, and from the interest the Americans have given to the world that they are preparing an expedition to the Polar Sea, and that the expedition would be of interesting or competing for that honor; but from what I can learn from some of the leading members of the expedition, Arctic officers and scientific men, when the conscious feeling that the Polar Sea is open, and will be immediately seized upon by English explorers. There is no doubt that Dr. Hayes will succeed in reach the attention of Arctic men here, and if Hayes should not get there first, he will have the credit of having stimulated others to take the matter up."

FRANCE.

THE NEW ARCHBISHOPS.

The Courier of the Alps announces that French engineers are traveling through the lately annexed provinces of Savoy and Nice, for the purpose of commencing making plans for numerous public works to be executed. A survey is to be made for the construction of a line of the French cadastre; railways are to be constructed, new public roads are to be laid out, and harbors are to be laid down. The engineers have commenced their operations in the Haute-Savoie district. A letter dated from the Town-hall of Nice announces that the engineers of the Ponts-et-Chaussées have begun to make the necessary plans for the completion of the railway from Toulon to the Var. It is also stated that the Government, that Prince Napoleon and the Princess Clotilde propose to make, after Easter, a journey through the principal towns of the newly-annexed provinces. The Emperor has decided, it is said, that the Government shall visit the annexed provinces, that the private now forming the army from that part of the country to which the contingent to be levied annually in future will amount to about 4500 men, in place of 6,000 hitherto drawn by conscription. The vote by universal suffrage, on the question of the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France is to be taken on Sunday the 22d instant.

The Gazette de France says: "The additional guard has been ordered to undertake service in the town; and as soon as the decree appointing the Duke of Magenta to the battalion of Sardinian infantry which is here is to leave, the object of withdrawing both the Italian and French troops being to prevent any collision which may while is about to take place relative to the annexation to France."



ITALY.

GENERAL LAMORICIERE AT ROME.

A letter from Rome of the 17th says: "General Lamoricière has been received at a private audience by the Holy Father. He arrived here on the 14th of the anniversary of Navy, having had conferences with the chief of the Papal Government. He has been received with the greatest of the Military Magnates of San Michele." The same letter states that the Count de Montalembert the Protestant necessary for every Frenchman who enters a foreign military service. A letter from Rome, same date, together with General Lamoricière, the ex-Duke Cascais of Saxe-Coburg, left for America on the 15th, that the troops of the Duke of Modena are to join the Papal forces, and that Lamoricière's mission to Rome is placed in Paris from Rome, spoke very hopefully of the prospect of the Pope's affairs. The Pope is desirous of God, and arrow diligent, I hope soon to leave Rome." The Opinione of Turin, however, declares that Prince Napoleon that General Lamoricière had listened to the overtures from Rome to organize the Pontifical army in Ancona, and permission having been accorded to him to his campaign in Italy. The Opinione of Turin, however, declares that Prince Napoleon that General Lamoricière had listened to the overtures from Rome to organize the Pontifical army in Ancona, and permission having been accorded to him to his campaign in Italy. The Opinione of Turin, however, declares that Prince Napoleon that General Lamoricière had not accepted the proposal of the Vatican.

THE

Uncommercial Traveler.

NO. VII.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

I TRAVEL constantly, up and down a certain line of railway that has a terminus in London. It is the railway for a large military depôt, and for other large barracks. To the best of my serious belief, I have never been on that railway by daylight without seeing some handcuffed deserters in the train.

It is in the nature of things that such an institution as our English army should have many bad and troublesome characters in it. But this is a reason for, and not against, its being made as acceptable as possible to well-disposed men of decent behavior. Deserters are assuredly not tempted into the ranks by the beastly inversion of natural laws and the compulsion to live in worse than swinish foulness. Accordingly, when any such Circumlocutional embellishments of the soldier's condition have of late been brought to notice, we civilians, seated in outer darkness cheerfully meditating on an Income Tax, have considered the matter as being our business, and have shown a tendency to do that which we would rather not have it misregulated, if such declaration may, without violence to the Church Catechism, be hinted to those who are put in authority over us.

Any animated description of a modern battle, any private soldier's letter published in the newspapers, any page of the records of the Victoria Cross, will show that in the ranks of the army there exists under all disadvantages as fine a sense of duty as it has ever been in any station on earth. Who doubts that if we all did our duty as faithfully as the soldier does his this world would be a better place? There may be greater difficulties in our way than in the soldier's. Not disputed. But let us at least do our duty toward Aim.

I had got back again to that rich port where as many snares are set for Mercaglie Jack, and I was walking up a hill there, on a wild March morning. My conversation with my official friend Bridges, by whom I was accidentally accompanied, took this direction as we took the up-hill direction, because the object of my uncommercial journey was to see some discharged soldiers who had recently come home from India. There were men of Hicks's Jack's among them; there were men who had been in many of the great battles of the great Indian campaign among them; and I had some curious to note what sort of changed soldiers looked like when they were done with.

I was not at all interested (as I mentioned to my official friend Pangloss) because these men had claimed to be discharged, when their right to be discharged was not admitted. They had behaved with unblemished fidelity and bravery; but a change of circumstances had arisen, which, as they considered, put an end to their compact and entitled them to enter on a new one. Their demand had been blunderingly resisted by the authorities in India; but it was to be presumed that the men were not far wrong, inasmuch as the bungle had ended in their being sent home discharged, in pursuance of orders from home. (There was an immense waste of money, of course.)

Under these circumstances—thought I, as I walked up the hill on which I accidentally encountered my official friend—under these circumstances of the men having successfully opposed themselves to the Despotic Department of the great Circumlocution Office, on which the sun never sets and the light of reason never rises, the Pagoda Department will have been particularly careful of the national honor. It will have shown these men, in the scrupulous good faith, not to say the generosity, of its dealings with them, that great national authorities can have no small retaliations and revenges. It will have made every provision for their health in the passage home, and will have landed them restored from their campaigning fatigues by a sea-voyage, pure air, sound food, and good medical care. And I pleased myself with dwelling, beforehand, on the great accounts of their personal treatment which these men would carry into their various towns and villages, and on the increasing popularity of the service that would inevitably follow. I almost began to hope that the hitherto ever-failing deserters on my railroad would by-and-by become a phenomenon.

In this agreeable frame of mind I entered the work-house at Liverpool. For the cultivation of laurels in a sandy soil had brought the soldiers in question to the door of Glory.

Before going into their wards to visit them, I inquired how they had made their triumphant entry there? Had it been brought through the rain in carts, it seemed, from the landing-place to the gate, and had then been carried up stairs on the backs of men? Their groans and pains during the performance of this glorious pageant had been so distressing as to bring tears into the eyes of spectators not too well accustomed to scenes of suffering. They were so dreadfully cold that those who could get near the fires were hard to be restrained from thrusting their feet in among the blazing coals. They were so horribly reduced that they were awful to look upon. Racked with dysentery and emaciated with scurvy, one hundred and forty wretched men had been revived with brandy and laid in bed.

My official friend Pangloss is lineally descended from a learned doctor of that name, who was once tutor to Candide, an ingenuous young gentleman of some celebrity. In his personal character he is as humane and worthy a gentleman as any I know; in his official capacity he unfortunately preaches the doctrines of his renowned ancestor, by demonstrating on all occasions that we live in the best of all possible official worlds.

"In the name of Humanity," said I, "how did the men fall into this deplorable state? Was the ship well found in stores?"

"I am not here to asseverate that I know the fact, of my own knowledge," answered Pangloss, in his roundabout official way; "but I have grounds for asserting that the stores were the best of all possible stores."

A medical officer laid before us a handful of rotten biscuit and a handful of split peas. The biscuit was a honey-combed sponge, and there was the excrement of maggots. The peas were even more fatal than the biscuit. A similar handful had been experimentally boiled six hours, and had shown no signs of softening. These were the stores on which the soldiers had been fed.

"The beef—" I began, when Pangloss cut me short.

"Was the best of all possible beef," said he.

But, behold, there was laid before us certain evidence given in the Crimea upon Inquest holden on some of the men (who had obstinately died of their treatment), and from that evidence it appeared that the beef was the worst that could be had!

"Then I lay my hand upon my heart, and take my stand," said Pangloss, "by the pork, which was the best of all possible pork."

But look at this food before our eyes, if one may so misuse the word," said I. "Would any Inspector who did his duty pass such abomination?"

"It ought not to have been passed," Pangloss admitted.

"Then the authorities cut there—" I began, when Pangloss cut me short again.

"There would have seemed to have been something wrong somewhere," said he; "but I am prepared to prove that the authorities cut there are the best of all possible cuts."

I never heard of an impeached public authority in my life who was not the best public authority in existence.

"We are told of these unfortunate men being laid low by scurvy," said I. "Since lime-juice has been required to be served out every day in our navy, surely that disease, which used to devastate it, has almost disappeared. Was there lime-juice aboard this transport?"

My right official was beginning "the best of all possible—" when an inconvenient medical forefinger pointed him to another page of the evidence, from which it appeared that the lime-juice had been bad too. Not to mention that the vinegar had been bad, the vegetables bad, the coals bad, the cooking accommodation insufficient (if there had been any thing worth mentioning to cook), the water supply exceedingly inadequate, and the beer sour.

"Then there was," said Pangloss, a little irritated, "there was the want of a possible men."

"In what respect?" I asked.

"Oh! Habitual drunkards," said Pangloss.

But again the unwelcome medical fore-finger pointed out another passage in the evidence, showing that the dead men had been examined after death, and that there was no sign of their possibly have been habitual drunkards, because the organs within them which must have shown traces of that habit were perfectly sound.

"And besides," said the three doctors present, one and all, "habitual drunkards brought us low as these men were brought low, and required more care and food, as the great majority of these men are recovering." They would not have strength of constitution to do it.

"Reckless and improvident dogs, then," said Pangloss. "Always are—nine times out of ten."

I turned to the number of my official friend, and asked him whether the men had any money?

"Money?" said he. "I have in my iron safe nearly four hundred pounds of theirs; the ship have nearly a hundred pounds more; and many of them have left money in Indian banks besides."

"Has" I inquired, "any of that money been spent?"

"this is not the best of all possible stories, I doubt!"

We went into a large ward, containing some twenty or five-and-twenty beds. We went into several such wards, one after another. I find it of making it known that I was not a doctor, and I saw in them, without frightening the reader from the perusal of these lines and defeating my object of making it known.

Oh the sunken eyes that turned to me as I walked between the rows of beds, or—worse still—that plucked at me as I passed calling, and saw nothing and cared for nothing! Here lay the skeleton of a man, so lightly covered with a fair, wax-looking skin, that the form of the skeleton in the anatomy was clothed, and I could clasp the arm, above the elbow, in my finger and thumb. There lay a man with the black scurvy eating his legs away, his gums gone, and his teeth all gaunt and bare. This boy was pronounced by the doctors to be dying, and the patient had died but yesterday. That bed was a hopeless one, because its occupant was sinking fast, and the man whose head lay there on the pinched mask of face upon the pillow with a feeble moan. The awful thinness of the fallen cheeks, the awful hopelessness of the sunken eyes, the line of lead, the hands of ivory, the recumbent human images lying in the shadow of death, with a kind of solemn stillness about them, as if each one of them died aboard the ship and were lying at the bottom of the sea—oh, Pangloss, God forgive you!

In one bed lay a man whose left leg had been saved (as it was hoped) by deep incisions in the feet and legs. While I was speaking to him a nurse came up to change the bandages. Some of these dressings had rendered necessary, and I had an instinctive feeling that it was not well to turn away merely to spare myself pain. I was sorry for, and keenly sympathetic; but the efforts he made to subdue any expression of impatience or suffering were quite heroic. It was easy to see, in the shrinking of the figure and the drawing of the bed-clothes over the head, how acute the endurance was, and it made me shrink too, as if I were in pain; but when the new bandages were on, and the poor feet were composed again, he made no complaint (he had not uttered a word), and said, plaintively, "I am so tender and weak, you see, Sir!" Neither from him nor from any one sufferer of the whole ghastly number did I hear a complaint. Of thankfulness for present solicitude and care I heard much; of complaint not a word.

I think I could have recognized in the dramatic skeleton there the ghost of a soldier. Something of the old air was still latent in the palest shadow of life that flitted to. One emaciated creature, in the strictest literality worn to the bone, lay stretched on his back, looking as like death that I asked one of the doctors if he were not dying or dead? A few kind words put the doctor in his place, and he opened those eyes, and smiled—looked, in a moment, as if he would have made a salute if he could. "We shall pull him through, please God," said the doctor. "Please God, Sure, and thankye," said the patient. "You are much better to-day, are you not?" said the Doctor. "Please God, Sure; but the shape I want, Sure; 'tis my breathin' makes the nights so long." "He is a careful fellow this, you must know," said the Doctor, cheerfully, as we left him rubbing both when they put him in an open cart to bring him here, and he had the presence of mind to ask to have a sovereign taken out of his pocket that he had there, and a cab engaged. Probably it saved his life." The patient rattled out the skeleton of a laugh, and said, proud of the story, "'Dess, Sure, an open cairt was a comical means o' bringin' a dyin' man here, and a clever way to kill him." You might have known it was a joke by the tone he said it.

One thing had perplexed me very much in going from bed to bed. A very significant and cruel object. I could not imagine man but one. He had attracted my notice by having got up and dressed himself in his soldier's jacket and trowsers, with the exception of the lining by the fire; but he had found himself too weak, and had crept back to his bed, and laid himself down on the outside of it. A coarse, common-looking man, as to be a young man aged by famine and sickness. As we were standing by the Irish soldier's bed I remembered my official friend the Doctor. He took a board with an inscription on it from the head of the Irishman's bed, and asked me what age I supposed that man to be? I had observed him with attention while talking to him, and answered, confidently, "Fifty." Pangloss, with a pair of spy glasses at the patient, who had dropped into a stupor again, put the board back, and said, "Twenty-four."

All the arrangements of the wards were excellent. They could not have been more humane, sympathizing, gentle, attentive, or wholesome. The owners of the ship, too, had done all they could, liberally. There were bright fires in every room, and the convalescents were sitting round them reading various papers and periodicals. I took the liberty of inviting my official friend Pangloss to take more convalescent men, and to tell me whether their faces and bearing were or were not, generally, the faces and bearing of steady, respectable, well-behaved soldiers? He is master of the work-house, overhearing me, said that he had had a pretty large experience of troops, and had better opportunities than these had ever had to do with. They were always (he added) as we saw them. And of us visitors (I add) they were unfeignedly glad that we were there.

It was audacious in me, but I took another liberty with Pangloss. Prefacing it with the observation that, of course, I knew beforehand that there was not the faintest desire any where to hush up any part of this dreadful business, and that the Inquest was in the usual form of all possible Inquests, I besought four things of Pangloss. Firstly, to observe that the Inquest was not held in that place, and at some distance from it. Secondly, to look round upon those helpless spectres in their beds. Thirdly, to remember that the witnesses produced from among those beds on that Inquest could not have been selected because they were the men who had the most to tell it, but because they happened to be in a state admitting of their safe removal. Fourthly, to say whether the Coroner and Jury could have come there, to those pillows, and taken a calm evidence? My official friend declined to commit himself to a more detailed reply.

I have already stated that in one of the fireside groups; as he was a man of a very intelligent countenance, and as I have a great respect for nonCommissioned officers, I sat down on the form on the nearest bed to have some talk with him. (It was the bed of one of the gristliest of the poor skeletons, and he died shortly after.)

"I was glad to see, in the evidence of an officer at the Inquest, sergeant, that he never saw men shaken better on board ship than these men."

"They did behave very well, Sir."

"I was glad to see, too, that every man had a hammock."

The sergeant gravely shook his head. "There must be some mistake, Sir. The men of my own corps had no hammocks. There were not hammocks enough on board, and the men of the two next messes laid hold of hammocks for themselves as soon as they died on board, and squeezed my men out, as I may say."

"Had the squeezed-out men none then?"

"None, Sir. They were obliged to put their hammocks were used by other men who wanted hammocks; but many men had none at all."

Then you don't agree with the evidence on that point?"

"Certainly not, Sir. A man can't when he knows he is going to die."

"Did any of the men sell their bedding for drink?"

"There is some mistake on that point, too, Sir. Men were under the impression—I knew it for a fact at the time—that it was not allowed to take hammocks or bedding on board, and so men who had things of that sort came to sell them purposely."

"Did any of the men sell their clothes for drink?"

"They did, Sir." (I believe there never was a more truthful witness than the sergeant. He had no inclination to make out a case.)

"Many?"

"Some, Sir" (considering the question). "Soldier-like. There had been long marching in the rainy season by bad roads—no roads at all, in short—and when they got to Calcutta men turned to and drank before taking a last look at it. Soldier-like."

"Do you see any men in this ward, for example, who sold their clothes for drink at that time?"

The sergeant's wan eye, happily just beginning to rekindle with health, traveled round the place, and came back to me. "Certainly, Sir."

"The marching to Calcutta in the rainy season must have been severe?"

"It was severe, Sir."

"Yet what with the rest and the sea air, I should have thought that the men (even the men who got drunk) would have soon begun to recover on board ship?"

"So they might; but the bad food told upon them, and when we got into the latitude it began to tell more, and the men dropped."

"The sick had a general disinclination for food, I am told, sergeant?"

"Have you seen the food, Sir?"

"Some of it."

"Have you seen the state of their mouths, Sir?"

If the sergeant, who was a man of a few orderly words, had spoken the amount of a volume of this publication, he could not have settled that question better. I believe that the sick could as soon have eaten coals as the ship's provisions.

I took the additional liberty with my friend Pangloss, when I had left the sergeant with good wishing, of asking Pangloss whether he had ever heard of biscuit getting drunk and bartering its nutritious qualities for putrefaction and vermin; of peas becoming hardened to the hue of bullets, and refusing themselves off the face of the earth; of limejuice, vegetables, vinegar, cooking accommodation, water, coals, and beer, all turning bad, declining together and going to ruin? If not (I asked him), what did he say in defense of the officers condemned by the Coroner's Jury, who, by signing the General Inspection report relative to the ship Great Tasmania chartered for these troops, had deliberately declared all that bad and disgusting dung-bill refuse to be good and wholesome food? My official friend replied that it was a remarkable fact, that when those officers were called on to recite good, and other officers only comparatively better, those particular officers were superlatively the very best of all possible officers.

My hand and my heart fail me in writing my record of this journey. The shadow of the soldiers in the hospital-beds of that Liverpool workhouse was so shocking and so shameful, that as an Englishman I blush and blush to remember it. It would have been simply unbearable at the time but for the consideration and pity with which they were soothed in their sufferings.

No punishment that our inefficient laws provide is worthy of the name when set against the guilt of this transaction. But if the responsible few of it die out unavenged, and if it do not result in the inexorable dismissal and disgrace of every one who can be sponsible for it, their scrape will be infamous to the Government (no matter of what party) that so neglects the high moral influences in the nation that tamely suffers such intolerable wrong to be done in its name.

SIMPLE SIMON AND THE PENNY.

A BALLAD RECENTLY DISCOVERED IN AN ANCIENT QUARTO MS., AND EDITED BY FREDERICK FINCH, B.D.

Simple Simon met a Pieman,
Who talked very fine:
Says Simple Simon to the Pieman,
Let me taste French Wine.

Said the Pieman unto Simple Simon,
First give me a Penny:
Said Simple Simon to the Pieman,
'Tis dear to buy so many."

V. 1. Simple Simon. Johannes Taurus.

V. 1. Pieman, see Pans Vin, or pious man. Guillelmus Lapidarius, Parisiensis Ecclesiæ Canonicus.

V. 2. "Et veram Ambitus magni Monstravit Semitam."

Ingressus Simplex Simeon Sanctum Templum dedit,
Ait, si placuit, sed quo Emisse Sereno fertilis Rempublicam?

V. 3. Paltry penny four. Tres Imbris vel Nubes, tres cubiti spatium, est.

V. 4. French wine. Vitis Gallica Sabinum canthoris.

V. 6. Give me a Penny. Vestigal magnum, propinatum, ad physicianum sanandum, Gallicis Gallicum Gallicè Gallicè ait si.

V. 8. Dear to buy. Non est Simonis tam stultus, post omnia, ut sit ita stultus.

PRIMAL EXTINGUISHERS!—We know a shoe which is so extremely fastidious that he is always measured for his umbrella.

—That's a flame of mine!" as the bellows said to the fire.

Oho—that rivers should be so full just where they empty themselves!

Many institutions are ingeniously called *semi-*tastes, for they do not half teach any thing.

The man who was hemmed in by a crowd has been troubled with a thin in his side ever since.

Two old friends met, not long since, after a separation of thirty-five years. "Well, Tom," says one, "how has the world gone with you, old boy? Married yet?—Yes, and I've a family yon can't match: seven boys and one girl." "I can match it exactly," was the reply, "for I have seven girls and one boy."

The Tribune is certainly becoming rusty in Bible learning. It quotes with a "little revision" the words of Jesse's son, David the son of Jessie," when it was not little David and not Jessie's son, but the anointed King of Israel, and all the people," who was sent on that errand. Is this a specimen of the Biblical and historical accuracy of that paper?

What figure is that which if cut in two becomes naught?—The human figure.

William the Fourth seemed in a momentary dilemma one day when at table with several officers he ordered one of the waiters to "take away that marine there," pointing to an empty bottle. "Your Majesty," inquired the cadaverous old waiter, "do you consider an empty bottle to a member of our branch of the service?"—"Yes," repeated the monarch, as a sudden thought struck him, "I mean to say it has done its duty once, and is ready to do it again."

The philosopher Frazer says that, "though a man without money is poor, a man with nothing but money is still poorer."

Believe misfortune quickly. A man is like an egg—the longer he is kept in hot water the harder he is when he is taken out.

"I presume you won't charge any thing for just remembering me," said a one-legged sailor to a wooden-leg manufacturer.

A lawyer engaged in a case, tormented a witness so much with questions that the poor fellow at last cried for water. "There," said the judge, "I thought you'd pump him dry."

A collegian, enlightening a farmer upon animalcules, applied his microscope in the thorax, saying, "Now, look and see the wiggle." "Well," said the farmer, placing the cheese in his mouth, "let them wiggle. I can stand it as long as they can."

Why is B like a hot fire?—Because it makes oil boil.

"I'm sorry, Mr. Wilson, to see this splendid field of potatoes so seriously diseased," said a sympathizing inspector. "Ah! well, it's a great pity," replied the farmer, "but there's no comfort—Jock Tamson's in not a bit better!"

THE HON. JOHN MINOR BOTTS, OF VIRGINIA.

AMONG the distinguished persons whose names have been suggested in connection with the Presidency is the Hon. John Minor Botts.

Mr. Botts was born in the town of Dumfries, in the County of Prince William, in the State of Virginia, on the 16th September, 1802. His parents removed while he was yet very young to the City of Richmond, where his father, Benjamin Botts, became an eminent lawyer, and was one of the counsel of Aaron Burr in his celebrated trial for treason. In the winter of 1811, by the conflagration of the Richmond Theatre some eighty persons perished in the flames and otherwise. By this sad catastrophe Mr. Botts lost both of his parents, and was thus very early left without the natural and competent guardians of his youth. Having received an adequate, though not what is termed a full education, before his majority he was admitted a practitioner at the bar in the courts of Virginia.

He did not long continue, however, to practice his profession; having married very soon there-after, he settled on his County of Henrico, and became a cultivator of the soil, which occupation he continued successfully to follow for a considerable period after his entrance into public life.

Always a Whig, he was elected, from the county of his residence, in the year 1833, a member of the House of Delegates of Virginia, and so continued, by yearly re-election, until the year 1839, when he was elected to Congress. In the former body he very soon distinguished himself as an able debater, an eloquent speaker, a well-informed man, endowed with high qualities of firmness and consistency. The first debate in which he took any part in the latter body arose on the election return of the representative from New Jersey, which gave rise to animated discussion. In a speech delivered January 9, 1840, Mr. Botts vindicated with "power and effect" the claim of her "broad seal" and on the 10th of March the minority report of the Committee, prepared by him, was presented to the House, and the subject was finally disposed of by the admission of the returned representatives to their seats. His effort on this occasion placed him in the foremost rank of members. During the same session (July 14, 1840), on the bill making appropriations for the army, he again addressed the House ably with a view to retrenching the expenditures of the Federal Government. When Mr. Tyler succeeded to the Presidency by the death of General Harrison, Mr. Botts very soon found himself constrained to place himself in opposition to his administration—a position personally repugnant to him, since he and Mr. Tyler had been warm personal friends; but as believed he was guided by high considerations of duty. On the particular subject which gave rise to that difference his speeches may be found—the one dated August 4, and the other September 10, 1841.

Another important act was his successful effort to repeal the Twenty-first Rule, which had been adopted for the purpose of excluding slavish petitions. In connection he used the following language: "The right of petition is guaranteed by the Constitution; is absolute, unqualified, and unlimited; and to impair that right is to inflict a fatal wound upon popular freedom." The result of the repeal, as he had predicted, established it to all similar petitions. In the session before the repeal 6090 were presented; in the session after it only 6.

Mr. Botts closed his Congressional career (after serving three sessions) with the session of 1847–48; since which time—with the exception of being in the Virginia Constitutional Convention, in which he bore a conspicuous part—he has been a private citizen. Engaged in public life, Mr. Botts has not remained a careless observer of passing events.

Mr. Botts took ground against the famed Kansas-Nebraska Bill; and his letters, published at the time in the National Intelligencer, exhibited great power. On this occasion he was the subject of censure from many of his own party and section, many of whom have since acknowledged the correctness of his views, and give testimony to his judgment and foresight.

Hon. John Minor Botts is now to-day as devoted a follower of Mr. Clay as he was thirty years ago At the present time he co-operates with the Constitutional Union party.

HON. ERASTUS BROOKS, OF NEW YORK

THE Hon. Erastus Brooks, whose portrait is given herewith, was born in Portland, Maine, January 31, 1815. His father was lost at sea near the close of the year 1814, and left his family so far unprovided for, that young Brooks, when but eight years of age, was sent to Boston to make his own way in the world. Here he was employed as an errand boy, and gained the rudiments of an education by attending evening school. His next move was to a printing-office, where he was successively "devil," journeyman printer, and finally publisher and proprietor of a daily paper called the Yankee, at Worcester. The conductor of the New York Daily Advertiser and of several New England papers; next took an interest in the New York Express, which he edited for a time as editor, and remained in Washington, as one of its editors, for sixteen successive sessions of Congress. In 1853 he was elected through Europe, corresponding with the Express.

In 1855 he was elected to the State Senate of New York, and distinguished himself by his advocacy of the bill which took the Church property of the Roman Catholic Church in this State from the possession of the bishops, and placed it under the control of the lay trustees of the churches, in trust for the congregations. This involved him in a controversy with Archbishop Hughes, which attracted much attention at the time. He was again elected to the State Senate in 1855, and was the Democratic candidate of the American Party for Governor of this State. He was beaten at the election, and has since taken no active part in public life. He is connected with the "Union Party," whose Convention meets at Baltimore on 9th May.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC., ETC.

To resume. The night passed as usual, without producing any change for the better in Miss Halcombe. Sir Percival remained to improve a little. The day after that her ladyship, the Countess, without mentioning the object of her journey, went to town. The hearing, proceeded by the morning train to London; her noble husband, with his customary attention, accompanying her to the station.

I was now left in sole charge of Miss Halcombe, with every apparent chance, in consequence of the absence of Sir Percival and Lady Glyde, of having my own way undisturbed. Just as I was sitting at the time, and joined Mrs. Rubelle, with the object of my remaining by her from feeling strange and nervous in consequence of the uncertainty of her situation. She did not appear to see it in that light. She seemed to be quite satisfied, beforehand, that Mr. Dawson would approve of her; and she sat calmly looking out of window, in the enjoyment of enjoying the country air. Some people might have thought such conduct suggestive of brutish insensibility. I say to my honor that I felt as it down to extraordinary strength of mind.

Instead of the doctor coming up to us, I was sent for to see the doctor. I thought this change of affairs rather odd, but Mrs. Rubelle did not appear to be surprised in any way. I left Lady Glyde still calmly looking out of window, and still silently enjoying the country air.

Mr. Dawson was waiting for me, by himself, in the breakfast-room.

"About this new nurse, Mrs. Michelson," said the doctor.

"Yes, Sir?"

"I find that she has been brought here from London by Sir Percival and by the old foreigner, who is always trying to interfere with me. Mrs. Michelson, the fat old foreigner is a Quack."

This was very rude. I was naturally shocked at it.

"Are you aware, Sir," I said, "that you are talking of a friend of Sir Percival's?"

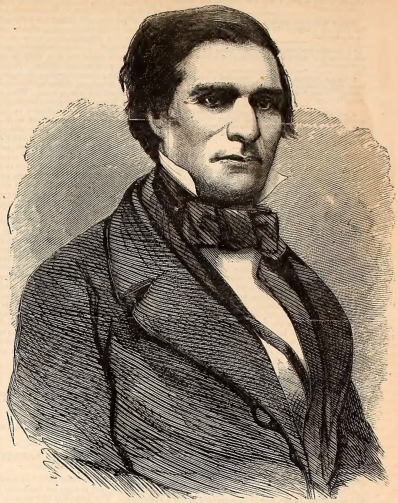
"Pooh! He isn't the first Quack with a handle to his name. They're all Counts—hang 'em!"

"He would not be a friend of Sir Percival Glyde's, Sir, if he was not a member of the highest circles—excepting the English aristocracy, of course."

"Very well, Mrs. Michelson, call him what you like; you've got to ask to the nurse. I have been objecting to her already."

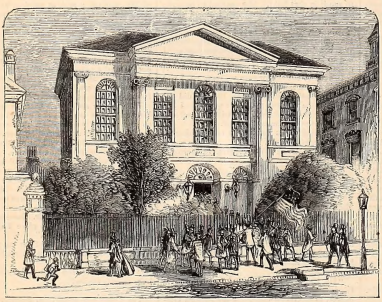
"Without having seen her, Sir?"

"Yes, without having seen her. She may be the best nurse in existence, but she is not a nurse of my providing. I have put that objection to Sir Percival as the master of the house. He doesn't support me. He says a nurse of my providing would have been a stranger from London; and he thinks the woman ought to have a trial, after his wife's aunt has taken the trouble to bring her from London. There is some justice in that, and I can't decently say No. But I have made it a condition that she is to go at once on the slightest complaint of her. This proposal being one which I have some right to make, as medical attendant, Sir Percival has consented to it. Now, Mrs. Michelson, I know I can depend on you, and I want you to keep a sharp eye on the nurse for the first day or two, and to tell me, at the end, she gives Miss Halcombe no medicines but mine. This foreign nobleman of years is dying to try his quack remedies (mesmerism and globules) on my patient; and a nurse who is brought here by his wife may be a little too willing to help him. You understand? Very well, then, we may go up stairs. Is the nurse there? I'll say a word to her before she goes into the sick-room."



We found Mrs. Rubelle still enjoying herself at the window. When I introduced her to Mr. Dawson neither the doctor's doubtful looks nor the doctor's searching questions appeared to confuse her in the least. She answered him quietly in her foreign accent, but without the least hard to puzzle her, she never betrayed the least ignorance, so far, about any part of her duties. This was doubtless the result of strength of mind, as I said before, and not of brazen assurance by any means.

We all went into the bedroom. Mrs. Rubelle looked very attentively at the patient, courtesied to Lady Glyde, set one or two little things right in the room, and sat down quietly in a corner to wait until she was wanted. Her ladyship seemed startled and annoyed by the appearance of the strange nurse. No one said one thing for the purpose of reassuring Miss Halcombe, who was still slumbering, except the doctor, who whispered a question about the night. I quietly answered, "Much as usual?" and then Mr. Dawson went out. Lady Glyde followed him, I suppose to speak about her sister. For my own part, I had made up my mind already that this quiet foreign person would keep her situation. She had all her wits about her, and she appeared to understand her business. So far I could hardly have done much better by the bedside myself.



Remembering Mr. Dawson's caution to me, I subjected Mrs. Rubelle to a severe scrutiny, at certain intervals, for the next three or four hours. I over and over again tried the room softly and suddenly, but I never found her out in any suspicious action. Lady Glyde, who watched her as attentively as I did, discovered nothing either. I never detected a sign of the medicine bottles being tampered with. I never saw Mrs. Rubelle say a word to the Count, or the Count to her. She managed Miss Halcombe in an unquestionably safe and discreet way. The poor lady wavered backward and forward between a sort of sleepy exhaustion, which was half tiredness and half stupefaction, and a sort of fever which brought with them more or less of wandering in her mind. Mrs. Rubelle never disturbed her in the former state, and never irritated her, in the second, by appearing too suddenly at the bedside in the character of a stranger. Sooner or later she was sure to recognize Lady Glyde and me by our usual voices and by our familiar movements about the room. She managed Miss Halcombe's unquestionable weakness and discretion

I wish to be understood as reprobating it once more on this occasion.

In the course of the next few days Miss Hildombe did certainly seem to all of us to be mending a little. Our faith in Mr. Dawson revived. It seemed to be very confident about the case; and he assured Lady Glyde, when she spoke to him on the subject, that he would himself propose to send for a physician the moment he felt so much as the shadow of a doubt crossing his own mind.

The only person among us who did not appear to be relieved by these words was the Countess. She said to me privately that she could not feel easy about Miss Halcombe on Mr. Dawson's authority, and that she should wait anxiously for her husband's opinion on his return. That, in turn, his letters informed her, would take place in three days' time. The Count and Countess corresponded regularly every morning during his lordship's absence. They were in that respect, as in all others, a pattern to married people.

On the evening of the third day I noticed a change in Miss Halcombe, which caused me serious apprehension. Mrs. Rubelle noticed it too. We said nothing on the subject to Lady Glyde, who was then lying asleep, completely overpowered by exhaustion, on the sofa in the sitting-room.

Mr. Dawson did not pay his evening visit till later than usual. He came as late as set eyes on his patient I saw his face alter. He tried to hide it; but he looked both confused and alarmed. A messenger was sent to his residence for his medicine-chest, disinfecting preparations were used in the room, and a bed was made up for him in the house by his own directions. "Has the fever turned to infection?" I whispered to him. "I am afraid it has," he answered; "we shall know better to-morrow morning."

By Mr. Dawson's own directions Lady Glyde was kept in ignorance of this change for the worse. He himself absolutely forbade her, on account of her health, to join us in the bedroom that night. She tried to resist—there was a sad scene—but he had his medical authority to support him, and he carried his point.

The next morning, one of the men servants was sent to London, at eleven o'clock, with a letter to a physician in town, and with orders to bring the new doctor back with him by the earliest possible train. Half an hour after the messenger had gone the Count returned to Blackwater Park.

The Countess, on her own responsibility, immediately brought him in to see the patient. There was no impropriety that I could discover in her taking this course. His lordship was a married man; he was old enough to be Miss Halcombe's father; and he saw her in the presence of her nearest female relative, her aunt. Mr. Dawson nevertheless protested against his presence in the room; but I could plainly remark the doctor was too much alarmed to make any serious resistance on this occasion.

The poor suffering lady was past knowing any one about her. She seemed to take her friends for enemies. When the Count approached her bedside, her eyes, which had been wandering incessantly round and round the room before, settled on his face with a dreadful state of terror, which I shall remember to my dying day. The Count sat down by her; I felt her pulse and her temples; looked at her very attentively; and then turned round upon the doctor with such an expression of indignation and contempt in his face that the words failed on Mr. Dawson's lips, and he stood, for a moment, pale with anger and alarm—pale and perfectly speechless.

His lordship looked next at me.

"When did the change happen?" he asked.

I told him the time.

"Has Lady Glyde been in the room since?"

I replied that she had not. The doctor had absolutely forbidden her to come into the room, on the evening before, and had repeated the order again in the morning.

"Have you and Mrs. Rubelle been made aware of the full extent of the mischief?" was his next question.

We were aware, I answered, that the malady was considered infectious. He stopped me before I could add any thing more.

"It is Typhus Fever," he said, sternly.

In the minute that passed, while these questions and answers were going on, Mr. Dawson recovered himself, and addressed the Count with his customary firmness.

"It is not typhus fever," he said, sharply. "I protest that this interference is wrong. No one has a right to put questions here but me. I have done my duty, to the best of my ability—"

The Count stopped him, also, by words, but only by pointing to the bed. Mr. Dawson seemed to feel that silent contradiction to his assertion of his own ability to grow only the more angry under it.

"I say I have done my duty," he reiterated. "A physician has been sent for from London. I will consult on the nature of the fever with him, and with no one else. I insist on your leaving the room."

"I entered this room, Sir, in the sacred interests of humanity," said the Count. "And in the same interests, if the coming of the physician is delayed, I will enter it again. I warn you once more that the fever has turned to Typhus, and that your treatment is responsible for this lamentable change. If that unhappy lady dies, I will give my testimony in a court of justice that your ignorance and obstinacy have been the cause of her death."

Before Mr. Dawson could answer, before the Count could leave us, the door was opened from the sitting-room, and we saw Lady Glyde on the threshold.

"I must and will come in," she said, with extraordinary firmness.

Instead of stepping back her the Count moved into the sitting-room and made way for her to go in. On all other occasions he was the last man in the world to force a lady to do his will; but surprise of the moment he apparently forgot the danger of infection from typhus, and the urgent necessity of forcing Lady Glyde to take proper care of herself.

To my surprise, Mr. Dawson showed more presence of mind. He stopped her ladyship at the first step she took toward the bedside.

"I am sincerely sorry, I am sincerely grieved," he said. "The fever proves to be infectious. Until I am certain that it is not, I entreat you to keep out of the room."

She struggled for a moment; then suddenly dropped her arms and sank forward. She had fainted. The Count carried her from the doctor, and carried her into her own room. The Count preceded us, and waited in the passage till I came out and told him that we had recovered her from the swoon.

I went back to the doctor to tell him, by Lady Glyde's desire, that she wished to see him and to him immediately. He withdrew at once to quiet her ladyship's agitation, and to assure her of the physician's arrival in the course of a few hours. Those hours passed very slowly. Sir Percival and the Count were together down stairs, and sent up, from time to time, to make kind inquiries. At last, between five and six o'clock, to our great relief, the physician came.

He was a young man—full of attention; very serious, and very decided. What he thought of the previous treatment I can not say; but it struck me as remarkable that he put many more questions to myself and to Mrs. Rubelle than he put to the doctor, and that he did not appear to attend with proper interest to what Mr. Dawson said while he was examining Mr. Dawson's patient. I began to suspect, from what I observed in this way, that the Count had spoken Mr. Dawson the illness all the way through; and I was naturally confirmed in that idea when Mr. Dawson, after some little delay, asked the most important question which the London doctor had been sent for to set at rest.

"What is your opinion of the fever?" he inquired.

"Typhus," replied the physician. "Typhus fever beyond all doubt."

That quiet foreign person, Mrs. Rubelle, crossed her hands, bands in front of her, and looked at me with a very significant smile. The Count himself could hardly have appeared more gratified, if he had been present in the room, and had heard the confirmation of his own opinion.

After giving us some useful directions about the management of the patient, and mentioning that he would come again in five days' time, the physician withdrew in private with Mr. Dawson. He would offer no opinion on Miss Halcombe's chances of recovery; he said it was impossible at that stage of the illness to pronounce one way or the other.

The five days passed anxiously.

Countess Eleanor and myself took it by turns to relieve Mrs. Rubelle; Miss Halcombe's condition growing worse and worse, and requiring our utmost care and attention. It was a terribly trying time. Lady Glyde (supported, as Mr. Dawson said, by the constant strain of her suspense on her sister's account) rallied in the most extraordinary manner, and showed a firmness and determination for which I should myself never have given her credit. She insisted on coming into the sick-room two or three times every day, to look at Miss Halcombe with her own eyes, promising not to go too close to the bed if the doctor would consent to her wishes so far. Mr. Dawson very unwillingly made the concession required of him: I think he saw that it was hopeless to dispute with her. She came in every day; and she self-denyingly kept her promise. It felt it personally so distressing (as reminding me of my own affliction during my husband's last illness) to see her so afflicted under these circumstances, that I must beg not to dwell on this part of the subject any longer. It is more agreeable to me to mention that no fresh disputes took place between Mr. Dawson and the Count. His lordship made all his inquiries by deputy, and remained continually in company with Sir Percival down stairs.

On the fifth day the physician came again, and gave us a little hope. He said the tenth day from the first appearance of the typhus would probably decide the result of the illness, and he arranged for his third visit to take place on that date. The interval passed as before—except that the Count went to London again, one morning, and returned at night.

On the tenth day it pleased a merciful Providence to relieve our household from all further anxiety and alarm. The physician positively assured us that Miss Halcombe was out of danger. "She wants no doctor now—all she requires is careful watching and nursing, for some time to come," were the words he used. Those were his own words. That evening I read my husband's touching sermon on Recovery from Sickness with more happiness and advantage (in a spiritual point of view) than I ever remember to have derived from it before.

The effect of the good news on poor Lady Glyde was, I grieve to say, quite overpowering. She was not able to bear the violent reaction; and in another day or two she sank into a state of debility and depression which obliged her to keep her room. Rest and quiet, and change of air afterward, were the best remedies which Mr. Dawson could suggest for her benefit. It was impossible to dispute professional interference; and the Count (I can not imagine why) lost all the self-control which he had so judiciously preserved on former occasions, and taunted the doctor, over and over again, with his mistake about the fever, when it changed to typhus. The unfortunate affair ended in Mr. Dawson's appealing to Sir Percival, and threatening (now that he could leave without absolute danger to Miss Halcombe) to withdraw from his attendance at Blackwater Park if the Count's interference was not peremptorily suppressed from that moment. Sir Percival's reply (though not designedly uncivil) had only resulted in making matters worse; and Mr. Dawson had thereupon written a letter, in a state of extreme indignation at Count Fosco's usage of him, and had sent it to the post next morning.

We were now, therefore, left without the attendance of a medical man. Although there was no immediate necessity for another doctor—nursing and watching being, as the physician had observed, all that Miss Halcombe required—I should have been thankful had there been consulted, have obtained professional assistance, from some other quarter, for form's sake.

The medical question was to strike Sir Percival in that light. He said it would be time enough to send for another doctor if Miss Halcombe showed any relapse whatever. In the mean while, we had the Count to consult in any minor difficulty; and we need not unnecessarily disturb poor Lady Glyde in her present weak and nervous condition, by the presence of a stranger at her bedside. There was much that was reasonable, no doubt, in these considerations; but they left me a little anxious, nevertheless. Nor was I quite satisfied, in my own mind, of the propriety of our concealing the doctor's absence, as we did, from Lady Glyde. It was a merciful decision, I admit—for she was in no state to bear any fresh anxieties. But still it was a deception; and as such, to a person of my principles, at best a doubtful proceeding.

A second perplexing circumstance which happened on the same day, and which took me completely by surprise, added greatly to the sense of uneasiness that was now weighing on my mind.

I was sent for to see Sir Percival in the library. The Count, who was with him when I went in, immediately rose and left us alone together. Sir Percival civilly asked me to take a seat; and then, to my great astonishment, addressed me in these terms:

"I want to speak to you, Mrs. Michelson, about a matter which I decided on some time ago, and which I should have mentioned before but for the sickness and trouble in the house.

In plain words, I have reasons for wishing to break up my establishment immediately at this place—leaving you in charge, of course, as usual. As soon as Lady Glyde and Miss Halcombe can travel, they must both have change of air. My friends, Count Fosco and the Countess, will leave us before that time to live in the neighborhood of London. And I have reasons for not opening the house to any more company, with a view to economizing as carefully as I can. I don't blame you, but my expenses here are a great deal too heavy. In short, I shall sell the horses, and get rid of all the servants at once. I never do things by halves, as you know; and I mean to have the house clear of a pack of useless people by this time to-morrow."

I listened to him, perfectly aghast with astonishment.

"Do you mean, Sir Percival, that I am to dismiss the in-door servants under my charge without the usual month's warning?" I asked.

"Certainly I do. We may all be out of the house before another month; and I am not going to leave the servants here in idleness with no master to wait on."

"Who is to do the cooking, Sir Percival, while you are still staying here?"

"Margaret Porcher can roast and boil—keep her. What do I want with a cook if I don't mean to give any more dinner-parties?"

"The servant you have mentioned is the second unintelligent servant in the house, Sir Percival."

"Keep her, I tell you; and have a woman in from the village to do the cleaning and go away again. My weekly expenses must and shall be lowered immediately. I don't send for you to make objections, Mrs. Michelson—I send for you to carry out my plans of economy. Dismiss the whole lazy pack of in-door servants to-morrow, except Porcher. She is as strong as a horse, and we'll make her work like a horse."

"You will excuse me for reminding you, Sir Percival, that if the servants go to-morrow they must have a month's wages in lieu of a month's warning."

"Let them! A mouth's wages saves a month's waste and gluttony in the servants' hall."

This last remark conveyed an aspersion of the most offensive kind on my management. I had too much self-respect to defend myself under so gross an imputation. Christian consideration for the helpless position of Miss Halcombe and Lady Glyde, and for the serious inconvenience which my sudden absence might inflict on them, alone prevented me from resigning my situation on the spot. I rose immediately. It would have lowered me in my own estimation to have permitted the interview to continue a moment longer.

"After that last remark, Sir Percival, I have nothing more to say. Your directions shall be attended to." Pronouncing those words, I bowed my head with the most distant respect, and went out of the room.

The next day the servants left in a body. Sir Percival himself dismissed the coachman and stablemen; sending them, with all the horses but one, to London. Of the whole domestic establishment, in-doors and out, there now remained only myself, Margaret Porcher, and the gardener; this last living in his own cottage, and being wanted to take care of the one horse that remained in the stables.

With the house left in this strange and lonely condition, with the mistress of it ill in her room, with Miss Halcombe still as helpless as a child, and with the doctor's attendance withdrawn from us in enmity, it was surely not unnatural that my spirits should sink, and my customary resistance be very hard to maintain. My mind was ill at ease. I wished the two poor ladies both well again, and I wished myself away from Blackwater Park.

"GOOD-MORNING, MR. DAWSON."

Revolving Ventilating Refrigerator.

This article, while it is very economical in Ice, has a very large amount of shelf-room, which is so arranged as to be in five different apartments, thereby keeping butter, milk, &c., from coming in contact with meats, fish, sodium, or anything whereby they may become tainted and spoiled. The shelves revolve, bringing each dish to the hand. It is very ornamental, being made in an octagon form and handsomely grained. We also give special attention to all kinds of Warming and Ventilating, in city or country. Send for a Circular, giving description and cuts.

Prof. Mitchel's New Book.

Popular Astronomy.

BY
O. M. MITCHEL, LL.D.,
Director of the Cincinnati and Dudley Observatories.
1 vol. 12mo. Illustrated. Price, $1.25.

This book is acknowledged by competent critics, who have examined the proof-sheets, to be one of the most successful attempts ever made by any writer to explain a complicated science to the easy comprehension of the popular mind.

The author sets out with his reader upon an untiresome

Journey through the Solar System, FROM THE

SUN TO NEPTUNE,

Stopping at each of the Planetary Bodies by the way. The appearance of the Sun and the Planets, as seen through a is accurately and graphically pictured, while, by a succession of admirable descriptions of the most complicated astronomical movements, the reader is exalted, in imagination, by the Professor in his Observatory, where all the intricacies of Transit and Azimuth, of Right Ascension and Parallax, are rendered simple and beautiful to a mind ignorant of sine or cosine.

The book being adapted to general family reading contains but few mathematical diagrams. The author has been signally successful in solving to the reader's mind many obstruse mathematical problems, without the aid of figures.

A SERIES OF BEAUTIFUL LITHOGRAPHIC PRINTS,

Giving pictorial representations of various striking phenomena connected with the Solar System, constitutes an additional attractive feature of the work.

The successive chapters, gradually evolving a Complete History of the Discovery, the Order, and the Phenomena of the Planetary System, Excite a lively interest in the end. The vigorous and graphic style, the numerous historical incidents and illustrations, the fresh and unhackneyed mode of approaching and discussing the abstrusest themes, will strikingly recall to the reader the author's interesting public lectures on the same general subject.

The Correspondence and Letters of ALEXR. VON HUMBOLDT.
Just published, in one vol. 12mo, muslin. Price, $1 25.

The private letters and correspondence of Alexander von Humboldt—of which an English translation is here offered to the public—is one of the most important books which has ever appeared in Germany. It has produced an immense sensation in Europe, and will create a profound interest wherever read. Baron Humboldt, who was unquestionably the most universally cosmopolitan sazan of the age, and perhaps the most absolutely learned man that ever lived, had his own private thoughts and opinions of men and things, which he very freely expressed in these off-hand familiar letters to his friend. They are full of anecdote, gossip, and scandal —out-spoken, never sparing, dealing blows in every (even the highest) direction. From the freedom with which courtiers is sketched, a park has been created among the writer's countrymen—the Berlin police has seized the presents, and the executrix has been threatened with legal proceedings.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

The Fourth Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY is now in progress. Last year over 2,500,000 Numbers of HARPER'S WEEKLY were sold, nearly half of which have been bound for reference. The New Volume, The Proprietors desire to state, will be found even more desirable and more interesting than its predecessors.

It has been their aim to render HARPER'S WEEKLY, in the first place, and before all other things, A FIRST-CLASS NEWSPAPER—a pictorial history of current events, equal to the daily press in fulness of description, and superior to the daily press as combining illustration with text. How far they have attained their aim, the volumes now published will show. The publishers desire to state that it is their fixed purpose to adhere to the principle of fidelity with which every important event of the past year has been related and depicted in the pages of HARPER'S WEEKLY. They would refer especially to the Overland Mail, to the Japanese Embassy, to the Great Eastern Steamship, the Harper's Ferry Outbreak, the Utah Expedition, the Paraguay Expedition, China, etc., etc. The value of the pages thus devoted to the history of the times, it did not exist, and by trying to conceive how little people would know of passing events if they had to rely on written descriptions alone. In this respect, the arrangements for the coming year are more complete than they have been heretofore. HARPER'S WEEKLY has regular artist correspondents in almost every quarter of the globe, and is sure of promptly obtaining sketches of every leading event. In all such matters economy is concerned. It commands the pencil of the first artists at home; and on the one hand the Great Eastern at Harper's Ferry, can render its readers eye-witnesses of striking scenes wherever they occur. It will, however, in order to present its readers with a complete illustrated history of our age, continue to transfer to its pages the best and most generally interesting pictures from foreign illustrated journals, just as the daily papers transfer to their columns the articles in foreign newspapers. In a word, the Publishers to HARPER'S WEEKLY intend to lay finding in its pages next year an accurate, well-drawn, well-engraved, well-printed picture of every memorable event which occurs, and a portrait of every man who attracts the general attention of the people of this country.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue, as heretofore, to publish the best tales that are written by native and foreign authors. It has already published a Tale of Two Cities, by CHARLES DICKENS (with original illustrations drawn for HARPER'S WEEKLY); What Shall we do with It? by SIR E. LYTTON BULWER; The Dead Secret, by WILKIE COLLINS; Lois Oil Wells, by MRS. CAROLINE LEE HENTZ; Good Night, by CHARLES READE; Trunnys, by GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS; Our Parish Neighbors & Co., Bunkers, by FIVE HUGH LUDLOW, Esq.; and The Mistress of the Mansion, by JULIA KAVANAGH. It is now publishing The Unconventional Traveller, a Series of Journeys, by CHARLES DICKENS; Miss Forrester, by MRS. J. H. RIDDELL, illustrated by JOHN MCLENAN, and Captain Rameau, of the Schooner Centipede, by LIEUT. R. A. WISE, U.S.N., illustrated by FARNOSS & LUMLEY. On or before the conclusion of these tales, another equal merit will be commenced, it being the intention of the publishers to secure every year the services of such eminent tales that is written here or abroad. It is hardly necessary to add, that the literary articles appearing in HARPER'S WEEKLY are purchased from their authors by the proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY, and are, therefore, instances, give for a more right of priority what amounts to a handsome copyright to the author.

In addition to serials, each number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will contain one or more complete stories by the most eminent author. In respect to these tales, as with the serials, the publishers will publish the best that they can obtain, without regarding their origin. They are always ready to give the highest price for original matter; but they will not pass over a first-class tale because it is foreign, in order to print an inferior one which happens to have been written at home.

THE UNION NOT IN DANGER WHEN THE SHADE OF WASHINGTON IS REVERED IN SPIRIT OF THE UNION.

Size 12x19 inches.

This truly patriotic and elaborate Picture in Oil Colors represents a correct full length Portrait of WASHINGTON in military costume, illustrative of the following verses from Wm. Bent Wallace's Poem.

"And let on high the glorious shade
Of Washington lights all the gloom,
And points with fame wreath, arrayed
In lines of fire around his tomb;
"Americans! your fathers shed
Their blood to rear the Union's fame;
For this their fearless banners spread
On many a gory plain.
"Americans! oh, will ye dare,
On mountain, prairie, valley, flood,
By hurling down their glorious gift,
To desecrate that blood?
"The right-hill live while Faction dies;
All traitors draw a fleeting breath;
But Patriots drink from God's own eyes
Truth's light, that conquers death!"

This article memento of the Father of his Country should ornament the fireside of every family in the land.

A Friend in Need. Try it.

Sweet's Infallible Liniment is prepared from the recipe of Dr. Stephen Sweet, of Connecticut, the great bone setter, and has been used in his practice for the last twenty years with the most astonishing success. As an external remedy it is without a rival, and will alleviate pain more speedily than any other preparation. For all Rheumatic and Nervous Disorders it is truly infallible, and as a remedy for Sores, Wounds, Sprains, Bruises, &c., its soothing, healing and powerful strengthening properties excite the just wonder and astonishment of all who have ever given it a trial. Over four hundred certificates of remarkable cures, produced by it within the last two years attest this fact.

REPUBLICAN WIGWAM AT CHICAGO.

We present herewith a view of the new building—yclept the "Republican Wigwam"—which the Republican clubs of Chicago have built for the National Republican Convention to be held in that city on 16th inst. It reflects credit on the liberality of the Chicago people.

The building stands on the corner of Lake and Market streets, a very suitable location. It is 100 feet by 180; the cornice stands 40 feet from the ground. The ground-floor, inside, is divided between the stage, which will seat 1800 persons; two large commodious committee-rooms, one on either side the stage; and the floor of the hall, which will accommodate, it is said, 8000 persons. The floor rests on an inclined platform, so that persons on the rear seats will have a good view of the stage. For spectators, a gallery 33 feet wide runs round three sides of the building: a portion of this is set apart exclusively for ladies, and has a separate entrance. The roof of the hall is arched, and in it are five sky-lights, which, with the doors and windows on three sides, will afford ample light and ventilation. At night the whole building will be lit with gas.

The erection of such a building on such short notice, and for such a purpose, shows that the Western people are not so poor as many are fond of asserting.

The architect of the building is Mr. W. W. Boyington.

FROM THE CHARLESTON CONVENTION.

No. V.

Tew Mejor Jack Downing, Downingsville, Downing County, Maine; in care of Mr. Harper, who'll send it in print.

CHARLESTON WHARF, April 30, 1860.

DEOU you remember, Uncle Jack, when we all went out a fishin', tew years ago last July, and got becaln'd right off agin Mount Desart island? Kinder geuess yeou hain't forgot it, and heow you got all riled up, having tew speak a Fourth ov July address; and there we was, fifty miles off, on the mornin' ov the third. Deon't you remember heow that ere old pink-starn schuner wobbled about, with her sales all histed, and a puff ov wind a little, her one mile—then tuther! Then she'd roll—then she'd pitch—then yeou'd git mad, and say we'd never git tew Portland, so yeou could reel off your Independence yarn. Between yeou and I, it stru ov seemed once as though yeou wen'or most used profane words, but ov course yeou didn't deou no sich a thing.

"Wot in time's that got tu deou with Charleston?" ses yeou. "I a masterly sight," ses I; fur jist as we wos then, the Dimmocrats is now. Heve I'v bin near a fortnite, and not a chance has I had to see my way ahed a boat's length. The old ship ov State that Governur Morrill always tells abeout has bin in a tite place, I tell yeou, and the way the gusts ov wind from the North and from the South has made her sort ov keel over is curus, I tell yeou. Gin'ral Cushin's had jist as much as he could deou tew keep things a goin' on, and nites, when he's gone tew Governur Alston's house, where he's staid, I guess he's been sort ov tucker'd eout. This here presidin' over a Convention aint wot it's cracked up tew be, I tell yeou, and bein' a Dellergate ain't much better. But I'm a gittin' ahed ov my time, and will go back tew the coumencin' ov the beginnin'.

When I furst got tew Charleston 'twas all as quiet as a Sunday mornin' arter the folks has got ready tew go tew meetin', but the bells hain't begun tew ring. The beds wos all made, and the vittles wos mostly cooked, and the clerks tew the taverns had butiful day-books all reddy to make charges in, 'specially "sundreys." Cullurd waiters trotted abeout like ravin' destracted roosters, a whisking little brums tew brush sum wun with, and every thing wos like 'twas tew Downingville when yeaus was a goin' tew bring Gen'ral Jackson chair, but didn't. So I had the scrunur maid fast by tew honours, hed and starn, and started around tew sell my apple sars and cidar. The way the old place looks I've all reddy told yeou, and there's a good many wus places tew, only it must be oll-fired hot here in July. It's hot enuff neow; but they say this ain't nothin' tew compair.

Wa'al, furst com the stoute boats from Boston, and New York, and Philleruyclehy, chock full of Dellergates, and Substertutes, with other female frends. They had lots ov lickur abord tew, and brass bands that plaid ollfired nice, and they hurrard for Douglas, and went ashore jist as tho' they nenti tew have him noumernated rite eff. Then cum the fellurs from the Upper Mississip—if yeou know where that place is, I deon't—and they hollurd for Douglas, lickerty-split. A little more, I shud hav written Mr. Harper tew tell yeou and the folks tew go in fur Douglas any heow, but jist then along cum Mr. Slydel, and Mr. Bright, and Gen'ral Cushing, an' ses they, "Wait!" An' I weighted.

Then cum Mistar Yancey, with a lot more or regular fire-eters, but mitey good fellers, I tell yeou, usin' lots of tobaccer, and talkin' kinder wild, but keepin' rite strate tew their work. They took a grate likin' tew me, and sed yeou was a conservytiv man, and I wos your nephew. Ses I, "I leeut nothin' else."

Well, the Douglas men talk'd mighty leoud, and sed wot they could dew, and when the convenshun went tew meetin' they rush'd off at a 2.40 gate, beound tew win. But Slydel winked at Gen'ral Cushin', and he put on the brakes, and then the chances got sort ov hallnuced.

Neow, Uncle Jack, the old craft was then like that air schuner we wos in off Mount Desart. Deou yeou yeow I was a goin' tew rite yeou to go in wun way or t'other, and have yeou cum eout and then have tew take the back track? Narry time. So I let um navigate, and build their platforms, usin' Wood or not, jist as they plezed. And tew day, fur the furst time, I sess daylite, and tain't Douglas. No, Sir! The fire-eters is tew much fur the Little Gianturs, stemeboats, principles, lands ov music, and outside dellergations, with New York dellegates and their substertutes and other female frends.

THE REPUBLICAN WIGWAM AT CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, IN WHICH THE REPUBLICAN CONVENTION WILL BE HELD, MAY 16, 1860.

We ain't cout of the woods yit, and if there ain't an irrypressible conflict here, there ain't none no where; but Slydel sez we're bound tew win, and the Southern fire-eters goin' cout has made 'em coax 'em back, and the dellergates that's gut offiuns hates tew loose them, they dezn't. Who blaims 'em?

It's sort ov thick and muggy tho', yet, and I swanny, sumtimes I think if we'd sent avl these old Sennertors home, and let the fire-eters go, and gone in for Douglas, we'd win. But Slydel sez, he'll go in for Douglas yet and I and the bed-post, if enny boddy but Douglas is nommernated, I'm bound to hev sumthin'. They've promised it tew me, sure, and I can't say no. So hold yure hosses a while.

Wall, we've had grate times here. Boozys, and dances, and icecreams, and strawberries, and fresh bandannas. It's a grate place fur good livin', I tell yeou.

We've had an editur's supper, tew, where mayor Wood made a speech, and he's a nice pretty looking sort ov a man, I tell yeou, and so shall Greeley, tur as Mister Greeley ses in his paper. I spoke as the assistant local reporter's assistant or the Portland Courier, and dun a furst rate supper fur nuthin' and mean to rite an account of it in full.

But I must stop, tho' I hain't begun. This letter ain't very clear, but it's the best I can dean, the things is mightyly squabbled up deown here. Keep shaly on Douglas, and when yeou dew git the news, say I sed so, and hoorraz like fun. Your luvvin nephew till deth, BENJAMIN BOWNING Ed.

[BY TELEGRAPH.]

P.S.—Convention's adjourned—Hold on tur my letter—don't go fur to print it.

THE BALANCE OF TRADE.

FOR the first time in history money is dearer in London, England, than in New York. Five per cent. is the Bank minimum in London; here, it is not easy to place large sums on desirable security at five. The newspapers and many of the bankers have been puzzled by the phenomenon; it is, however, easily accounted for.

We have shipped to Great Britain since January 1, from this port alone, about $7,000,000 more produce of various kinds than we shipped during the corresponding period of 1859, and upward of $7,000,000 more than the average of previous years. Our shipments of cotton from Southern ports have been still more largely in excess of former years. On the other hand, our imports are less in excess of those of last year. The consequence is obvious: instead of having specie to remit to pay our debts, the course of exchange is, and has been for some time, really in favor of the United States, and money in New York is more abundant than it is in London.

Some of the papers argue that this is the first indication of a transfer of "financial centrality" from London to New York, and indulge in pleasing visions of a gorgeous future based upon that transfer. The realization of these hopes will largely depend on two movements: first, of the production of the precious metals in California and elsewhere, and secondly, the consumption of foreign luxuries by our people.

It seems to be generally expected that the yield of gold in California will not fall off, and that the mines have lately discovered in that State will add largely to its exports of produce. If these expectations be realized, the United States will be quite likely to become creditors of the world. Especially will the silver mines of Washoe exercise a potent influence on our commercial relations, if they prove as rich as is asserted. Silver is badly wanted in Europe to pay the balance due to China and India for the commodities imported from beyond the Cape. For some years Great Britain has been obliged to buy silver from France and Germany, paying for it in American and Australian gold, in order to effect settlements at Calcutta, Hong Kong, and Shanghai. Should the Washoe mines produce $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 a year of silver—as the Californians seem to expect they will—most of this would go direct from San Francisco to China, and New York would become the great clearing-house for the trade between Asia and the commercial nations. Instead of our payments of tea-buying bills on London to pay for their imports, as is now the case, the London tea merchants would pay for their cargoes by buying bills on New York—to be turned into silver at San Francisco. The effect of this upon the exchanges can readily be imagined.

But the real key to the future of this country will be found in the general consumption of foreign goods. We may produce twice as much as we do now; if we consume an equal or a greater amount of foreign luxuries, we shall be no richer than we are at present. This is a matter which comes home to every man, and which depends on the private expenditures of individuals. The dry-goods importers laugh at the newspaper critics who complain of overimportations. They say, and very justly, "We import what we can sell: we have sold to the jobbers our entire importation at prices which, on the average, are satisfactory to us; if we had more goods we could sell them: why expect us to order our orders when we can sell the goods at a profit?" To this reasoning there is no answer. The importers import enormously because they can sell to the jobbers; the jobbers increase their purchases because, per cent. per annum because they can increase their sales to the trade in like proportion; the trade increase their orders because they find that the public is ready to take an increased quantity of goods. So we come down from the Custom-house millions to the affairs of Brown and Smith, whose wives buy an extra silk dress or a cash cap as the strength of the prosperity which Brown and Smith happen to enjoy.

If any check is to be given to the importation of foreign goods, the attack must be made at the root of the evil. We must appeal to Brown and Smith as individuals, and ask them not to spend so much in foreign finery. So long as they are willing to buy it will be idle to expect any curtailment on the part of dealers, jobbers, or importers. If Brown and Smith persist in their extravagance, all the calculations and all the statistics in the world will not prevent the aggregate consumption of the country increasing fully as fast as the profits of Public Charities will meet him at every turn. If they examine the accounts of any of the institutions on Blackwell's Island—with the single exception of the Lunatic Asylum—they will see that are not permitted to have their swing—they will find him looming up in every column. If he were a modest man of ordinary habits, he might be tolerated. If he ate nothing but new-born babies, his gross tastes might be deplored in silence. But the rascal costs so much to feed; he eats so much veal and mutton, and fowl, and oysters, and molasses, and sugar, and tea; he drinks so much brandy, and Heidsieck, and sherry, and beer; he requires so many sheets, and yards of muslin, and flannel, and blanket, that really it becomes a question whether it would not be wise for the city to compromise with him, and get rid of him forever. The actuaries actuaries sends us a calculation which goes to show that this Alms-house Rat costs half a million a year to keep. Would he take two millions, and cry quits?

Mr. Simeon Draper, the new head of these Charities, will have to put the case to the Rat, and make the proposition. Mr. Draper has the reputation of a shrewd man, but we venture to say that the Rat will outwit him. He is as cunning an animal (see Buckland on Rats)—he has as many lives as cats—he is so firmly rooted in the Alms-house and its departments, that we are not sanguine of Mr. Draper's success. We are inclined to think that, even if the Rat himself be sacrificed, Mr. Draper will let the Rat's cousins and uncles and nephews continue to feed upon the city. We shall see when the accounts come in. Meanwhile, with the highest confidence in Mr. Draper's integrity, we don't believe he will scotch that Rat.

☞ OUR acknowledgments are due to Adams's Southern Express, and to many kind friends at Charleston, for the files sent to our editorial correspondent in that city during the Democratic Convention.

THE LOUNGER.

MANLY ARTS.

THE mild question of Pugilism was argued fully and decisively on the editorial columns of the last number of the Weekly. But now that the great event is over, and the public mind of two empires is comparatively at rest, we can more intelligently survey the field of so much gore and glory, and more justly estimate the invaluable advantages that have accrued to the cause of civilization, good morals, and humane heroism. While the gentle knights were fighting, the Saturday Review, a kind of Guy Livingstone among journals, an aristocratic "swell," informed mankind, and especially Uncle Sam, that "the battle of Farnborough is not a fit subject for a moral." Then Sayers and the Benicia Boy furnish at the present moment an example which deserves to be generally imitated." What a volley of admiring expletives the Saturday Review must have emitted on the day after the fight, when the great combatants, bleeding, fainting, and the heroic purpose for which the two gentlemen were preparing, when they furnished the high example, was accomplished! For if a man is so worthy of all praise when he is merely getting ready to break the nose, and rib, and lay open the cheek of his antagonist, how much more must he be when he has actually doing it! If he be great when he is merely moulding his arm into a vice for his opponent's ear, how much greater when that arm, encounter, may well say, with graceful complacency, "that nations without great qualities could not have brought together two men willing to pass through such an ordeal as the terrible fight of Tuesday." Sayers, having been born, as it appears, in Ireland, and Mr. Heenan, according to the excellent authority of (we believe) the same great journal, "a native, in the Troy district of the United States," it is indeed magnanimous in the Times to celebrate the glory of America and Ireland. But whatever the number of countries and races that may emulously claim the birth of these two heroes, it remains an incontestable fact that Mr. Heenan and Mr. Sayers, by striking each other with mawleys and bunches of fives upon the head, the nut, the cone, the knob, the cannister, the noddle, the mug, the knowledge-box; the nose, the muzzer, the mozer, the snuffer, the snitch, the nozzle, the mazzard; the eyes, the optics, the peepers; the mouth, the kisser, the whistler, the mivvey; thereby drawing the blood, the claret, the ruby, the crimson, the lamebrowed, the gravy; besides knocking the knocker off his pins, his pegs, his stumps, his timbers, and, finally, boring, fibbing, and sending each other to grass, have proved the "great qualities" of their countrymen, and established beyond question the humanity, the self-sacrifice, the refinement, the fraternal sympathy, the wise brain, the true heart, the grave persistent moderation, which are, indeed, the "great" qualities of nations.

And if any added proof of these qualities had been wanting, it would only have been at once found in the universal and profound interest excited in both countries by the prospect of the hideous and bloody mutilation of two human beings—an interest so indicative of "great qualities" that it inspired not a solitary effort to prevent the consummation, except that of some local magistrates who laid bail at two hundred and fifty dollars? The most generous will allow that the eager curiosity which drives thousands of people to a public execution does not more undeniably prove the "great qualities" of a nation than the keen zest with which the fight was expected and enjoyed.

But these are male still more potent, and the manliness of the Benicia Boy seems largely into still stronger relief by the rush of the mob which broke up the encounter. Mr. Heenan, of the Troy district, and not the head of Mr. Sayers, of Ireland, into chancery. That is fair, as the laws of the Prize Ring are expounded. Having that head in chancery, Mr. Heenan, by the rules of the institution which proves "great qualities" in nations, had the perfect right to punch it with his mawleys and his bunches of fives, and of course to exert the strength necessary to retain it in a proper position to operate feasibly upon it. If during that necessary exertion the proprietor of that head succumbed to the exigency of the situation and suffocated, it was his misfortune and the chance of war, so long as he was in the ring on the ground; but amid the serene and gratifying consciousness, as he caused to breathe, that he was in the very act of proving "great qualities" in his nation, as the London Times would not fail duly to set forth.

This was not the result. The mob, intent upon fair play, wanting their favorite every chance fixed. But so subtle is the virtue of the institution that it is all the same, and "great qualities," including, of course, love of fair play, remain proved as before.

At the games of Greece Herodotus recited his history, poets sang, and philosophers discoursed, making the "manly qualities" illustrious. And twenty centuries ago, John Hampden, Champion of the Commons, quietly died a brutal despotism, and the "great qualities" of his country drove the English king—at Valley Forge the naked feet of American soldiers marked the "great qualities" of a young nation in blood upon the frozen snow—in an unknown or more enlightened day two men, without a quarrel, having known each other only like wild beasts as possible, fight with more than brutal ferocity, and are borne blind, giddy, bloody, mutilated out of human semblance, from the field, amid the applause and excited attention of the two great Christian civilized nations of the world, having thereby proved the "great qualities" of these nations.

How truly sang the sacred Psalmist, "Thou madest him a little lower than the angels."

THE NEWS.

THE LOUNGER.

WHEN the savage king broke the thermometer because the mercury went too high or too low, and would not obey his will, he found that in fact the weather; the temperature remained precisely the same as before. In like manner, an editor may ignore the news, and omit to allude to it, but he does not annihilate the news by so doing: he merely destroys the value of his paper.

For a two-pages—a journal which professes to tell what interests the public mind—must print the news. That news may be very disagreeable; but what then? It is the melancholy office of chronicling and disgusting that members of Congress should give each other the lie, and make speeches when they are drunk; that they do, in fact, behave as brutes, and whoever wishes to read the news must encounter that. It is very disgusting when your peckstones are in full play, in the street, that the brats a frost should blight their promise. Do you expect to have any more peaches because you break your thermometer?

A journal is a meter of the times. You look at it, and you see precisely the present point of interest, and opinion how bright or how low civilization is rising or falling. It may indicate the zero of degradation, or the summer heat of Christian sympathy. But it marks the point irrespective of you and of your acts. You may tear it to pieces, you may tear it, or you may let your eyes run. But the world will not be better because you are angry at being told that it is bad. Except, indeed, as it incites you to hurl forward your own little mite you owe to consulting your meter, not to contenuing it. If in a time of infection people should agree never to latray when they had the plague-spot, because it was such an unpleasant business, the spirit of the pestilence would chuckle with delight as he swept away his victims. If our civilization has plague-spots, do you suppose we shall help the matter by decorously covering them up? A journal of news which should refrain from speaking of the central subject of public interest, whatever it were, would be ridiculed and deserve the failure which would infallibly overtake it. And to speak of that news intelligently to its readers, it must tell them what it is talking about. In other words, it must relate the news as it really stands.

Every wise man wants to deal with the facts of the case. If there has been a brutal fight, how can its brutality be so impressed upon the mind of the public as to bring the truth of the matter home? It slips over a general statement as it does over all crime and sin in the general. It is the individual fact and arrest and arrests the reader. That there are rats in the Bellevue Hospital is that something over which he shakes his head. That the rats in Bellevue Hospital, upon a specified night, half-devoured the two-born infant of Mary Connor, is something that shakes his heart, and stirs him up to help extirpate all rats, of the brute or human kinds, from the public property. In like manner, if we had that there was a gaping hole in England in which the result was undecided, he sighs vaguely over the brutality of such matters? but if he reads that with a fearful shock Wyvern sat Heenan's left cheek open and blinded one eye, while the blood spirted out from an immense gash," he exerted to make an active protest in the name of decency and humanity, and feels quite strong enough to tell his neighbor, who has bet twenty dollars on the fight, what he thinks of the brutalizing process as applied to human beings.

This doctrine has been often laid down in this paper, and last week the "daily effusion" of a graph was a brief and forcible statement of it. But the Lounger has heard so much censure of the conduct of "respectable papers" in alluding to the fight or describing it, that he wishes to remind the reader of the principle upon which the intelligent conduct of a journal which professes to treat matters of current public interest must rest. It does not follow that every thing which happens every where is to be described in all its details—for every thing that happens is not news; and the editor's discretion will decree the line at which public morality and decency will arrest his presentation of the news. He may justly describe the details of a battle, but he will decree where he stops. For one, the Lounger will frankly confess that one such picture as that of the French soldier sitting starving in the snow, with the head of his frozen son in his breast, is a more powerful argument than many mild sermons upon the horrors of war; and his detestation of a prize-fight is a hundred fold intenser since he saw some fearfully vivid representations of the actual personal mutilation of such an exhibition. We do not get out of difficulties by shuddering at them, but by looking them squarely in the face. A prize-fight may be a handsome sight, but the point is that millions of people are interested in it. Let every man, then, in every way, comprehend what a prize-fight is, and it will the sooner disappear from our horizon.

WAIFS.

THERE two poems, which have never been published, need no other introduction than the names of their authors. Mr. Longfellow and Emily Bronte, Charlotte's sister, and known as Ellis Bell. Irving's verses have the graceful pensiveness of a companion piece. Moore; and Emily Bronte's has a gloom which pervaded all the sisters wrote, and which hung, like a fateful cloud, over their lives.

WRITTEN IN THE DEPENDENT ALBUM.

THEN paused as the votive throng,
That fondly seek this fairy shrine,
And pay the tribute of a song
Where worth and loveliness combine—

What boots that I, a vagrant wight
From clime to clime still wandering on,
Upon this page should write my name?
—Who'll think of me when I am gone?

So plow the wave, and tow the sand;
Turow seed to every wind that blows;
Along the highway strew thy hand,
And fatten on the crop that grows.

For even thus the man that roams
On landless hearts his feeling spends;
Strange tenant of a thousand homes,
And friendless, with ten thousand friends!

Yet here, for once, I'll leave a trace,
To ask in aftertime a thought;
To say that here a resting-place
My wayward heart has fondly sought.

So the poor pilgrim heedless strays,
Unmoved, through many a region fair;
But at some solemn hill strikes gaze,
To it that he has worshiped there.

THE OUTCAST MOTHER.

TV'S seen this doll in July's shine,
As lovely as an angel's dream;
Above—Heaven's depth of blue divine,
Around—the evening's golden beam.

I've seen the purple heather-bell
Look soft among a thicket's stem;
And, oh! I've known such music swell—
Such soft dreams wake these pores know.

So soft, yet so intensely felt;
So low, yet so distinctly heard;
My heart's wealth pause, joy upon would melt,
And tears would dew the green heath-sward.

I'd linger here a summer day,
Nor care how fast the hours flew by;
Nor mark the man's departing way,
Smile sadly from the dark'ning sky.

Then, then, I might have laid me down,
And dreamed my step would gentle be;
I might have left thee, darling one,
And thought thy God was guarding thee!

But now there is no wand'ring glow,
No gleam to say that God is nigh!
And coldly spreads the couch of snow,
And harshly sounds thy lullaby.

Forests of heather, dark and long,
Wave their brown branching arms above;
And they must soothe thee with their song,
And they must shield my child of love.

Alas! the flakes are heavily falling.
They cover fast each guardian crest;
And chilly white their mantles clothing—
Thy frozen limbs and freezing breast.

Wakes up the storm more madly wild,
The mountain drifts are piled on high:
Farewell, smitten'd, unfriended child,
I can not bear to watch thee die!

HAWORTH, July 12, 1838.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

OF the recent Irish trials the counsel was desirous to obtain a full admission from one of the witness. Upon him, having himself been one of the sworn members of the League, the bar had been trying to rely on the others. Having vainly labored for nearly an hour to get him to say, "I confess, now, Sir, that you had some direct from there men to Dublin, on Monday last?"—"I did so," promptly answered the witness. "Well, Sir, that is direct, at all events. Now, Sir, will you tell me, in as brief a way as possible, the motive brought you here?"—"In fees-motive, to be sure."

The following story gives a lively idea of how the Russian system Poland. A few days ago, a church in the forest, and the latter robbed him of his horse. On returning to the inn he began to harangue the people on the spot in command, who was cleft when struck we shall see, proved to be a most rigorous disciplinarian. The Cossacks were paraded, the robber was pointed out, when, with the utmost self-confidence, declared that he had found the horse. "How?" replied the Jew. "I was upon his back, and he threw me off." "Impossible," answered you, too; but having no use for a Jew, I did not keep you." The excuse was admitted, and the poor Israelite was dismissed without a penny.

Apropos of the recent mill between Sayers and Heenan, the rage for muscular exercise, and a knowledge of the science of getting out of the way of a blow, owes its the shoulder-hitters by perfection. The professors of the "march of intellect" have taught the young idea how to shoot from the young bloods about town, in the way of fers de combat, that the "mill" of the day is a thing of the past without the gauf gve pen is shown up by the experience of Billy Morgan, who, when he was matched to fight Young Wenham was ever lounged in the lobbies at the Parliament of Arts, or walked down Pall Mall, and the German in Mr. Gossipingo's brown stout frock or jacket, and Mr. Bowie, always in a blue coat with bright arms, black and tans, and the F. R. that is the perfection at a private dinner, they devoted their whole time to the cultivation of fine development of the chest, and improvement generally in the service of fighting and battling and race. They devoted themselves to that celebrated master of the art, "Dublin Pitchcap," who taught them the fifteen dollars for twelve lessons, (unanimity in advance,) and Billy and his friend Wenham, who had also lessons went of beautifully: Billy and him dreamed elocutionarily "somber-hide," "Bow-wow," "Bah," and all the little scientific dodges. Brown, Sayers, Morrissey, Tom Bowe, and others, were "done" by the new professional words: their merits freely canvassed, to the great delight and admiration of the members of the Club.

—Club. Our amateurs attended their second lesson. The philosophical exercises of "Bob and Carry" succeeded, and effect, especially the effect, in a theoretical diagram, in his own mind. Dublin Pitchcap, "Bob and Carry," counter-hits, and hits not exactly described, over the principles, and finished with a practical exhibition of clarity, saying nothing of aches and pains (besides, somebody "dropped" last week.) Billy and Wenham "put in" the mirors of the manly art did not come to the scratch when time was called; they appeared to forget to "time" and "toe-the-scratch" Notwithstanding the hint past in advance. Sam told: "my lessons each, thirty dollars." Billy and Wenham paid them! When sam this he needn't mind. We don't mind—Ed. Sporting Life and Times.

Some time in January last, on one of us "splendid Mississippi steamers," a couple of gentlemen commenced a political discussion which soon ran into Secession, Disunion, and the other Southern "Opposition." Of course the Dissolution Territorial Question was soon in its boiling point. After a considerable time was consumed in explaining the position of the Northern Democracy, our Opposition friend demanded "the exact difference between Mr. Douglas and the Administration on the question in the Territories."

"My friend," said Administration, "the difference is no DIFFERENCE."

"I don't" exclaimed the other, interrupting, in a very loud tone, and raising himself from his chair, extending both hands excitedly, "I don't see it at all, nor you for it! Yes, Sir, they can get a patent for thing them keys!"

The company laughed immediately: and "Administration" made his escape in the general confusion.

A SENTIMENT.

About a dozen years ago a respectable Irish military company was organized in Lowell, Massachusetts, and named the "Jackson Musketeers." During its brief existence they met to spend a social evening. After the supper was finished the usual sentiments were called up to speak, and responded as follows:

"Mr. President, I am a tailor, maker, but will give you a sentiment—The Jackson Musketeers! equal to none: the last on the field, and the first to leave it!"

It is needless to add that he intended to say that the company was equaled by none; the first on the field, and the last to leave.

Roberts, the tragedian, recently filled an engagement at a theatre in the "interior." His Richard the Third was witnessed by one of the critics, native of that region, who gave it a notice which will convey a conception of the character was good—very good indeed; but his form was not suited to playing the part of a hero. He was not large enough; something was the matter with one of his legs: and he was a little inappropriate.

"I was once in the 'tea and sugar line,' and among the 'boys' about the establishment was one about twelve years of age, and a little 'off' in the upper story—not into the mysteries of our trade, he being fresh from the Emerald Isle. I found it rather a difficult task. I had been busy for some time in getting the word 'hogshead' impregnated into his limited comprehension, and had at last succeeded, when my eyes resting for a moment upon a barrel, I called him with the question, 'What is that?' He stared for a minute from the bogshead to the barrel, when, with a grin of delight that lighted up his features, he replied, very promptly, 'It's a pighead!'"

"'A MR'ALS NIGGER.'—My friend asked Anthony Bess, a negro superannuated on the Virginia farm, if he came to get free. 'Why, Massa Vincent, my health was berry bad when I was in bondage. I couldn't do so hard of work; I was berry feeble: 'twas jes so much as I could do to hoe my own garden and eat de corn; and de Missus what owned me so dat I was a mis'able nigger—one of de mis'ablest kind, dat is, mis'ably 'fectionate to her. I mis'able nigger, and I ain't worth nothing, and I think you'd better let me, I'm willing to work for nothing.' So Massa Vincent, I was such a poor nigger that Massa Spread to sell me for 'bout a hundred dollars, but I'se try to work and earn de money to pay her, and I did; and my health has been gittin' better ebber since, and I spucks I made 'bout nine hundred dollars dat time out of dat nigger. Wah! wah! Massa Vincent!"

"To a person were once disputing so loudly on the subject of religion, that they awoke a big dog which had been sleeping on the hearth before them, and he forth, with barked most furiously. An old divine present, who had been quietly sipping his tea while the disputants were talking, gave the dog a kick, and exclaimed, "Hold your tongue, you silly brute! you know no more about it than they do."

GETTING AN INVITATION.—REV. MR. S—— had traveled far to preach to a congregation at ——. After the sermon he was invited to accompany the deacons one of the brethren to invite him home to dinner. In this he was disappointed. One and another departed, until the house was almost as empty as the minister's stomach. Hammering away, however, he walked up to an elderly gentleman, and gravely said, "Will you go home with me to-day for dinner, brother?" "Where do you live?" "About twenty miles from this, Sir." "No," said the man, "I cannot go, you must go home with me." "Thank you—I will, cheerfully." After that time the minister was no more troubled in that place about dinner.

Paddy Malone went to his priest and asked him, "What is a miracle, your reverence?" The priest, after his several questions, and found he had been to the river to get some blessed strange fish. He was perplexed mad, and telling Paddy to stand out before him, he gave him a severe cuffing on each side of the ears.

"Did it hurt you?" asked the priest.

"To be sure it did, your honor."

"And it would have been a miracle if it didn't," replied his reverence, to which Paddy walked away answered, but not satisfied.

While spending the summer, several years ago, at a watering-place, I met with a charming little girl, who amused by a story that was told of a little boy, Dannie Lee, who had been spending a few days in the summer there with his parents.

His nurse had threatened him, and little Dannie had quietly snugged himself in bed, when his mother, who was sick, came for a moment to sit and hear his prayers. Upon kneeling down and beginning to repeat "Our Father," he suddenly stopped, and jumping up, said, "Sarah, there's no use in saying my prayers here: there is no hell in this house." "Why, my child, what do think many an elder person than Dannie at that gay and fashion-ridden watering-place?

A reverend gentleman, who lives less than a thousand miles from "somewhere," has a daughter now in her fifth year. Having, a few days ago, reproved something his sermon for the coming Sunday, he was interrupted by the entrance of his little girl, who came in, dressed with an anxious, inquiring look, said, "Papa, what was Sarah's name in the Bible?" "Sarah, my dear." "I know she was a Miss Jethro, papa, but what was her other name?"

In a quiet country village in the Far West of Canada there lives a family which rejoices in the high-sounding and aristocratic name of Smith. The members of this family also at one time rejoiced in the habit of coming to church at the last moment possible; and as their pew is situated near to the chancel, they, on entering, attracted considerable attention, and marred the attention of the congregation. On one occasion the first being appointed to read the Lessons, Genesis, commencing the evening of Israel by Balaam. Just as the clergyman had read the words "Let me die the death of these holocks," seven of the Bullock family entered, and marched up the aisle to their seats. The unavoidable consequence was, as may have been supposed, an audible titter throughout the church. The unfortunate thing in which even the clergyman could with difficulty refrain. It is almost needless to add, the unfortunate members of a strange coincidence have, since that Sunday, been more punctual in their attendance.

"We have on our farm an old Dutchman called Jake, who is quite an original. A month or so ago he went up to the city, and on his return I asked him if he had seen with him, which he valued very highly. But he had not seen him, having missed the train and coming back. When he landed we asked him what brought him back so soon. "Ye yes, ven I got to de depot, I had about a hour to wait, he shanked mine pod and knocks de tun overboard, and I says to myself, I vill not vait vor dot dog to catch it." "Why, how do you know the exact spot, Jake?" "Oh, I got him. Jees before I left de city I vent down to de dock, looked, and found a big scratch in the bottom of the boat just where I knew the tog would vent overboard. However, Jakes never found the gun, and declares the tide took it out to sea."

DRAWING AN INFERENCE.—A young clergyman who had delivered a discourse in the place of an aged brother minister, received the opinion of the latter respecting it. "Oh!" said he, plainly, "many of the words you used were above the comprehension of your hearers: thee, for instance, the word 'inference:' perhaps one half of the congregation did not know its meaning." "Inference! inference!" exclaimed the other; "why, every one understands that word. I think you will find it not so. There's my clerk, now: he prides himself upon his intelligence, and is a very intelligent. We will try him. Zechariah, my brother here wishes you to draw an inference from what you do?" "Why, I pretty strong; but Johnnadab, the coachman, is stronger than I. I'll ask him." Johnnadab was sent on the errands to look after the coachman, and returned: "Johnnadab says he never tried to draw an inference. Sir; but he reckons his horses can draw any thing that has been drawn yet."

One day last summer the passengers by a fancy-cake bakery in a Western town were mystified by the following card, hung as a bill of fare:

WEDDING CAKE.

Every person passing stopped to read it, and wondered at its meaning.

In about a week it was altered by the scratching out of one of the E's, and it now tells the passer-by that they have WEDDING CAKE to sell.

MY AQUARIUM.

THE aquarium, which but a few years ago was comparatively unknown in this country, has now become one of the popular amusements of the day and at the present time drawing near when the materials for stocking an aquarium may best be procured, a few hints, derived from my own experience, may be useful to those who are to the young naturalist embarking upon his first scientific voyage.

I shall take the salt-water aquarium for my subject, as in that only have my observations been made; and for many reasons the salt possesses a superiority over the fresh-water aquarium, which any one living in the vicinity of New York or Brooklyn, or any other of our maritime cities, can not but observe.

My aquarium was commenced at Newport during the summer of eighteen hundred and fifty-eight, and at the present moment it is as clear as the purest crystal, the water having been changed but twice, previous to and after its transportation to the city.

One remark is needful for the young beginner—that is, Be cautious. Do not be too hasty in stocking your aquarium; wait a few days for your young plants to be fairly domiciled in their new habitation, or you will meet with the same ill-fortune which attended me upon my first attempt to naturalize the finny monsters of the deep.

Having procured a large China foot-tub, and cleansing the white sand and stones from their impurities, I proceeded to stock my aquarium. First, I dropped a few whelks or snails, to the number of fourteen, then some shrimps, half a dozen fish, and innumerable quantities of star-fish, which I had picked up on the rocks. With this medley it was transported to my room with great satisfaction; which, alas! did not last long, for the next morning the water had lost its crystalline purity, and by night a peculiar phosphorescent gleam might be observed as agitating the tank.

The morning, alas! revealed a deplorable state of things. There were my poor fishes lying dead on the surface of the water, the star-fish, with their feeble tiny fingers, lying listlessly at the bottom; and the whole tank seeming putrefaction as rapidly as possible in the hot temperature of a summer's day. So I consigned my poor pets to the ash-heap, and set about preparing for another. This time I procured a tank, and, assisted by the "Aquarium" text-book by Gosse, and with hints from a young lady, whose writings on this subject have been read and admired by many—I succeeded at last in establishing my aquarium upon a firm basis.

As before, I cleansed the stones and gravel from their impurities, and having arranged my rockwork, I poured in the water, drawn at high-tide, and filled about several quarts. A few plants of sea-lettuce, ulva latissima, and two or three clumps of corallina officinalis, constituted the marine shrubbery of the aquarium; it was then left for three days at rest.

At the end of that time a few snails and soldier-crabs were added, then a number of sea-anemones; and thus adding two or three specimens daily, until my aquarium consisted of about forty inmates, appeared to be happy and satisfied with their new abode.

It is not for me to designate the numerous species of plants and animals which thrive and increase in an aquarium. Many of these are not immediately accessible to the city's youth; but, doubtless, the young naturalist, with a little industry, will soon slide that will gladly transmit to him these species which he is unable to procure.

In a tin pail, filled with fresh water and fresh seaweed, I have preserved specimens for three or four days. They were, however, of the lower class of animals like star-fish and sea air. Fish will not live long in a confined state.

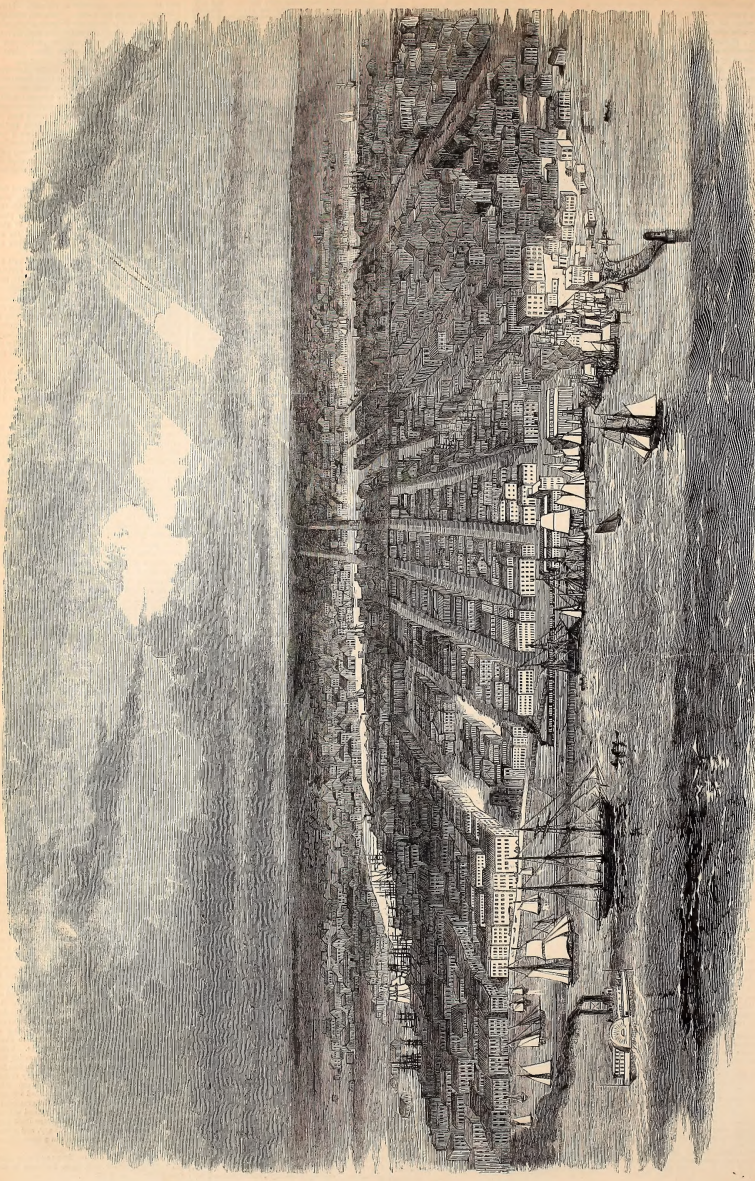
Having first procured your tank, and carefully washed it, let it remain undisturbed, and then attend to the depth of one inch. In the arrangement of the rock-work your own taste is the best guide. Any pure protozoa, with the various species of stones and shells covered with moss, is preferred; and by others the arch, or stones, placed in such a manner as to form an arch, is considered the most picturesque and the sluggish eel love to congregate.

Specimens of ulva latissima can be collected on New York Bay, and Long Island Sound, or purchased from Brooklyn. The pleasant shores of Bay Ridge furnish innumerable quantities of tuccinne or snails, and Hallet's Point, the shores of the aquarium. Here also have I found the serpula, with its plumed coronet, the hairy horse-shoe, and one or two small specimens of the flat-fish or flounder. Shrimps can be procured at any fish-market, and a small pond on Third Street, near to the foot of Third Street, Brooklyn, will furnish you with sticklebacks.

The finest actinine I have ever procured in the vicinity of New York were at Hallet's Point, near the first landing; and although I have seen specimens of fine ones on the piers at the various ferries, I have never had the good fortune to procure one.

Thus, with but little expense and much pleasure, one may have in an aquarium what can be procured; and the rocks and sea-weed, which were looked on with disgust, will shine with undiscovered beauties when placed in your miniature ocean.

THE CITY OF CHICAGO, ILL.



WE give on the next page a picture of the city of Chicago, Illinois, where the Republican Nominating Convention will be held on 16th inst.

Chicago is the youngest of our great cities, and the most promising. Though it was only organized as a town in 1833, with 28 voters, it has a population at present of 120,000, and is the largest primary grain dépôt in the world.

The first white men who visited the site on which Chicago now stands were Father Marquette and his party, who encamped there in the winter of 1673–5. The United States built a fort there—called Fort Dearborn—in 1804. It was evacuated in 1814, and many of the garrison massacred by the Indians close to the walls. After the war the fort was reoccupied.

Chicago has been built up by railroads and the trade in produce. The Illinois and Michigan Canal, which was finished in connection with the first impetus to the city, which then contained 20,000 inhabitants. In 1850 there were 49 miles of railroad centering in Chicago; the system comprising upward of 4000 miles of road. This told directly on the population, which, from 28,200 in 1850, rose to 60,652 in 1855, 83,452 in 1856, 109,000 in 1856, 120,000 in 1858, and probably 140,000 or 150,000 now. The city became the focus for the grain and produce trade of Illinois, Iowa, and the other Far Western States. Its people, then whom the country contains none more enterprising or more energetic, have not been content to avail themselves of their natural advantages. They have spent millions of money in improving the channels of trade, in establishing new feeders for their railroads, in building an inland navy of immense steamers, and they have made the city the centre and focus of the great trunk railroads which connect the Atlantic States with the Mississippi valley. The Chicago grannies (of which we published two engravings in a recent number) are the greatest in the world; the Chicago hotels rank second only to those of New York; the city of Chicago itself presents evidences of wealth, and luxury, and splendor which no one expects to meet in a town scarcely a quarter of a century old.

We congratulate the Republicans on the hospitable treatment which is in store for them in the Queen City of the West.

THE CITY OF CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, WHERE THE REPUBLICAN NOMINATING CONVENTION WILL MEET ON MAY 16, 1860.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC., ETC.

THE HOUSEKEEPER'S NARRATIVE CONTINUED.

THE next event that occurred was of so singular a nature that it might have caused me a feeling of superstitious surprise, if my mind had not been fortified by principle against any pagan weakness of that sort. The uneasy sense of something wrong in the family, which had made me wish myself away from Blackwater Park, was actually followed, strange to say, by my departure from the house. It is true that my absence was for a temporary period only; but the coincidence was, in my opinion, not the less remarkable on that account.

My departure took place under the following circumstances.

On the day when the servants all left I was again sent for to see Sir Percival. The undeserved slur which he had cast on my management of the household did not, I am happy to say, prevent me from returning good for evil to the best of my ability, by complying with his request as readily and respectfully as ever. I cost me a struggle with that fallen nature which we all share in common before I could suppress my feelings. Being accustomed to self-discipline, I accomplished the sacrifice.

I found Sir Percival and Count Fosco sitting together again. On this occasion his lordship resumed present at the interview, and assisted in the development of Sir Percival's views.

The subject to which they now requested my attention related to the healthy change of air by which we all hoped that Miss Halcombe and Lady Clyde might soon be enabled to profit. Sir Percival mentioned that both the ladies would probably spend the autumn (by invitation of Frederick Fairlie, Esquire) at Limmeridge House, Cumberland. But before they went there, it was his opinion, confirmed by Count Fosco (who here took up the conversation and continued it to the end), that they would benefit by a short residence first in the genial climate of Torquay. The great object, therefore, was to engage lodgings at that place affording all the comforts and advantages of which they stood in need; and the great difficulty was to find an experienced person capable of choosing the sort of residence which they wanted. In this emergency the Count begged to inquire, on Sir Percival's behalf, whether I would object to give the ladies the benefit of my assistance by proceeding myself to Torquay in their interests.

It was impossible for a person in my situation to meet any proposal made in these terms with a positive objection.

I could only venture to represent the serious inconvenience of my leaving Blackwater Park in the extraordinary absence of all the in-door servants with the one exception of Margaret Porcher. But Sir Percival and his lordship declared that they were both willing to put up with inconvenience for the sake of the invalids. I next respectfully suggested writing to an agent at Torquay; but I was met here by being reminded of the imprudence of taking lodgings without first seeing them. I was also informed that the Countess (who would otherwise have gone to Devonshire herself) could not, in Lady Clyde's present condition, leave her niece; and that Sir Percival and the Count had business to transact together which would oblige them to remain at Blackwater Park. In short, it was clearly shown me that if I did not undertake the errand no one else could be trusted with it. Under these circumstances I could only inform Sir Percival that my services were at the disposal of Miss Halcombe and Lady Clyde.

It was thereupon arranged that I should leave the next morning, that I should occupy the day after in examining all the most convenient houses in Torquay, and that I should return, with my report, on the third day. A memorandum was written for me by his lordship, stating the various requisites which the place I was sent to take must be found to possess; and a note of the pecuniary limit assigned to me was added by Sir Percival.

My own idea, on reading over these instructions, was, that no such residence as I saw described could be found at any watering-place in England; and that, even if it could by chance be discovered, it would certainly not be parted with for any period on such terms as I was permitted to offer. I hinted at these difficulties to both the gentlemen, but Sir Percival (who understook to answer me) did not appear to feel them. It was not for me to dispute the question. I said no more; but I felt a very strong conviction that the business on which I was sent away was so beset by difficulties that my errand was almost hopeless at starting.

Before I left I took care to satisfy myself that Miss Halcombe was going on favorably.

There was a painful expression of anxiety in her face which made me fear that her mind on first recovering itself was not at ease. But she was evidently strengthening more rapidly than I could have ventured to anticipate; and she was able to send kind messages to Lady Clyde's child, who was fast getting well, and entreating her ladyship not to exert herself again too soon. I left her in charge of Mrs. Rubelle, who was still as quietly independent of every one else in the house as ever. When I knocked at Lady Clyde's door, before going away, I was told that she was still sadly weak and depressed; my informant being the Countess, who was then keeping her company in her room. Sir Percival and the Count were waiting in the road in the lodge as I was driven by in the chaise. I bowed to them, and quitted the house with not a living soul left in the servants' offices but Margaret Porcher.

Every one must feel what I have felt myself since that time, that these circumstances were more than unusual—they were almost suspicious. Let me, however, say again, that it was impossible for me, in my dependent position, to act otherwise than I did.

The result of my errand at Torquay was exactly what I had foreseen. No such lodgings as I was instructed to take could be found in the whole place; and the terms I was permitted to give were much too low for the smallest of which if had been able to discover what I wanted. I returned to Blackwater Park on the third day, and informed Sir Percival, who met me at the door, that my journey had been taken in vain. He seemed much disappointed with some other subject to care about the failure of my errand, and his first words informed me that even in the short time of my absence a most remarkable change had taken place in the house.

I was not made aware of the motive for this sudden departure. I only heard that since the Count had been very particular in leaving the kind compliments for me. When I ventured on asking Sir Percival if Miss Halcombe or Clyde had any one to attend to her comforts in the absence of the Countess, he replied that she had Margaret Porcher to wait on her. He added that a woman from the village had been sent for to do the work down stairs.

The answer which shocked me—there was such a glaring impropriety in permitting an under-housemaid to fill the place of confidential attendant on a lady—that I left the matters at once, and met Margaret on the bedroom landing. Her services had not been required (naturally enough), in the circumstances; she evidently recovered that morning to be able to leave her bed. I asked after Miss Halcombe, but I was answered in a sloenling sulky way, which left me no wiser than I was before. I did not choose to renew the question, and perhaps provoke an impertinent reply. It was in every respect more becoming to a person in my position that I present myself immediately in Lady Glyde's room.

I found that her ladyship had certainly gained in strength since the last interview. Although still sadly weak and nervous, she was able to get up without assistance, and to walk slowly across her room, feeling no worse effect from the exertion than a slight sensation of fatigue. She had been made a little anxious that morning about Miss Halcombe, having herself received no news of her from any one. I thought this seemed to imply a blamable want of attention on the part of Mrs. Rubelle; but I said nothing, and remained with Lady Glyde to assist her to dress. When she was ready we both left the room together to go to Miss Halcombe.

We were stopped in the passage by the appearance of Sir Percival. He looked as if he had been purposely waiting there for us.

"Where are you going?" he said to Lady Clyde.

"To Marian's room," she answered.

"It may spare you a disappointment," remarked Sir Percival, "if I tell you at once that you will not find her there."

"Not find her there!"

"No. She left the house yesterday morning with Fosco and his wife."

Lady Clyde was not strong enough to bear the surprise of this extraordinary statement. She turned fearfully pale, and leaned back against the wall, looking at her husband in dead silence.

I was so astonished myself that I hardly knew what to say. I asked Sir Percival if he really meant that Miss Halcombe had left Blackwater Park.

"I certainly mean it," he answered.

"In her state, Sir Percival! Without mentioning her intentions to Lady Clyde!"

Before he could reply her ladyship recovered herself a little and spoke.

"Impossible!" she cried out, in a loud, frightened manner, taking a step or two forward from the wall. "Where was the Doctor, where was Mr. Dawson when Marian went away?"

"Mr. Dawson wasn't wanted, as there's here," said Sir Percival. "He left of his own accord, which is enough of itself to show that she was strong enough to travel. How you stare! If you don't believe she has gone, look for yourself. Open her room door, and all the other room doors, if you like."

She took him at his word, and I followed her. There was no one in Miss Halcombe's room but Margaret Porcher, who was busy setting it to rights. There was no one in the spare rooms or the dressing-rooms when we looked into them afterward. Sir Percival still waited for us in the passage. As we were leaving the last room that we had examined Lady Glyde whispered, "Don't go, Mrs. Michelson! don't leave me, for God's sake!" Before I could say any thing in return she was out again in the passage speaking to her husband.

"What does it mean, Sir Percival? I insist —I beg and pray you will tell me what it means!"

"It means," he answered, "that Miss Halcombe was strong enough yesterday morning to sit up and be dressed, and that she insisted on taking advantage of Fosco's going to London to go there too."

"To London!"

"Yes—on her way to Limmeridge."

Lady Glyde turned and appealed to me.

"You saw Miss Halcombe last," she said. "Did you think she looked fit to travel in four-and-twenty hours afterward?"

"Not in my opinion, your ladyship."

Sir Percival, on his side, instantly turned and appealed to me.

"Before you went away," he said, "did you, or did you not, tell the nurse that Miss Halcombe looked much stronger and better?"

"I certainly made the remark, Sir Percival."

He addressed her ladyship again the moment I offered that reply.

"Set one of Mrs. Michelson's opinions fairly against another," he said, "and try to be reasonable about a perfectly plain matter. If she had not been well enough to be moved do you think I would have risked letting her go? She has got three competent people to look after her—Fosco, and your aunt, and Mrs. Rubelle, who went away with them expressly for that purpose. They took a whole carriage yesterday, and made a bed for her on the seat, in case she felt tired. To-day, Fosco and Mrs. Rubelle go on with her themselves to Cumberland—"

"Why does Marian go to Limmeridge and leave me here by myself?" said her ladyship, interrupting Sir Percival.

"Because Limmeridge won't receive you till he has seen your sister first," he replied. "Have you forgotten the letter he wrote to her at the time of your illness? It was shown to you; you read it yourself; and you ought to remember it."

"I do remember it."

"If you do, why should you be surprised at her leaving you? You want to be back at Limmeridge, and she has gone there to get your uncle's leave for you on his own terms."

Poor Lady Clyde's eyes filled with tears.

"Marian never left me before," she said, "without bidding me good-by."

"She would have bid you good-by this time," returned Sir Percival, "if she had not been afraid of herself and of you. She knew you would cry over her; she knew you would distress her by crying. Do you want to make any more objections? If you do, you must come down stairs and put your questions in the dining-room. These worries upset me. I want a glass of wine."

He left us suddenly.

His manner all through this strange conversation had been very unlike what it usually was. He seemed to be almost as nervous and flustered, every now and then, as his lady herself. I should never have supposed that his health had been so delicate, or his composure so easy to upset.

I tried to prevail on Lady Glyde to go back to her room, but it was useless. She stopped in the passage, with the look of a woman whose mind was panic-stricken.

"Something has happened to my sister!" she said.

"Remember, my lady, what surprising energy there is in Miss Halcombe," I suggested. "She might well make an effort which other ladies in her situation would be unfit for. I hope and believe there is nothing wrong.—I do indeed."

"I must follow Marian!" said her ladyship, with the same panic-stricken look. "I must go where she has gone; I must see that she is alive and well with my own eyes. Come! come down with me to Sir Percival!"

I hesitated, fearing that my presence might be considered an intrusion. I attempted to represent this to her ladyship; but she was deaf to me. She held my arm fast enough to force me to go down stairs with her, and still clung to me with all the little strength she had at the moment when I opened the dining-room door.

Sir Percival was sitting at the table with a decanter of wine before him. He raised the glass to his lips as we went in, and drained it at a draught. Seeing that he looked at me angrily when he put it down again, I attempted to make some apology for my accidental presence in the room.

"Do you suppose there is any secrets going on here?" he broke out, indignantly; "there are none—there is nothing underhand; nothing kept from you or from any one." After speaking those strange words, loudly and sternly, he filled himself another glass of wine, and asked Lady Glyde what she wanted of him.

"If my sister is fit to travel I am fit to travel," said her ladyship, with more firmness than she had yet shown. "I come to beg you will make allowances for my anxiety about Marian, and let me follow her at once by the afternoon train."

"You must wait till to-morrow," replied Sir Percival; "and then, if you don't hear to the contrary, you can go. I don't suppose you are at all likely to hear to the contrary—as I shall write to Fosco by to-night's post."

He said these last words hastily filling his glass up to the light, and looking at the wine in it instead of at Lady Glyde. Indeed he never once looked at her throughout the conversation. Such a singular want of good-breeding in a gentleman of his rank impressed me, I own, very painfully.

"Why should you write to Count Fosco?" she asked, in extreme surprise.

"To tell him to expect you by the mid-day train," said Sir Percival. "He will meet you at the station, when you get to London, and take you on to sleep at your aunt's in St. John's Wood."

Lady Glyde's hand began to tremble violently round my arm—why, I could not imagine.

"There is no necessity for Count Fosco to meet me," she said. "I would rather not stay in London to sleep."

"You must. You can't take the whole journey to Cumberland in one day. You must rest a night in London—and I don't choose you to go by yourself to a hotel. Fosco made the offer to your uncle to give you house-room on the way down, and your uncle has accepted it. Here! here is a letter from him addressed to yourself. I ought to have sent it up this morning, but I forgot. Read it, and see what Mr. Fairlie himself says to you."

Lady Glyde looked at the letter for a moment, and then placed it in my hands.

"Read it," she said, faintly. "I don't know what is the matter with me. I can't read it myself."

It was a note of only three lines—so short and so careless that it quite struck me. If I remember correctly it contained no more than these words:

"DEAREST LAURA,—Please come whenever you like. Break the journey by sleeping at your aunt's house. Grieved to hear of dear Marian's illness. Affectionately yours,

"FREDERICK FAIRLIE."

"I would rather not go there—I would rather not stay a night in London," said her ladyship, breaking out suddenly with those words before I had quite done reading the note, short as it was.

"I SHALL SEE YOU NO MORE," SHE SAID, IN A VERY MARKED MANNER. "THIS IS OUR PARTING—"

"Don't write to Count Fosco! Pray, pray don't write to him!"

Sir Percival filled another glass from the decanter, so awkwardly that he upset it and spilt all the wine over the table. "My sight seems to be failing me," he muttered to himself in an odd, muffled voice. He slowly set the glass up again, refilled it, and drained it once more at a draught. I began to fear, from his look and manner, that the wine was getting into his head.

"Pray don't write to Count Fosco!" persisted Lady Glyde, more earnestly than ever.

"Why not, I should like to know?" cried Sir Percival, with a sudden burst of anger that startled us both. "Where can you stay more properly in London than at the place your uncle himself chooses for you—at your aunt's house? Ask Mrs. Michelson, I say."

The arrangement proposed was so unquestionably the right and the proper one that I could make no possible objection to it. Lady Glyde as I sympathized with Lady Glyde in other respects, I could not sympathize with her in her unjust prejudice against Count Fosco. I however before met with any lady of her rank and station who was so immeasurably narrow-minded on the subject of foreigners. Neither her uncle's note, nor Sir Percival's incensing impudence seemed to have the least effect on her. She still objected to staying a night in London; she still implored her husband not to write to the Count.

"Don't it?" said Sir Percival, rudely turning his back on us. "If you haven't sense enough to know what is best for yourself, other people must know for you. The arrangement is made, and there is an end of it. You are only wanted to do what Miss Halcombe has done before you—"

"Marian?" repeated her ladyship, in a bewildered manner; "Marian sleeping in Count Fosco's house!"

"Yes, in Count Fosco's house. She slept there last night, to break the journey. And you are to follow her example, and do what your uncle tells you. You are to sleep at Fosco's to-night, as your aunt did, to break the journey. Don't throw too many obstacles in my way! Don't make me repent of letting you go at all!"

He started to his feet, and suddenly walked out into the veranda through the open glass doors.

"Will your ladyship excuse me," I whispered, "if I suggest that we had better not wait here till Sir Percival comes back? I am very much afraid he is overexcited with wine."

She consented to leave the room in a very absent manner.

As soon as we were safe up stairs again I did all I could to compose her ladyship's spirits. I reminded her that Mr. Fairlie's letters to Miss Halcombe and to herself did certainly sanction, and even render necessary, sooner or later, the course which had been taken. She agreed to this, and even admitted, of her own accord, that both letters were strictly in character with her uncle's peculiar disposition; but her fears about Miss Halcombe, and her unaccountable dread of sleeping at the Count's house in London, still remained unshaken in spite of every consideration that I could urge. I thought it my duty to protest against Lady Glyde's unfavorable opinion of his lordship; and I did so with becoming forbearance and respect.

"Your ladyship will pardon my freedom," I remarked, in conclusion; "but it is said, 'by their fruits ye shall know them.' I am sure the Count's constant kindness and constant attention from the very beginning of Miss Halcombe's illness merit our best confidence and esteem. Even his lordship's serious misunderstanding with Mr. Dawson was entirely attributable to his anxiety on Miss Halcombe's account.

"What misunderstanding?" inquired her ladyship, with a look of sudden interest.

I related the unhappy circumstances under which Mr. Dawson had withdrawn his attendance—mentioning them all the more readily because I disapproved of Sir Percival's conduct, and long to exonerate the Count (as he had done in my presence) from the knowledge of Lady Glyde.

Her ladyship started up with every appearance of being additionally agitated and alarmed by what I had told her.

"Worse, worse than I thought!" she said, walking about the room in a bewildered manner. "The Count knew Mr. Dawson would never consent to Marian's taking a journey—he purposely insulted the Doctor to get him out of the house."

"Oh, my lady! my lady!" I remonstrated.

"Mrs. Michelson!" she went on, vehemently; "no words that ever were spoken will prevent me that my sister is in that man's power and in that man's house with her own consent. In horror of him is such that nothing Sir Percival could say, and no letters my uncle could write, would induce me, if I had only my own wishes to consult, to eat, drink, or sleep under his roof. But my misery of suspense about Marian gives me the courage to follow her in any way—to follow her even into Count Fosco's house."

I thought it right, at this point, to mention that Miss Halcombe had already gone on to Cumberland, according to Sir Percival's account of the matter.

"I can't afford to believe it!" answered her ladyship. "I am afraid she is still in that man's house. If I am wrong—if she has really gone on to Limmeridge—I am resolved I will not sleep to-morrow night under Count Fosco's roof. My dearest friend in the world, next to my sister, is at Limmeridge. You have heard me, you have heard Miss Halcombe, speak of Mrs. Vesey? I mean to write and propose to sleep at her house. I don't know how I shall get there—I don't know how I shall avoid the Count—but to that refuge I will escape in some way if my sister has gone to Cumberland. All I ask of you to do is to see yourself that my letter to Mrs. Vesey goes to London to-night, as certainly as Sir Percival's letter goes to Count Fosco. I have reasons for not trusting the post-bag down stairs. Will you keep my secret, and help me in this? It is the last favor, perhaps, that I shall ever ask of you."

I hesitated—I thought it all very strange—I almost feared it might be wrong—but I had been a little affected by recent anxiety and suffering. At my own risk, however, I ended by giving my consent. I told her letter had been entrusted to a stranger, or to any one but a lady so well known to me by report as Mrs. Vesey, I might have refused. I thank God—looking back on what happened afterward—I thank God I never thwarted that wish, or any other, which Lady Glyde expressed to me on the last day of her residence at Blackwater Park.

The letter was written and given into my hands. I myself put it into the post-bag in the village that evening.

We saw nothing more of Sir Percival for the rest of the day. I slept, by Lady Glyde's own desire, in the next room to hers, with the door open between us. There was something so strange and so touching in the loneliness and emptiness of the house that I was glad, on my side, to have a companion near me. Her ladyship also sat up late writing letters and burning them, and emptying her drawers and cabinets of little things she prized or feared to leave behind her, to Mrs. Blackwater Park. Her sleep was sadly disturbed when she at last went to bed: she cried out a few times, and seemed to lose all rest when she woke herself. Whatever her dreams were she did not think fit to communicate them to me. I was glad of it, myself, for I had no right to expect that she should do so. It matters little now. I was sorry for her—I was indeed heartily sorry for her and for myself.

The next day was fine and sunny. Sir Percival came up after breakfast to tell us that the carriage would be at the door to take us at noon twelve; the train to London stopping at our station at twenty minutes after. He informed Lady Glyde that he was obliged to go out, but added that he hoped to be back before she left. If any unforeseen accident delayed him, I was to accompany her to the station, and to take special care that she was in time for the train. Sir Percival communicated these directions very harshly, and left us directly after we had received all the time. Her ladyship looked attentively after him wherever he went. He never once looked at her in return.

She only spoke when he had done, and then she stopped him as he approached the door by holding out her hand.

"I shall see you no more," she said, in a very marked manner. "This is our parting—our last meeting. It may be forever. Will you forgive me, Percival, as heartily as I forgive you?"

His face turned of an awful whiteness all over, and great beads of perspiration broke out on his bald forehead. "I shall come back," he said—and paused for the door to close as if his wife's farewell words had frightened him out of the room.

I had never liked Sir Percival—but the manner in which he left Lady Glyde made me feel ashamed of having eaten his bread and lived in his house. My thoughts of saying a few comforting and Christian words to the poor lady; but there was something in her face, as she stood near her husband when the door closed on him, that made me alter my mind and keep silence.

At the time named the chaise drew up at the gates. Her ladyship was right—Sir Percival never came near us to say good-by for him till the last moment—and waited in vain.

No positive responsibility lay on my shoulders, and yet I did not feel easy at leaving her. "A line of your own free-will," I said, as the chaise drove through the lodge-gates, "that your ladyship goes to London?"

"I will go any where," she answered, "to end the dreadful suspense that I am suffering at this moment."

She had made me feel almost as anxious and as uncertain about Miss Halcombe as she felt herself. I gave her my word to write me a line if all went well in London. She answered, "Most willingly, Mrs. Michelson." We said other courteous things to each other. I said, during her silent and thoughtful after she had promised to write. She made no reply: she seemed to be too much absorbed in her own thoughts to attend to me. "I hope your ladyship rested badly last night," I remarked, after a little pause. "I did, Mrs. Michelson," she answered, perfectly disturbed by dreams." "Indeed, my lady?" I thought she was going to confide in me. She seemed to be on the point—she spoke next it was only to ask a question. "You posted the letter to Mrs. Vesey with your own hands?" "Yes, my lady." "Did Sir Percival say, yesterday, that Count Fosco was to meet me at the terminus in London?" "He did, my lady." "Oh!"

She sighed heavily when I answered that last question and said no more.

We arrived at the station with hardly two minutes to spare. The gardener (who had driven us) managed about the luggage while I took the tickets. The whistle of the train was sounding when I joined her ladyship on the platform. She looked very strangely, and pressed her hand over her heart as if some sudden pain or fright had overcome her at that moment.

I wish you were going with me!" she said, clutching eagerly at my arm when I gave her the ticket.

If there had been time, if I had felt the day before as I felt then I would have made my arrangements to accompany her—even though the doing so had obliged me to give Sir Percival warning on his return. As it was, her wishes, expressed at the last moment only, were expressed too late for me to comply with them. She seemed to understand this herself before I could explain it, and did not repeat her desire to have me for a traveling companion. The train drew up at the platform. She gave the gardener a present for his children, and took my hand in her simple, hearty manner before she got into the carriage.

"You have been very kind to me and to my sister," she said; "kind when we were both friendless. I shall remember you gratefully as long as I live to remember any one. Good-by—and God bless you!"

She spoke those words with a tone and a look which brought the tears into my eyes—she spoke them as if she was bidding me farewell forever.

"Good-by, my lady," I said, putting her into the carriage and trying to cheer her; "good-by, for the present only; good-by, with my best and kindest wishes for happy times!"

She shook her head and shuddered as she settled herself in the carriage. The guard closed the door. "Do you believe in dreams?" she whispered to me at the window. "My dreams last night were dreams I have never had before. The terror of them is hanging over me still."

The whistle sounded before I could answer and the train moved. I heard her call out a name for me for the last time, looked sorrowfully and solemnly from the window—she waved her hand—and I saw her no more.

Toward five o'clock on the afternoon of that same day, finding myself alone by myself in the midst of the household duties which now pressed upon me, I sat down alone in my own room to lay and compose my scattered volume of my husband's Sermons. For the first time in my life I found my attention wandering over volume pieces of writing. I was conscious that Lady Glyde's departure must have disturbed me far more seriously than I had myself supposed, I put my task away, and went out to take a turn in the garden. Sir Percival had not yet returned, to my knowledge, so I could feel no hesitation about following myself in the grounds.

On turning the corner of the house and gaining a view of the front I was startled by seeing a stranger walking in it. The stranger was a woman—she was lounging along the path with her back to me, and was looking up at the flowers.

As I approached she heard me and turned round.

My blood curdled in my veins. The strange woman in the garden was Mrs. Rubelle.

I could neither move nor speak. She came up to me as composedly as ever with her flowers in her hand.

"What is the matter, ma'am?" she said, quietly.

"You here!" I gasped out. "Not gone to London! Back at Blackwater Park!"

Mrs. Rubelle smelled at her flowers with a smile of malicious pity.

"Certainly not," she said. "I have never left Blackwater Park."

I summoned breath enough and courage enough for another question.

"Where is Miss Halcombe?"

Mrs. Rubelle fairly laughed at me this time; and answered in a tone of derision:

"Miss Halcombe, ma'am, has not left Blackwater Park either."

ADAM BEDE has not yet passed, never will pass, out of popular favor. It is one of the great novels of the age. We have before us another from the same pen—THE MILL ON THE FLOSS (published by Harper & Brothers)—which partakes of the same character, while in some respects it surpasses the former. The scenery of the story is like that of "Adam Bede"—quiet country life. But the wildest scenes are found in that same quiet country life; and wilder and more thrilling story was never written than that of Maggie Tulliver, interwoven as the histories that make these pages interesting. No one who reads can rest. There is at once moment and consequence of character and scene in another, a soft and delicious picture; at another, you can't see the pages for the tears that will start.

The story covers the lives of Tom Tulliver, his sister Maggie, their cousin Lucy, and the friends that surround them. Maggie is a girl—say that the country folk are drawn to the life is saying little. They stand out from these pages, the old men and the old women, the middle-aged and the girls, as real as the rustics of Denner. They talk in their own language; and instead of reading a book, you seem to be among them. In this respect the author far surpasses Dickens in skill. There is no caricature; there is no seizing on one prominent peculiarity, and making that the whole picture. But these are the people that have lived and have talked, and now live and talk before our eyes. They are not to be found in worth shelves full of the ordinary sort.

STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS is at present one of the most prominent figures in the most prominent man in the United States. His life is a remarkable history, and the public will be glad to have it as now written by James W. Sheahan, and published by Harper & Brothers. Mr. Sheahan has omitted nothing that is interesting or important to a complete knowledge of the career of his distinguished subject. His work is well laid out and well executed; and while it gives a full history of Mr. Douglas, it also gives us a political history of the nation, showing how closely the distinguished Senator, a candidate for the Presidency, has been identified with the great events in our national growth for a quarter of a century.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, April 23, nothing of public interest transpired in the Senate.—In the House, speeches were made, in Committee of the Whole, on the slavery question and the tariff, by Messrs. Moore, Ailey, Wade, and Curtis.

On Tuesday, May 1, the Senate not being in session, the House listened to speeches on slavery, etc., from Messrs. Wilson, Hickman, and Millson of Virginia.

On Wednesday, May 2, in the Senate, Senator Davis caused his Territorial resolutions to be made the special order for Monday next. Some executive business was acted upon prior to adjournment.—In the House, Mr. Harman announced that the Tariff bill would be called up that day, and that he should move that the speeches of the session, April 30th, should be reviewed prior to the measure. Resolving itself into Committee of the Whole, the House listened to Messrs. English, Morris, and Smith of North Carolina, on slavery.

On Thursday, May 3, the Senate not being in session, Mr. Sherman urged action on the tariff question. Speeches on slavery were made by Messrs. Grow, Reid, Stanton, Millson, Singleton, and Hughes.

On Friday, May 4, both Houses were engaged on private business of no interest to the public.

THE CHARLESTON CONVENTION.

On Saturday, April 28, the adoption of a platform was again recommitted to the Committee, from whence three reports were made on Saturday evening. The majority report was presented by Mr. Avery of North Carolina. It sets out with an affirmation of the Cincinnati platform, subject to certain explanatory resolutions, which declare that all citizens of the United States in the Territories, "without their rights, either of person or property, being destroyed or injured by Congressional or Territorial legislation," that it is the duty of the Federal Government to protect these rights; that the State sovereignty begins only with the formation of a State Constitution. The annexation of the mainland of guano per Cuba, the enforcement of the Fugitive Slave law, etc. A Pacific Railroad, and a liberality report with the Democratic Party will abide by the decision of the Supreme Court on the question of Slavery within the Territories." The acquisition of Cuba and the construction of a Pacific Railroad are the planks of the majority report, which proposes the adoption of the Cincinnati Platform, subject to explanations as above referred to. Minorities followed the reception of the reports; but no vote was taken on the platform.

On Monday morning (30th), the question of platform was again taken up. Mr. Butler's report was received. The minority report was then taken up and adopted by a considerable majority. Upon this resolution the delegations of Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, Texas, and South Carolina withdrew. Previous to the withdrawal, action, after protesting against the action of the majority, was carried, and delegates to St. Andrew's Hall, organized a separate body.

On Tuesday, May 1, the regular Convention met at the usual hour. Before business began a member of the Georgia delegation announced that, with the concurrence of his colleagues, he felt constrained to withdraw from the Convention. He would not detain it, but four-and-one at once and left; four others followed, declaring they never would abandon the principles of the party while they had their seats. The Arkansas delegation then retired, leaving Florida the only one left in the cotton-planting States. Tennessee, Virginia, and North Carolina, with portions of Kentucky and Missouri, remained. Kentucky seceded and a protest leave was granted to retire for consultation. A struggle on the two-thirds rule followed, and without any balloting the Convention adjourned. The ballots met, and after hearing speeches from Mr. Avery, Pendleton, Ward, and Yancey, retired, organized by electing Mr. Bayard President.

In the evening the balloting for candidate for President began in the regular Convention, the two-thirds rule having been rejected, and 202 votes being necessary to nominate. The following table shows the votes given in that evening, and on the following day, Wednesday, May 2:

On Thursday, May 3, Messrs. Ould, Russell, of Virginia, the regular Convention adjourned, to meet at Baltimore on June 18. A brief address was issued by Mr. Cushing, and the Convention broke up.

The Baltimore Democrats also held a meeting and attempting to nominate.

CAPTAIN FARNHAM RELEASED.

Captain Farnham, distinguished for his connection with the sloop Wanderer, was on Wednesday released from the jail in Savannah, Georgia, where he has been confined for six months past. An attempt to rescue him was made by a party of the revolver friends who made the rescue. The matter was finally compromised by Captain Farnham consenting to bail, and give bonds in $20,000.

JAPANESE GALLANTRY.

Two French ladies, who were in San Francisco when the Japanese arrived there, were anxious to go on board the vessel where the foreigners were. But ladies could only be received. Nevertheless, they put on portions of their husbands' wardrobe and made the visit. They escaped detection while they only talked, for neither party could understand the other. When, however, they shook hands with the Admiral, a peculiar smile passed over his features, and he immediately caused an attendant to dive into his cabin and bring out a variety of hair-pins, bracelets, furs, or other things pertaining to the female toilet. He said, with an Oriental wink at his interpreter, that he could not be mistaken in the character of a lady's hand.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.

Yesterday at noon, says the Washington Star of the 3d inst., the Hon. E. J. Boulligny, M. C. from Louisiana, was united in marriage to Miss Mary Elizabeth Parker, the second daughter of our well-known fellow-citizen, Mr. George Parker. The ceremony took place at the residence of the bride's father, and the officiating clergyman was the Rev. Dr. Pyne, the pastor of Trinity (Episcopal) Church. The guests witnessing the ceremony, though not very numerous, embraced a number of the most prominent distinguished public personages here and their families—the President, Secretaries Cobb, Thompson, and Toucey among them. The bridesmaids were Miss Fanny Parker, a sister of the bride; Miss Elizabeth, of New York; Miss Catlin, of New York; Miss Alice Maury, and Miss Sarah Pendleton, of the city, and the bridesmaid, a daughter of Senator Hammond, of South Carolina. The groom's attendants were Mr. Bouligny, of New Orleans; John Maury, Esq., of this city; the Hon. Messrs. Phillips, of Alabama; Curtis, Edmundson, Ingersoll, and Miles, of South Carolina, of the House of Representatives, and another gentleman, Mr. Lenthall, whose name we have not learned. The bride is said to have been attired with great expensive taste, in gold lace, over a white satin dress, with a point lace veil, and orange flowers for her hair, and fifty-seven diamonds in the ornaments she wore. Shortly after the ceremony the reception took place, which was ushered in by a large concourse of the fashionable friends of Mr. Parker's family and connections, and by a new one-in-law, their congratulating C and Four-and-a-half streets for a long distance. A sumptuous wedding breakfast was prepared for the occasion and an exquisite string band discoursed delicious music from an adjoining apartment shielded to the door-way of the reception room, and subsequently the gay wedding party sat down to dinner at Mr. Parker's. After this the happy pair start to-day on a Northern wedding tour. This was certainly the most brilliant wedding that has ever taken place in the Federal metropolis.

PERSONAL.

Dr. James Walker, the retiring President of Harvard College, has just received a gift of $12,000 from gentlemen of Boston. This is a very generous gift, and one that will be of great service to many, for it will give to the social front freedom from the nerve of life, and will enable the students to devote their time to the pursuits for which he is especially fitted. President C. C. Felton will be inaugurated on the 24th of the present month.

The Cunk divorce case is now progressing at Norwalk, Connecticut. It is a curious line affair between Mr. Mix Cook, the accusing him of compelling her to act the shameful part of procurer and medium to the licentiousness of her husband, and he charging her with improper intimacies with a man named Sperry. Some very curious testimony has been and will be given on this matter of Spiritualism, its effect on the wife, and the use of those subjected to its influence.

Simon Cole, a son of the United States marine corps at the battle of New Orleans, died near Winchester, Virginia, on the 16th ult. He was a soldier and patriot to the last, and he was taken prisoner.

Mr. Felton will succeed to the active duties as President of Harvard College at the beginning of the present term, March 1. His formal inauguration will take place on Monday, 26th inst. Mr. Henry Lee, Jun., has been appointed by the Corporation to read all matters in the archives, but the details of the ceremony have not yet been arranged.

A gay marriage recently took place at Beirut, in Syria. The parties were the American Vice-Consul at Beirut, Dr. H. G. Barclay, of Virginia, and Miss Louisa Hoogkirs, the niece of the U. S. Consul at Jerusalem. After the wedding ceremony, the bridal party, including the officers of a British man-of-war, mounted themselves on gayly-caparisoned Arabian steeds, and, preceded by the bride in a handsome carriage, went to a small village where the flags of England and America were festooned about the hall, and a wedding-cake, a memento, for fear its height, was similarly decorated to intimidate. After breakfast, and many speeches, of course, it was the fashionable thing to do, the Americans were well favored in the exhibition of their toasts.

The investigation in the Lemley family poisoning case is progressing, and the evidence, as it comes out, becomes more than examined, and the probability is that their testimony will be a fatal one to the deed upon the one suspected from the first, Ann, the slave cook. Miss Isabella Wilson, one of the sufferers, although at first she heard the woman was threats against the family because her son had been sold to the Arkansas-pen for, also, her self whipped severely.

Not long since, we stated that at a "Charivari" party, or mock serenade, given to a newly-married couple at Harrisburgh, Pa., a large number of the guests fired from the house to demonstrate, and was shot dead. On the night of the 30th, as a boy was trying to get into a station on the Mississippi River, a man deliberately walked out and shot himself dead. What his motive was not known, but it was supposed to be the person who committed the murder above alluded to. The shooting appeared immediately after the deed. His name is Boulivard.

Miss Evans is to wed in Mobile; a boat intended for Somerset Place, on the Lake Shore Line has been named "Beulah."

The Birmingham Zanner says that John Sherman, in Powmal, Vermont, had born to him, on the day he completed his twenty-fifth year, a son, and he called him Levi; and on the same day were born unto him a grandson and great-grandson, the parents at this time residing in three different States. All three of the boys are living now.

About three months ago a young woman was married in this city, and with her husband left Philadelphia, on a wedding trip, he pawned or sold all her clothes except a wedding suit. They then started for New York or Boston. There the rapacious man sold his wife's last fortune generously accorded her to pay his expenses out.

At the recent county seat election in Falls City, Kansas, two men named Mock and Davis, were shot to preserve order. They soon began to quarrel, and, although separated by friends, managed to keep up a fusillade of shots at each other during the afternoon—some of them, however, taking effect. Mock fell dead, and about two with leaded pistols in search of each other, they met and both pulled both pistols back—Davis dying at once, the other lingering, but past recovery.

The late Sir Benjamin Heywood Bart., who died suddenly at the late champion fight in England, was robbed of his watch by the fellow who broke into his room.

Mrs. Sarah McCauley was buried in Philadelphia on the 6th inst., from the residence of a granddaughter. The deceased was formerly Miss Sarah Mercer, and the figurest prominent in the pitiful tragedy which for many years seventeen or eighteen years ago. In consequence of a romantic love affair, she was left a widow, married Hutchinson Herbertson, while in a carriage, on a ferryboat in the dock, on the Jersey side of the river. Young Mercer was tried at Woodbury, and acquitted on the ground of insanity. The affair caused an intense excitement at the time. Miss Mercer, who was a very beautiful girl, married a young gentleman of Philadelphia, but they were soon afterward divorced. She subsequently married Dr. J. B. McCauley, of New York, by whom she had a little five years of age at the time of her death. Singleton Mercer was from Norfolk, as a name, to one of the terrible fever there, in 1855, and he fell a victim to the scourge. His companions in Le Laurel Hall, along with the other Philadelphia victims of the epidemic.

Sayers's friends determined to deprive him of it. Before the new gate is even hung, and the workmen have removed their materials out the ropes, and the whole crowd of spectators and backers, with the prize, who had been quietly looking on for more than an hour, rushed in. The referee got up, ordering the men to leave the ring. But they managed to get at each other again; and after another short battle, Heenan got Sayers's head under his arm, where he was pounding him after the manner of Tom Hyer, and would have won without doubt, but the friends of Sayers pulled him away, and kicked and struck him. The referee, in the confusion, was set upon and dared his man to come out and fight, knocking him down on each attempt to get up. Sayers's friends, in the forty-second round Sayers was unable to rise from Harry Brown's knee, Heenan walked up and struck his seconds if they would throw up the sponge. They did so, and Heenan, throwing off coat and vest, sprang like a tiger, at one blow knocking down Jim Ward, who had given the information and struck him, then straightening himself out for the whole crowd. With great difficulty Heenan was kept from the fight away; when, after calling the crowd to witness that he had not struck a blow, he left the ring, running faster than any one who followed him to the railroad track. I saw him on the platform of the train with him much of the time since. He was almost as strong after the fight as he was when commenced. His left eye was closed, but his left eye was as good as ever, and he hit as before on each successful rush in the forty-second succession. Sayers was whipped on the seventieth round, and could not have stood that. If the ring had been entered Heenan would have left him senseless and out of time at once. Sayers's friends will not allow him to set at heavy odds on Sayers knew so, and that was why the fight was stopped. The Tom Sayers admit openly and above boasting, as the police had been there from the first. Heenan's friends are not at all disposed to be fairly assailed man will acknowledge it. It is said that the referee was bribed by Sayers's friends to give the decision on the ground that the rounds fought were illegal. This is a mean and sneaky dodge. You put down a man, and then because you find that he is not now, he will be; for he is ready to fight Sayers again, and give him another thrashing, however, next week, or next month."

FRANCE.

THE FRENCH POLICY AS TO SAVOY.

Mention has been made of a confidential dispatch addressed by M. Thouvenel to the diplomatic agents of the Emperor in Germany. The following is the text of the document:

"PARIS, March 15, 1860.

"Sir,—I remark in the German papers that a very extreme importance, and a meaning which is not a correct one, is given to a word which I used in my last dispatch, the word of annexation—which his Majesty made use of when speaking of the question of Savoy. Some see in it the first indication of the ancient reunion movement of the 1795 by Sardinia, and others the idea of founding our opinion on the right of conquest, as was done between the years of 1814 and that of 1815. The Emperor's Government does itself honor in not having recourse to the pretended reunion interpretation of a word which, nevertheless, can have with it the most legitimate sense. The Treaty, by pointing out with so much reason the territories changed by the right of war, has not done more than anything made for us on the side of the Alps by the treaty of 1815. It had modified in the most favorable manner for France, and to demand from the King of Sardinia a modification which for the most part was favorable to him, would be nonsense. Has recalling from them for France. In not what he declared in the Chambers? Has it not supported to be present what is called in French a renunciation? And do not the explanations which have been given on this subject clearly indicate that the only grounds on which that renunciation was based, were the most considerable aggrandizement of Piedmont, aggravating the position which results to be from the annexation of Savoy, in its relations to the Swiss Confederation, and the necessity of sacrifice to exclude any suspicion of such an idea? We have, then, in this question, absolutely contrary aspirations, to the equity and good sense of the Cabinets. You are authorized to read this dispatch to Count Rechberg, if Foreign Affairs of ——, and to make use of the indications it contains to show to the false appreciations which may be produced around you. THOUVENEL."

THE HERALD AND OTHER RISING BELLES.

The Herald of Monday contained a letter, from an American lady, has attained a considerable authority in the Old World, which will be read with interest wherever she develops in respect to the sinews of war. "Hang the expense," she writes, "I have just crossed the Atlantic for nothing!" If the choicest flowers, the rarest music, the most delicious dishes, and the most brilliant pate de foies gras et dindons aux truffes—if gorgeous lights and sparkling wines, the famous cheap luxury of France and her famous dames, with a goodly melange of its dukes and counts, can make a man forget upon one gage tendresse; and I have no hesitation in saying that Mrs. Agg—pardon—Aspinwall remained unmoved by the homely nature of her early life, is a special favorite. Since there is the case of Aspinwall, who, after all, only he gives 10,000 francs per annum for an unlovely woman, and has to endure the sneering of the country around the Ave de l'Eglise! One hears of nothing but Mrs. Longueville Clarke. Some of the princesses seem to rush from her portals—the office of one being to sweep off Paris of all the wealthy, wealthy, wealthy, of the rifle, and convey them to the ashes of an impatient host, who waits to receive them. Others, in the desire to create and weed out all vulgar small fry who, whatever noise they have made in society, have been sighing of late years money in her coward empire unworthy to come betray Mrs. Longueville Clarke. Spitzful people, who are credited with Mrs. Longueville Clarke. Spitzful people sneak up to her door, and are refused, and they have never since been asked. She herself is the impersonation of the Spirit of Evil, and delights in the creation of obliging good materials for her reception. Such as statuesque beauty, slim, wiry, active, and Longueville Clarke presents her enamelled features and very artistically is that expression of the face which is the result of her hospitality with charming hauteur and dignity. But let none accept her invitations without caution. Her home is devoted to fill up, ask permission to bring another member of her family, and then to the bring another member of her family, and then to the Longueville Clarke, the splendid dignity of Mrs. Longueville Clarke will flare up forthwith. A very near friend of mine, who is a widow, and has a very pretty daughter, a mother that she might bring a second daughter. Let me be much, I am told, by the cross. The crushed applicant to address some one else. A young gentleman of fortune, and of the highest order, is the son of a rich banker-brief. Mrs. Longueville Clarke felt deficient in good as dinner party. She was informed that the gentleman that if he thought there was time to proceed to the next course, he would be glad to see it. Mrs. Clarke saw him at dinner. The idiot of course sent for champagne with the lunch—and the dinner was spoiled for her. But enough of Mrs. Longueville Clarke. The lady is the hostess of the Empress Eugenie, and has had six diamond epaulets, with his vermilion cheeks and his moustache, and his hair, and his white cravat, and was sitting at her feet; and with a first crush of the flowers of Paradise, and the Empress Eugenie, and the hopes, despair, hatred, rivalry, delight, and triumph that in turn excited world fill a woman's heart. All day long large caravans are rolling through the grand avenue of the Champs Elysées marked Ministère de la Guerre, containing every species of palatial decoration for the coming fête; and as the night tantalizes the eyes of the world-be-invited, all sorts of ingenious contrivances are brought to bear. Ministers, embassadors, princes and their subordinates are worried to death. The poor Empress herself would gladly dispense with numbers of those who, from their position about the court and the various functionaries attached, must be invited. The superstition of their fears is perfectly wearisome, she has been known to say, and that she would gladly put up their places with newer attractions—mais voilà! on ne peut pas!

"Report says that her Majesty is to impersonate an antique style, and that on her arm a magnificent bracelet in which that sweetest bravura is generally conveyed, while about the hair and the throat the most splendid display is to meet the anticipated demands. But the shells! —will they contain cannon or sweetmeats? or what?"

ITALY.

THE VOTE ON THE ANNEXATION OF NICE.

The vote for annexation in the district of Nice was 24,448 votes registered 1,600 negative. About 600 refused to vote. These latter will probably form the liberal party, and have published a declaration, in which they say they would have voted for the union with France which takes possession of the country, the liberal party will be lower in strength, and which is abhorrent to it, and will preserve intact the principle of liberty of action, and of the press and speech.

PROGRESS OF TROUBLE.

At latest dates the insurrection in Messina had been quelled and tranquillity restored. Many of the insurgents were reported to be in considerable force in the mountains, while bands were also made in different parts by means of artillery.

The Papal Government has sent a dispatch to the Emperor Napoleon, not only protesting against the annexation of the Romagna to Piedmont, but declaring that it will put an end to this iniquitous spoliation.

The Pope has published a Manifesto, in which he declares:

THE LAMORICIERE'S MANIFESTO.

The following is the text for the order of the day issued by General de Lamoricière:

"ROME, April 9, 1860

"SOLDIERS! Our holy Father the Pope, Pius IX., having deigned to call me to command the troops charged to defend rights, I have not hesitated for a moment to resume my sword.

At the sound of the venerable voice that sat long ago proclaimed me a soldier of the Church, I forgot the words the dangers besetting the patrimony of St. Peter, Catholic sovereignty, and that sacred property which is from one end of the earth to the other. In fact, Christianity is not since the days of the Apostles divided, and it has been the principle and the life itself of civilization. Our enemies have not dared to attack openly them. All Christian nations now show that their conscience and their honor are deeply compromised.

"Revolution, as Islamism formerly, now threatens Europe; and the time has come for all to march to the rescue of civilization and of the liberty of the world.

"Soldiers, Catholics, and all the guard of the Pontiff, remember your cause, and rise to the height of the cause. Our enemies shall be but cowards and assassins.

"The General-in-Chief, DE LAMORICIERE."

SPAIN.

END OF THE CARLIST REBELLION.

General Count Urbistondo, the brother of the Montemolin and his brother Ferdinand, and their valet, were arrested at Bilbao, on the 27th inst., by order of the Governor of the Province. The gang, we are surprised to learn, had after having vainly demanded admittance, found refuge in the house of Urbistondo, where the Princes were arrested, and declared themselves at the disposal of the juiz of Guard.

TURKEY.

A SCOTCH GIRL SOLD FOR $2500.

The Perth Courier has the following: "In the course of last autumn, a young girl, the only child of a farmer of Dundee or Abercarnie, in order to visit two relations residing in Constantinople, left by the steam packet which passed the ancient Phares, and entered the port of Smyrna. On landing she was met by a Turkish lady, who attired Tura, with flowing beard and magnificent turbans, salvoed and welcomed her at the arrival, and presented instantly to be struck with the charms of the young damsel from the north. Immediately a bargain was concluded between the parties, and Tura, with a laugh, informed his fair and bewildered passenger that she was to be the property of the Turkish gentleman. The matter speedily became serious. Through the medium of a dragoman, a Greek interpreter, she entered into conversation with the captain, and inquired whether he knew of the sale. He replied that he did. He had nine wives already, he said, but could be persuaded to take a tenth, and would be glad to have her in his harem. The captain, for the sake of a joke, replied he would buy her for 2500 piastres, or £25 sterling. The Turk grumbled at the enormous demand: it was just double the price of a Circassian, but as he had never seen Circassian, Georgian, or Mingrelian ever brought to Constantinople, he closed with the captain, however, stuck to his price; and as the parties separated. But on the following morning the Turk appeared on board, and ready to the residence of her relations, the Turk unexpectedly paid down the money, and left the vessel. The audience around the lady's neck, intimated that he was prepared to fulfill his engagement. The girl was astounded. But the captain soon cleared himself: "Feb" said he, "you have been sold, and the Turk will make a present of sixteen more; so you've lost her." It may be well imagined that the unfortunate girl was in a state of distraction and wrath. We may add that the same young lady was married the other day in Dundee.

THE TOUR OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

The Montreal Gazette has received from a correspondent at Fredericton, New Brunswick, a number of the movements of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales on the occasion of his approaching visit to British America. The date of his departure from England is to be the middle of May, and he will arrive at Halifax on the 24th of May. The first spot on this side of the Atlantic will be St. Johns, Newfoundland. The Lieutenant-Governor of that colony, as we have already announced, has received a letter informing him of the Prince's intention to visit Newfoundland, and thence cross over the country and visit St. John, New Brunswick, and Halifax. At the latter place he will thence cross over to Shediac, where his fleet will be waiting to receive him, and proceed up the Gulf and River.

If he finds difficulty in getting to Shediac, he may proceed to Pictou, and in that case cross over to Prince Edward Island, and thence to Shediac.

The Prince will be received at Fredericton, the capital of New Brunswick, on the 1st of June, and will remain there a week. He will then proceed to Woodstock, and thence to Quebec or Montreal. From this he will go to Kingston, and thence to Toronto. The distance from Toronto across the lake to the Falls, and back by rail to Toronto, is 400 miles. He will go to the Huron Tract, and travel over the Western States to Chicago, Detroit, and so by the quiet of the President; thence visit the Australian cities, and have his first meet him at Portland; or probably, if he comes by Portland, his departure may be from Quebec, and he may take the Grand Trunk from Portland after the completion of his tour in the United States. Circumstances may alter this programme of proceedings; but we have good information that it has been obtained by authority in England, and that arrangements are in progress for making the necessary information as to routes, who, in their journeys, will be attended by the Duke of Newcastle. August will likely be well advanced before his Royal Highness reaches Montreal.

PROMINENT CANDIDATES FOR THE REPUBLICAN PRESIDE

NTIAL NOMINATION AT CHICAGO.—[From Photographs by Brady.]

REPUBLICAN CANDIDATES FOR THE PRESIDENCY.

WE present on the two preceding pages portraits of the eleven leading statesmen whose names are mentioned in connection with the Republican nomination for President, and we subjoin brief biographical sketches:

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, OF NEW YORK.

William Henry Seward, a United States Senator from the "Empire State" of New York, and the acknowledged leader of the great Republican party, is unquestionably one of the foremost representative men of the age. Few of his fellow-citizens are unwilling to accord to him the tribute to his intellectual ability, while many regard him as the champion of the freedom and of progress.

Mr. Seward was born in the village of Florida, Orange County, New York, on the 16th day of May, 1801. Of an active disposition, and possessing an inquiring mind, he mastered the rudiments of education at an early age, and in 1816 entered Union College, at Schenectady, where he greatly distinguished himself as a diligent student. Having graduated with high honors, he went to New York city in 1819, and commenced the study of law in the office of Hon. John Anthon; but the next year returned to his native village, and completed his legal studies in the office of Hon. Ogden Hoffman, at that time District Attorney.

In 1822 Mr. Seward was admitted to the bar, at Goshen, and at once settled in the county seat to Auburn, where he entered into partnership with his future father-in-law, Judge Miller, and where he has since resided. Devoted to the interests of his numerous clients, the young practitioner soon attained a high reputation, and acquired a lucrative practice.

Mr. Seward became identified with the "Anti-Masonic" party in this State, and in 1828 was the President of a Young Men's State Convention, which, in favor of the re-election of John Quincy Adams to the Presidential chair. In 1830 he was elected to the Senate of the State of New York, where he at once distinguished himself as a Reformer.

Having served four years as State Senator, Mr. Seward was persuaded, in 1834, to accept a nomination for Governor, in opposition to Hon. William L. Marcy, who then held the high office, and was defeated; but the contest was by no means successful, defeating his veteran opponent by ten thousand votes only. Soon after the nomination of "Harrison campaign," in which he took an active part, he was elected Governor by a majority.

In 1840 Governor Seward, having declined a renomination, settled down to private life, to enjoy the comforts of domestic life, and to devote himself to his profession, in which he also acquired a leading position. But his services was varied and extensive, embracing many important causes in every court of the State; while at other times he was rewarded as one of the best criminal lawyers in the State of New York.

The nomination of General Taylor to 1848 as the Whig candidate for President was regarded by Governor Seward as one eminently "fit to be made," and he entered into the canvass with his usual zeal. The result of the "Rough and Ready" campaign, a large majority; and when the Legislature met, he was chosen Governor's successor to the United States Senate by a vote of 121 to 20. It was generally supposed he would have been the acknowledged spirit of the Taylor Administration; but the untimely death of the lamented President greatly changed the aspect of political affairs at Washington.

Senator Seward was one of the most earnest opponents of the "Compromise Measures" passed by the Thirty-First Congress. In a "fast session," and he, in his famous speech of March 11, 1850, "that slavery must give way, and will give way to the sentiment prevailing in our economy and to the ripening influences of humanity; that emancipation is inevitable, and that it will adopt some form of its peaceful anticipation." He would adopt none but "peaceful, constitutional and peaceful means to secure even that end; and none such can I or will I forego."

In the Presidential campaign of 1852 Senator Seward advocated the election of General Scott, although he did not approve of the "platform." The disaffection of 1852, which brought about a dissolution of the old "Whig party," did not affect the position of the Senator from New York, who took bold and decided ground against the Kansas-Nebraska bill, which he denounced in able speeches.

In February, 1855, Senator Seward was re-elected by a combination of Whig, American, and Anti-Slavery Democratic members, by a vote of a majority of the joint Republican party, of which he is the acknowledged leader. It was, however, in the Presidential year, as the ensuing Presidential election, to place Colonel Frémont in nomination; and Mr. Seward labored as he never before did to raise energetic zeal which had marked his exertions to promote the success of Taylor, and of Scott.

After the adjournment of Congress in the summer of 1859 Senator Seward made a visit to Europe, and spent a year in "the Orient." He was every where received with marked distinction, and was the guest of the sovereigns of the principal governments.

Senator Seward's position Seward's return the entire Republic was politically convulsed by the "raid" of John Brown, which the opponents of the Republican party vexatiously availed themselves of.

Senator Seward's speech of the 25th of February (the last which he will ever deliver in Congress, his friends say) disgusted the more moderate of his opponents and the zealots of his more conservative friends.

In personal appearance Senator Seward is remarkably unassuming, of middle size, with light hair toned down by age, prepossessing in his manners, and exceedingly affable. His smile is cordial, and there is a benignant expression in the countenance of his keen gray eye that bears a warm heart. Married, early in life, to a daughter of Judge Miller, Mr. Seward has for two sons and two daughters, and a portion of his family accompany him to Washington during the sessions of Congress, and visit there. So man has a larger circle of devoted friends, and no public servant ever more completely enjoys a high reputation as a cultivated, high-toned gentleman. Politicians of every shade of his political opinion have ever believed by like unexceptionable reminiscenced nearly. ing will; and while he cites Pisa-notes select a Republican from among the Republican candidates named (if one was selected), they would beyond question name William Henry Seward.

HON. JOHN M'LEAN, OF OHIO.

John M'Lean, Esq., is a native of Morris County, New Jersey, where his father, an Irish weaver, who had sought a home in the New World, died the subject.

At a very early age, in 1793, he entered the office of the County Clerk, and commenced the study of the law, and by laboriously transcribing documents earned a support while prosecuting his legal studies. In 1795 he was admitted to the bar, and commenced practice at Lebanon, Ohio, where he soon obtained a large share of the legal business. About this time he married Miss Roberts, daughter of Dr. Edwards, of South Carolina.

Mr. M'Lean was in early life a strong Democrat; and in 1812 he was elected to Congress, where he warmly supported President Madison and the war with Great Britain, introducing bills for indemnifying individuals who had lost property in the public service, and for premiums on privateers and seamen. He was also charged with ability on the Committees on Foreign Relations and Public Lands, of both of which he was a member. In 1816 he declined a renomination to Congress, and was appointed Postmaster-General. Up to that time the postal affairs of the country had been very loosely managed, but Judge M'Lean soon had every portion of the business reduced to a perfect system, and so highly were his services esteemed that the salary of his office was raised from that time to the present dollars per annum. President Adams retained him in office.

When General Jackson was selecting his Cabinet it is said that he asked Judge M'Lean if he would remain in office yet sanction the removal of postmasters whose politics did not agree with that of the administration. The Judge declined, stating that he was of opinion that public offices should not be conferred as rewards for political services.

In 1810 Judge M'Lean was appointed a Justice of the Supreme Court, where he has since maintained a distinguished position, and received the appellation of "the Judge of Judges." Although a Democrat, he could not be differed from the decisions of the Court, as delivered by Chief Justice Marshall, a Federalist, merely on a relation created by the local sovereignty—a nationalist repudiation of State sentiments, domestic relations, over which the Federal Government can exercise no control.

Judge M'Lean has been a religious professor for years, and neither his mental nor bodily vigor is affected or impaired by his advanced age. He was born on the 11th day of March, 1785 Sarah B. Lodlow, of Cincinnati. A member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, he has received the degree from the Wesleyan University and other colleges of that persuasion, and is a liberal contributor to objects of devoted friends, who admire him as a Judge, agree with him as a conservationalist, esteem him as a citizen, and respect him as a Christian.

GEN. SIMON CAMERON, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Simon Cameron was born on the 8th day of March, 1799, in Maytown, Lancaster County, Pennsylvania. Both of his parents were also natives of Lancaster County. His father, who was a Revolutionary Soldier, died in 1858, where his father soon afterward died, leaving the subject of this sketch, a boy, dependent on his own resources.

Having acquired the "art and mystery" of typography, young Cameron went forth into the world, and, in 1821, was employed in the printing office of Mr. Gales, editor of the National Intelligencer at Washington. Returning to Lancaster, he established, in 1824, the Lancaster Journal. Charles Murray as editor of the Harrisburg Intelligencer, then the official organ of the Democracy of the Keystone State.

In 1825 General Cameron was chosen cashier of the Middletown Bank—an office which he has ever since held, displaying great financial ability, and gaining both in public and private esteem.

In 1845, when James K. Polk, the President-elect, tendered the State Department to Mr. Buchanan, and that distinguished statesman left the Senate of the United States, General Cameron, who has ever been the devoted friend of internal improvements, was chosen to fill the vacancy of internal improvements. In the Senate he has uniformly supported the policy of making liberal appropriations for the improvement of our rivers and harbors, and is identified with the enlightened policy of one of the most useful public works of Pennsylvania.

In 1857 General Cameron was again elected to the Senate, where his course has been in strict accordance with the views and interests of the great State which he so well represents.

HON. SALMON P. CHASE, OF OHIO.

Salmon Portland Chase, the last Governor of the State of Ohio, was born in Cornish, New Hampshire, January 13, 1808. His father died when he was nine years of age. In 1820 he entered Dartmouth College, and in Cincinnati College. In 1826 he graduated with distinguished reputation, and, after a brief residence in Washington, in Washington, and gave instruction to the sons of Henry Clay, Theodore Frelinghuysen, and other distinguished men, conducting his school he pursued the study of the law, under the direction of William Wirt, and in 1829 was admitted to the bar of the District of Columbia.

He has since resided in the city of Cincinnati, and has ever since been a resident of Ohio. While a young attorney, he was a frequent visitor at the progress of business. He Chase prepared for publication, in three octavo volumes, the Statutes of the Territory of Ohio, which is now received as authority in the Courts throughout the country. Having made the study of the law close attention to business, Mr. Chase soon gained a valuable practice, and, associating with him Mr. Ephraim Ewing, particularly identified with any political party. He soon formed Democratic party, and, in the contest of 1840, was prominent as the nominee of the Democratic party, and, in the contest of 1840, was prominent as the nominee of the Democratic party, and, in the contest of 1840, was prominent as the nominee of the about with ghastly effect as it comes nearer; and presently you see a man carefully descending a kind of ladder, until, disappearing for a moment, he suddenly enters by a door we have not seen before.

"Well, father, how d'ye fare now?"

"Badly, Martin; badly. How's the weather? Look out, quick! Untar the trap. I stifle here in this accursed place!"

The trap was untarred, and cast a harried look at the speaker. He was not mistaken, however; these despairing tones were those of his father, though strangely altered, and he silently did as he was bid. No comfort was conveyed by the burst of air that nearly threw him backward as the loosened trap flew open. It was as much as all his strength could do to close it again.

"Cheer up, old friend!" said the other man, Sholto by name. "We are sure to have help soon. I think I saw a light in the east a little time ago."

"I tell you we shall die in this prison of a place. I know we shall. The Warning came to me again last night. The same form that I have seen so often before came to me last night. 'What d'ye stare at me that way?' I says, but it never moved. There, close by that door it stood, in a long cloak with hanging sleeves, and a black hood with white bent the face."

"Martin Brunner," said Sholto, "put such things out of your head; it's bad enough to be shut up as we are."

Starvation is at all times a terrible thing; but here, where the position of the men was so cramped, and their puny strength so utterly mocked at by the elements, it seemed miserable indeed! All had borne with it, and became two men. The father and son had tried to comfort each other as became such, and Sholto's grasp of the hand had seemed to be more firm, and his clear, honest eye to beam with a more friendly look, as his face grew paler and his form more bent. But on old Martin a fearful change had come. His homely cares for days had been no resting-place for him, for he tossed and mound all night, though fast asleep, as if possessed. And he can, of course, be multiplied indefinitely; but few are needed to tell that, as the old man's body grew weak, his brain seemed more active, and he began to recall something with a stronger frame and busy duties had enabled him to throw off. The others had marveled much at this change. They could not read and see him at work thus, and one night had agreed by turns to watch him in his sleep lest he should do himself a mischief, as he more than feared he would. And his sleeping talk was always of the lady with the long black cloak and hanging sleeves, and a black hood with white bent face.

Well, the day on which our story begins had passed, and another had come. It was Sholto's turn to watch his old friend and young Martin's to tend the light, and he made believe to turn in as usual, waiting till the other slept or seemed to sleep. He had not waited long before a piteous moaning, such as he had never heard, smote his ear, and he got out of his berth and listened, and then came into the room. He was frightened by what he saw; for Martin Brunner, whom he had left quiet, was now seated in his chair, gazing pale and staring at vacancy, with a face such as it does not often happen to a man to have, or, thank Heaven, many of us to see. Sholto called to his son down, and together they approached the dreamer—if indeed he was one.

No token of recognition was in the old man's eyes. He had the far-off look of a caged tiger who remembers his wild freedom—that restless, strange look never seen save in insanity or brutes. They spoke to him, but only a painfully troubled light seemed to fix across his mind as if he knew but could not remember the faces near him. "Away!" he muttered. "Another devil come to me; isn't it enough that she is here? Is there to be more blood—filth on my hands—didn't I prove every night all these years?" And then he broke into such a wild laugh, and, twining his hands into his long gray hair, cried that for him there was peace no more—never, never, never more.

The two men laid hands on him and carried him to his bed, he keeping up that terrible cry all the while, until at last he slept again, and they left him alone. They spoke of what he had heard, though each felt a dreadful sinking of the heart that neither could explain.

Next day the storm was up and came to where they were polishing the reflectors by the break of day. They started as seeing him, but did not speak. But when the movements and laughed coolly, with a more dreadful meaning in his face than he had last night.

"Well, Sholto, my lad, how fares it now? How's the weather? Wasn't I ill last night? Didn't I talk as if I was mad? Ha! ha! He mad!"

"Very ill," said the other. "You did talk as if—"

"As if I was dreaming; so I was; I dreamed that I was fifteen years ago—"

"Fifteen years ago," said Martin, under his breath.

"And I was living on this coast—"

"On this coast," again echoed the other, as if unconsciously.

"And there was a lady—"

"Stop!" said Sholto, suddenly laying his heavy hands on the old man's mouth. "I, for one, want to hear of no dreams. God forgive us all, for we are but poor, weak creatures, that have enough to do with waking visions, I'm sure, to work. I'm near worn out; but all I want to do is to work till I die, and not to listen nor to talk. If poor Letty finds my bones here she'll have 'em buried decently—that's all we have to think of now."

From most men these few words would show some intensity of feeling; with Sholto they were as if wrung from a strong heart and a brave spirit utterly broken down. So long as the two old men had suffered together they suffered cheerfully, for they were together no longer. Out of the grave of memory a spirit had arisen and put them asunder; a memory of some dead—Sholto dared not ask what—which had poisoned the life of his friend, between whom and himself confidence, trust, esteem could exist no more. Worse than all, his daughter Letty loved young Martin, and the wedding had been fixed to take place in the spring, and the plans of the young couple had been one of the most frequent topics of conversation. But how would it be now? Martin Brunner was—what? Were his ravings the confessions of a guilty conscience or not? He hardly dared to think.

For all that he determined not to seem different to young Martin; but his very effort to appear unchanged made him more and more watch and think about their work as if suspicious and afraid of each other.

At last, when they least expected it, help came. Just at the moment when it seemed to them that body and senses would hold out no longer there was a shout outside, and a knocking at the light-house, ahoy!" and in a moment more the desolate room was full of busy life. The relief men, other men—kind, rough men—crowded, large but unburned, perhaps, but with eyes full of sympathy. A moment more and the lamps of life, so nearly out, were trimmed, and the famished men were saved. A kind, good lady had come with them—a Sister of Mercy, from foreign parts, and best of all, Letty Sholto, old Sholto's daughter! She had been the first in the relief boat; she it was who had encouraged all the rest, and, when others had given up hoping, had watched for the light. She was the first faint light that told of better weather; and, in her old motherly way, had cared tenderly to put off in their boat, had seized an oar and dared them to follow. Well, was not her father in the light-house, and her very heart beating there?

But the shadow of the mystery had fallen upon all like a blight. Every minute seemed an hour, and every hour a day, if time is to be measured by anxiety and grief.

It was impossible that with these rough outspoken men their looks should be hid. Martin Brunner was the first to speak. Beckoning Sholto aside, he said he had a word or two to say. "I know if, lad," was the answer made in return. "Speak out like a man; you've been one so far."

"This dream of my father's is a dreadful thing," said the young man, in a low, hurried voice.

"Lookee here, young man," said the other. "For sixty years, man and boy, I've lived on this coast, and never yet told a lie, and don't mean to begin. Not a stain has been on our character, or any of my people, all that time, and if he hadn't come among us now and then, I'd have given it myself, and—and—Letty—poor lass!" and the man turned away.

"Sholto," said Martin, earnestly, "I know what you'd say, and I'll not ask you to say it. This night I'll go away—me and father both: she sha'n't have this curse upon her. I'll go away, don't ever tell it to her—in time she'll maybe forget me."

"Martin," said the other, "I'm a poor weak man, and perhaps wrong; but I love my child, and I won't bid you stay."

Letty had approached silently while this was said, and had heard every word; but how changed she was! The girl—scarcely more—had suddenly grown in a woman's form. Her face was pale, a resolution had come into that gentle face. She put her hand into Martin's, and looked from one to the other.

"What is this!" she said; "who shall part us—who can?"

"That young man's father knows, girl. Ask him," said her father.

"Then I will," said she, calmly, and turned to go to where the old man had been sitting, covering over the stove.

But he too had come near and suddenly spoke:

"Neighbors, you've been kind to me; you've been kind to me; you've been kind to me!" over. For fourteen years I've had about me a dreadful secret, day and night. Day and night she has never left me—Letty here—by with the long black cloak with hanging sleeves, and a black hood with white next the face."

The good lady that had come in the boat stepped back; delicacy, perhaps, made her keep out of sight.

"It happened a good many years ago. I can't remember the time; but it was before I came here, that I was poor, desperately poor. I hadn't been always as I am now. I went into battle and was Harding and myself had gone down the hill together. Lost our work, lost our friends, and lived the last I don't myself know how. I'd a dreadful desperate house, with only a few sticks to call furniture, and often, very often, but hard crusts to eat, or a raw turnip out in the fields. Well, he was a bad fellow, mates; but a rat would have been company, and we used to get together.

"One night we were sitting by the cold hearth, with our bellies empty and our hearts sick—too cold and hungry and lonely to talk or even to think.

"All of a sudden there comes a knock to the door, and I opened it, and there was a stranger want us. It was a lady on a pony, and she asked if we could direct her to some house or place of shelter, for she had lost her way.

"It was a bitter night and raining hard; it wasn't safe for any lady to be abroad that didn't know the coast, and I told her so, and—and—I—I said, 'Madam, we are very poor men, and have but a bare floor and a roof to offer you—it's shelter, though, for a few hours, and you're welcome to it.'

"I'll take it gladly,' says she, and so gets off her pony and comes in. She was a pretty woman with a good voice, and she was dressed in a long cloak with hanging sleeves, and a black hood with white next the face. She had with her a pair of saddle-bags, and she asked us to carry them up stairs for her as they were heavy; and I took them up, and then she went herself to lie down, for she was very tired. As she took us good-night she gave us money, and so with a 'God bless ye!' was gone.

"We sat a long time and never spoke. At last Harding looks at me aside, and says he, 'I think she's asleep.' We listened, and there was no sound.

"'We're very poor,' says he; and then we listened again.

"These saddle-bags were heavy; I still I did not speak. 'Did you hear her say there was money?'

"Still I did not speak. I could not. Mates, I was hungry. Stupid, sick, careless with poverty for days and days and months. Mates, I didn't stir when, with a long, long look, straight into my eyes, a dreadful look, he gets up and slowly creeps up the stairs, stopping and listening on every step. Mates, I didn't stir when I heard the floor above creak once, twice. Mates, I didn't stir off my chair when I heard the rustle of clothes and a dull sort of blow. Mates, d'ye hear me, I didn't shriek—I didn't yell or rush from the house—but sat upon the hearth-stone, and when he had scurried home, to that accursed forever night, when I heard a kind of long, long heavy sigh up in the room above, and I like drew myself together, was found, mates, near drowned, made just before he turned over and died. But as God is up in the universe, although I knew he meant to do her, I spring at him like a tiger when I saw him come down those stairs carrying in his arms the lifeless body of the poor lady.

"He was heavy for me and fling me back; she lying on the ground and never moving while we fought till I was stunned by a full stun the head. Then I got up, came to myself, which I did soon, he was on his knees counting money—gold and silver and bank-notes. He looked up and our eyes met. 'Jack Brunner,' says he, 'it's done now, and it's got to be hid; so you'd better get up and help me, or I shall have to shut your mouth like I did hers.'

"What devil had entered into him that he should have such power over me? I don't know, but I obeyed him. I didn't think of safety for myself, though I knew that nothing could make any one believe that I had a hand in that cursed deed. Mates, don't turn from me; I cried like a child when I knelt down by her side, and took her head in my arms and looked where his knife had cut into her white throat. Then I lifted her up and carried her out.

"I took her out into the cold silent night. I took her out where the stars were shining—for the rain had ceased now—and the moon lit up all around with ghastly light. I took her down by the place where the tide was out and the sand was dry and soft, and I laid her there in a shallow grave scooped out with my hands. I laid her down where her face seemed to move with a sweet smile as if she forgave me, and I didn't cover it up. And I went away, and never looked back, or that house, or Harding any more. And from that day to this she has been with me, and from that day to this she has been left me—by the long cloak with hanging sleeves, and a black hood with white next the face."

With these words a great fear fell upon all there, in that rock-bound dwelling; for as the old man ceased, and, hiding his face, was silent for a long while, a tall form rose from the hearth-stone facing the gloom in which she had stood, and with finger pointed it was seen to be Letty Sholto.

"By the mercy of God, I had not lain in the sand long before a boat came there and found me out as I had prayed it might be delivered me; and I was saved, though my wound was severe, and I was ill for many long months. Living abroad since for many years, I only heard of Harding's death a few days ago; and I thank our Heavenly Father, who has guided me to this place to forgive with my life as in my heart, this deed long ago."

And the strange lady had a sweet face and a gentle voice, and she wore a long cloak with hanging sleeves, and a black hood with white next the face.

Great joy came on all. Old Martin's cry of "A ghost, a ghost!" was loud and shrill, and he fell at her feet with his head in his old strong arms lifted him up, and old Sholto only brushed away tears from his honest face as his daughter took the old man's hand and kissed it with gentle honest, while the strange lady knelt down before a little cross which she took from the chain about her neck.

HON. CALEB CUSHING,

PRESIDENT OF THE CHARLESTON CONVENTION.

We give on the next page a portrait of Hon. Caleb Cushing, who presents, via our pencil, over the Democratic Nominating Convention at Charleston, South Carolina. Mr. Cushing has been frequently and prominently before the public, and his features are familiar to many.

He is a man of sixty years of age, having been born in Essex County, Massachusetts, in 1800. He was bred a lawyer, and practiced for many years at Newburyport, Massachusetts. At the age of twenty-two he published a number of the Massachusetts Legislature, and served two terms. In 1829-'30 he published his first works—a "Review of Fenimore Cooper's Reminiscences of Spain," and beams connected with the North American Review, which was then the focus of all the best writing in New England. His first Congressional term began in 1835; he served four consecutive terms with credit, and only relinquished his seat when he went to China by President Tyler. He concluded the famous Cushing Treaty, in which, as a recent well-informed writer says that it is the best treaty ever made with the Chinese either by the Americans or any other foreign power." On the outbreak of the war in Mexico Mr. Cushing, like Mr. Pierce and Mr. Davis, volunteered; and, like them, rose to the rank of Brigadier-General. At the close of the war General Cushing resumed the seat he had formerly occupied in the State Legislature, and held it until, in 1853, he was made a Judge of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. Under Mr. Pierce, as is known, he became Attorney General, and discharged the duties of that onerous office with fidelity and ability. In March, 1857, he retired to Massachusetts.

Mr. Cushing is an ardent Democrat, rather of the Southern than the Northern school. His choice for President is believed to be Jefferson Davis.

THE SOUTHERN BOLTERS IN CONVENTION.

We give on next page a picture of the Southern bolters from the National Democratic Nominating Convention at Charleston as they met in St. Andrew's Hall on the evening of 30th April. The States represented, in whole or in part, were Alabama, Kentucky, Delaware, South Carolina, Louisiana, Maryland, Virginia, Georgia, and Florida. The assemblage was organized by the election of John C. Preston, of South Carolina, to the chair.

CHAPTER XIII.

A MANLY FANDANGO.

TWILIGHTS had taken the place of the red sun, the stars came timidly out one by one, and then in sparkling clusters the brilliant constellations illumined the blue heavens as the rosy twilight faded again away. Then the regular full moon silet came with a tranquil musical sound upon the white pebbly beach, the cracks in the holes and crevices of the rocks began their plaintive whistlings, the frogs and alligators joined in the chorus from the low lagoon in the distance, and the early night of the tropic had begun. But louder far than the hum of the insects and reptiles, and louder than the chorus of the frogs, arose the wild shouts and songs of the pirates carousing, where the torches and wax lights lit up the scene of their orgies until the first light of day. The great mess-room was a blaze of light from candles and lamps, stuck in brackets or held sconce-shaped in the walls, or hanging very in broken chandeliers from the lofty beams. The remains of their feast had been cleared away, and the tables were covered with bottles, cups, and glasses, with boxes of cigars and pans of lighted coals. At one end of the room was a large table, which was laid a dozen deck with a broad silver border—sometimes used by the Padre on great occasions—and covered with cards and piles of Mexican or Spanish dollars. At the other end was a raised platform, where were four or five swarthy fellows with guitars in their hands, strumming away in the clear rattling harmony of Spanish boleros and dances, shrieking out at intervals snatches of songs in time to the music, or twirling the instruments around their heads in a frenzy of excitement. At the floor were more of the excited band vociferating with almost superhuman fluency in various languages their exploits, pausing occasionally to blow the bubbles from their glasses together, and then chattering and yelling on as before. In the centre of the apartment were nearly half dozen of the men, who sat either spinning around the floor in the waltz or moving with a certain air of careless, manly grace, one with another, in the dance of the fandango. There were at the least some sixty or seventy of these fellows in the room together. Most of them were those above the waist high, with silk sashes around their waists, with broad shoulders, large gold ear-rings, bushy whiskers, and curling hair. They were composed from all climes, from Africa to the Mexican Gulf, and their features and complexions partook of every conceivable type, from the jet black and florid complexion of the Swede to the low brow, oval, olive cheek of the Mediterranean, with its coal-black hue and fine tone of the Bight of Benin.

While the uproar was at its height, and the lofty palm roof was ringing with the gay and ribald songs and shouts of the excited crowds, two persons appeared in the door-way at the middle of the room, and entered. In a moment, as the busy revelers beheld them, the din ceased, the music was stayed, the whirling dance came to a tinkling cadence, the glasses stopped clinking, the dollars no longer chinked, and the songs and shouts died away. Each might have heard a real drop for a minute, until one of the individuals who had entered slowly advanced into the room, and threw his right hand aloft in salutation. Then burst forth a hoarse, simultaneous shout of "Viva nuestro capitan! Viva el Centipede!"

Captain Brand did not pause until he had reached the centre of the great hall, where he stood calmly looking around upon the motley groups who crowded about in circles at a respectful distance from him; and then amidst the silence he spoke up, in a hasty, off-hand manner:

"Well, my men, I am glad to see you all once more around me. You have not been so successful as I hoped, but we must take the good and ill luck as it comes, and I have no fault to find with you. The times, however, are bad enough; for I have certain news that our retreat here, where we have so long been hid, may be discovered"—the villains around held their breath and let their cigars lie dead in their mouths—"but," went on their commander, "I shall do all that is prudent in the circumstances for the benefit of all of us; and if we leave here you will still have me for your leader, and my head and heart and blade ever ready to advise or protect you." As he stopped speaking another cheer arose:

"Viva nuestro amigo! Viva! viva el Centipede y el Capitano! We stand by you until death!"

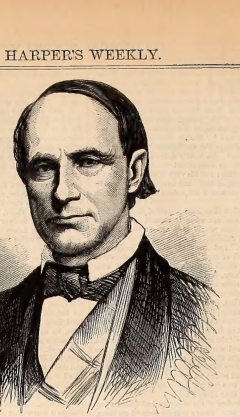
"Thank you, my friends; I have but one more word to say. The men who have the relief at the signal stations and the water battery must keep sober. Now go on again with the music."

The Captain, however, did not immediately quit the hall, but while the revel began once more with all its enthusiasm, he moved amidst the crowd of his adherents and said a cheerful word to many:

"Ah, Pepe! your arm in a sling, eh! a graze of a grape-shot, eh? Why, Hans, you here! nothing can hurt you? Well, Monsieur Antoine, how well thou art looking, and that pretty sweet-heart of thine at St. Lucie! Bah! never look sad, man; thou shalt see her again. What, my jolly Jack Tar! an ugly scratch that across your jaw—a splinter, eh? Never mind; a little plaster and half allowance of grog will put you all right again. So good-night, my friends! Adios!"

Saying these words, all addressed to the individuals in their different languages, he gave a graceful wave of his hand and passed out of the building. As he rejoined his friend, the Commander of the Panchito—who had waited at the threshold, while his wary glim of an eye searched the faces and read the thoughts of all the villains who clustered about the room—they both stepped out into the court-yard and sauntered pleasantly on toward the crag. They had not, however, proceeded many paces before they encountered the Padre and the Doctor.

"Ah!" exclaimed the Captain, who was in advance, "how goes it with my Doctor?" shaking his hand as he spoke. "Oh, mi Padre, how art thou?" turning to Ricardo.



"Salve, my son! not been so well this morning with the old rheumatism in my head."

"Drunk!" said sententiously the Doctor.

Then again with a gay laugh to the other, "Well, my Doctor, your first cruise has not been so pleasant in the Centipede as I hoped it might be, but the next may be more agreeable."

"Perhaps so, Captain Brand; but I shall have a word or two with you on that subject to-morrow; and in the mean while, Señor, I brought a little boy back with me who is ill with fever, and my quarters are so stifling hot, and the air from the lagoon is so bad, that I would like to stow him for a day or so, with your permission, in your quarters, where it is cooler."

"Certainly, Doctor; why not? my house and all in it are at your service. By-the-way, I was about to ask you and the Padre to dine with me and Don Ignacio there. Will you join us? Yes? Then let us move on, for dinner must be ready by this time, and it would be a sin to keep Babette waiting." Excusing himself for a few minutes, the Doctor went for his sick charge and returned with him in his arms to the Pirate's dwelling.

A PIRATE'S DINNER.

When the guests had assembled in the Pirate's saloon it was some minutes before their host appeared. When, however, he did step into the room from his private apartment adjoining, he was altogether an outward man of a different appearance than he presented in the early morning. In place of the loose sailor summer rig which he then wore he was now attired as a gentleman of elegant fashion of the time in which we write. His lower limbs—and very neat and straight they were—were clothed with flesh-colored silk stockings, and fitted into a pair of pointed-toed pumps with buckles of brilliants that a duchess might have envied. A pair of white cassimere breeches, which set off to advantage his well-shaped leg, were tied in a dainty bow of rose-colored satin ribbon below the knee, and fitted him like a second skin. His waistcoat was of rose-colored watered silk embroidered with silver, and which, with its flaps and ample proportions, was half-way hidden by a dress-coat of green velvet. This last garment had a sort of navy cut, with standing collar richly laced with silver, gold buttons in a double row of the size of doubloons, with loose sleeves and cuffs heavily laced with silver also. His linen was of the most gossamer fineness, the collar thrown slightly back and confined by a single clasp of rubies the size of beans, while below was a frill of cambric ruffles sparkling with opal studs framed in diamonds. The ruffles, too, at his wrist were of the most beautiful point lace, secured by royal brilliants, and he was altogether a dandy of such princely magnificence that the courtiers of the days of the old French monarchy might have taken him for a study. His manner, likewise, was every way in keeping with his splendid attire; and the ease and grace with which he excused himself to his guests for keeping them waiting certainly denoted a knowledge of a higher order of breeding and society than that in which his lot had been cast. From the very moment of his entrance, however, Don Ignacio had measured him at a glance. His single glittering eye of jet had taken him in from the laced collar of his coat to the buckles of his shoes. Not a jewel in his dress, from the flaming opals in his bosom to the brilliant stones at his wrists, and down to the sparkling clusters at his feet, did not his own uneasy optic drink in the flash and estimate the value. Nay, he calculated by instinct the weight of the gold buttons on his coat and the price of the exquisite lace which fell in snowy folds about his hands. Oh, a rum mulatto-manician was Don Ignacio! What greedy thoughts, too, passed through that little Spaniard's brain? Ah! thought he, shall I take my debt in those priceless gems, each one the ransom of a princess, which the old Capitaine General may one of these days reclaim? Hola! no! Or shall I receive more negotiable commodities in gold, cochineal, or silk? Well! veremos! we shall see!

The effect produced upon the good Padre Ricardo was altogether different. As the Captain burst with all his glorious raiment upon him he started back, and bowing before him—as if he were Saint Paul himself, and his idolater for the first time kneeling at high mass in St. Peter's—he seized his superior's white hand and kissed it with fervent devotion. Not satisfied with this mark of respect, he raised his dingy paws, holding his crucifix before him, and murmured, in a sort of ecstasy,

"Mi hijo! mi Capitano! que brillante! My son! my Captain! what a brilliant being you are!" Singularly in contrast, however, was the effect produced upon the Doctor, who merely raised his dark eyes in an abstracted gaze, gave a careless and rather contemptuous nod of recognition, and then turned to examine one of the richly inlaid cabinets which adorned the saloon. All these various phases of sympathy, attraction, or contempt, flickered like a sunbeam into Captain Brand's reflecting brain, as with a delicately perfumed handkerchief in one hand, and a gold enameled and diamond incrusted snuff-box in the other, he bowed gracefully to his visitors and seated himself at table.

"THEN BURST FORTH A HOARSE, SIMULTANEOUS SHOUT OF 'VIVA NUESTRO AMIGO! VIVA EL CAPITANO!'"

The table was now rolled out into the centre of the saloon, laid with a snowy white damask cloth, and covered with the equipage for a banquet. At either corner were noble branches of solid silver candelabra, which would have graced an altar, as perhaps they had, and holding clusters of wax lights, which shed their rays over the display below. In the centre arose a huge epergne of silver, fashioned into the shape of a drooping palm-tree, whose leaves were of frosted silver, and about the trunk playing a wilderness of monkeys. Beneath, around the board, were cut-glass decanters, flat bulbous flasks of colored Bohemian glass, crystal goblets, delicate and almost shadowy wine-cups from Venice, silver wine coolers, all mingled in a heterogeneous collection of rare china and silver dishes. Such wines, too, as filled those vessels! Not a prime or negrace, in all the lands where the vine is planted, could boast of so rare and exquisite a collection. Pure, thin, rain-water Madeira, full threescore years in bottle! Pale, limpid Port, whose color had long since gone with age, and left only the swallikbs color flasks of Johannisberg of nearly light; bottles of Tokay for lips of Cardinals; tall, slim stems of the taper flasks of the Rhine. The ruby hues of wine from the Rhone stood clustering about amidst pyramids of pine-apples, oranges, and bananas—and all loading the air of the saloon with their delicious fragrance.

When the party had become fairly seated around the board, and while the host was busying out the soup from an enormous silver tureen with a tea-cup—for it did not appear that he had ever been presented in the usual way with a ladle—fishing out the floating morsels of rich calipee, with the delicate frills of his sleeve turned back, he began the conversation in the Castilian language:

"Well, amigos, we are talking our last feast together, I fear, on this little cluster of rocks for a long time to come. Another spoonful, Doctor?"

"How!" exclaimed the Padre, as he stuffed a wedge of turtle fat in his oily mouth and opened his round black eyes to their fullest extent in manifest surprise.

"Como, mi hijo?" he repeated, as he passed a dirty paw over his smooth chin and looked inquiringly.

"Yes, Holy Father, our good friend Don Ignacio here has brought us somewhat startling intelligence. Capital soup this. I shall give Babette a dollar. Yes, the eagles and vultures are after us; all the West India fleet; the Lord only knows how many ships, and brigs, and gunboats. Glass of Madeira with you, Doctor?"—wiping his thin lips with a corner of the damask table-cloth as he spoke—"and they have tampered, too, with my old friends, the Customhouse people—take away the tureen, Babette—and in point of fact, I shouldn't be the least surprised to see a swarm of those navy gentlemen off the reef here at my moment. A sharp knife, Babette, for these teal; a duck should be cut not torn. Try that Moselle, Don Ignacio, I know your fancy for light wines. This was given me by a—Captain—[on my soul, I forget his name; he had such a pretty wife—Madame Matilde!—glancing at the frame of miniatures on the wall—"sweet creature she was! took quite a fancy for me, I believe, and might have been sitting here at this moment, but—a—really I forget her other name! However, it makes no difference—the wine is called Moselle."

Now be it here observed that Don Ignacio drank very little wine or stimulants of any sort, and never by any chance a drop from any vessel which, with his single bright eye, he did not see his host first indulge in. This self-imposed sacrifice may have been owing to his diffidence, or modesty, or deference to Captain Brand, or perhaps other and private reasons of his own; but yet he never broke through that rule of politeness and abstemiousness. Sometimes, indeed, he carried his principles so far as to refuse a meat or the fruits which his host had not partaken of, and always with a slow shake of his brown forefinger, as if he did not like even to smell the dish presented to him.

"What! not even a sip of that nectar, compadre mio?"

The compadre shook his digit and observed that drinking nectar sometimes made people sick.

The Captain laughed gayly, and said, "Ah! learning to drink does the harm, and not the art when properly acquired." During all the foregoing interlude the Doctor remained in his grave, calm way, and only when the Captain alluded to the lady whose husband's name escaped him did he show signs of interest. Then his eye followed the look toward the miniature, and his jaws came together with a slight grating spasm.

Padre Ricardo, however, was in excellent sympathetic spirits, eating and drinking like a glutton of all within his reach, and turning his full eyes, at times, as if to a deity, upon his friend the Captain. Once he spoke:

"But, my son, you were talking of leaving this quiet retreat, where we have passed so many happy hours."

"Yes, friend of my soul! Those fellows with commissions, and pennants at their mast-heads, and guns and what not, are determined to do us a mischief." The devout Padre crossed himself and pressed the crucifix to his greasy lips. "Ay! they would no doubt arraign us before some one of their legal tribunals! Put us in prison, perhaps; or maybe give us a slight squeeze in a rope or iron collar?" The Padre groaned audibly, and dropped the wing of a teal he was gnawing, forgetting, strange as it may seem, to cross himself. "Hola, mi Padre! cheer up! We are worth a million of dead men yet! The world is wide, the sea open, and a stout plank under our feet and one of these fellows"—here he balanced a long carving knife, dripping with blood-red gravy, in his hand—"in our belts, who can stop us?"

There was the cold, ferocious-eyed gleam of a dying shark in the speaker's eyes as he went on with his carving; but the priest gave a jerk of trepidation with his chin, and appeared anxious to hear more. "Don Ignacio, a bit of this roast guana; it's quite white and tender. No? Babette, give me some of that rabbit stew?" The one-eyed individual was likewise helped to some of that savory ragout, and proceeded to pick the bones with much care and deliberation.

"Still trust, my Padre! Come, come, this will never do. Join me in a bumper of this generous old Port. Bueno! may we attain the same age! But—the—the—where did this wine come from?"—holding up the decanter between the light and his one bright eye.

Don Ignacio's glittering optic pierced clear through the light ruby medium of the wine, cut-glass decanter and all, as he forcively watched his host, and was prepared to dodge in case the heavy vessel should slip out of the Captain's hand. Such things had happened, and might again; besides, a hard flint substance with a multitude of sharp projections, two or three inches thick and five or six pounds in weight, falling on a man's head might kill him. The Don thought of all this, and twitched something up his sleeve with his hand under the table. But Captain Brand, it seemed, had no intention of smashing his elegant dinner set of glass, and putting down the decanter and raising a finger to his forehead, he said, "How did that wine come into my possession?"

"Somebody gave it to you, perhaps. Quien sabe? who knows?" suggested Don Ignacio.

Without heeding the interruption the Captain's eye rested on the brilliant snuff-box on the table beside him, where the letter L was set in diamonds and blue enamel on the back, and catching it with a rap, his face lighted up, and as he took a pinch and passed the box to the Padre, he exclaimed, "Ah! now I remember my old friend—the Portuguese Countess from Oporto. Dios de mi alma! God of my soul! what a stately beauty was her daughter!"

Here Captain Brand sneezed, and drawing a delicately perfumed lace handkerchief from his waistcoat pocket blew his nose. Meanwhile the box went round the table; Padre Ricardo took a huge pinch with his dirty paws, and feasted his eyes upon the precious lid. The Doctor scarcely gave the elegant bauble a glance as he helped himself. The Don, however, examined it with the eye of a connoisseur, and not only that, but he threw a spark at the Captain's flashy waistcoat, and thought he detected some other article in the capacious pockets besides the handkerchief. Perhaps he may have been mistaken and perhaps not, though he was so very suspicious an old villain that he sometimes did his friends injustice. Nor did he put his thin brown fingers with the few grains of snuff he had dipped from the box to his sheep-skin nostrils till he had watched the effect it had produced on those around him.

"Ah! my friends, I remember distinctly now all about it," continued the Captain, as he returned the kerchief and shook a few specks of the titillating dust from his paint lace sleeve; "it is about three years ago, just before you came to live with me, Padre, that we fell in with a large ship bound to Porto Rico. She had been disabled in an awful hurricane, which had taken two of her masts clean off at the decks, and was leaking badly. We, too, had been a little hurt in the same gale, and having made a pretty good season I was anxious to get back here and give the crews a rest. Well, we made out the ship about an hour before sunset, and it was quite dark before we came up with her. There she lay, rolling like a log, though there was not much sea on, and we could hear her chain pumps clanking, and saw the water spouting out from her scuppers as pure almost as it went into her hold. As we came up alongside, they hailed me for assistance, and said the ship was sinking and could not live till morning. Of course I could give them no actual assistance, situated as I was"—here the narrator smiled—"it would have been simply absurd, you know; the idea of my putting men on board to keep her afloat for the nearest gibber, I did not dream of. However, I determined to make her a visit, and if there should be any thing to save from the wreck in an undamaged condition, why I should look around: not too much of that Port, Padre; think of your rheumatism in the morning! Doctor, you don't drink! Well, going on board, I found two lady passengers: the wife and daughter of an old Judge of the island of Porto Rico, with half a dozen servants, who were all screaming, and praying, and beseeching me to save them—all but one, a tall, graceful girl, with a large India shawl wrapped around her shoulders, her white arms glancing through the folds, and a pair of dark, liquid, almond-shaped eyes, such as I had never before seen. The fact is, my friends, I had always before fancied them. But there stood this girl with eyes like a wounded stag; I saw her in a moment, as she leaned up against the weather bulwarks, by the light of the open cabin-door. Babette, take away all but the wine and fruit and bring fire. Pass that box this way, if you please, compadre! Thank you."

Don Ignacio seemed to have an affection for the trifle, and had counted the brilliants over and over again, and made a mental calculation of their weight and value; but when he did move it as he was desired, his greedy eye followed it with fascination.

"Yes, it's very pretty, and I set a great store by it," parenthesized the host, as he resumed his tale:

"The girl never screamed or even spoke, and amidst all the hubbub of a drunken skipper and a disorderly crew she remained quiet and unmoved. To rouse the people, I told them that I would stay by the ship and do what I could for them. At this the old lady clasped me around the neck and kissed me, and blubbered over me more than she ever did, I imagined, to the old Spanish Judge, her husband—imploring me too, by all the saints she could think of, to take herself and daughter out of the sinking vessel at once. You may believe that I would much rather have been treated in that way by the lovely girl with the wonderful eyes instead of the fat, rancid, old woman beside her; but there was no help for it just then, and so I consented, with all the professions of sympathy I could make, to do as she desired.

Public Speakers and Vocalists.

A Noted Clergyman and public lecturer says of Brown's Bronchial Troches: "In all my lecturing tours, I put Troches into my carpet bag as regularly as I do lectures or linen." Public speakers, vocalists, and all others who exercise the voice, should never fail of using these Troches. They remove all other preparations in clearing and strengthening the voice, removing hoarseness, allaying irritation of the throat, and as a cough remedy are pre-eminently the best.

CHARLES PRODSHAM WATCHES.

TIFFANY & CO.,
550 Broadway, New York,

Respectfully invite the attention of their patrons and the public to an arrangement recently perfected, by which, in connection with Messrs. WILLARD & SON, of Boston, they have added the

to the Specialities of their Establishment.

To every one who desires either a luxury or necessity in accurate time keeping, this most accurate and durable of time keepers presents decisive claims. Combining the results of a long-studied application of science and of a superlatively fine finish, its excellence has been distinguished by the unique awards of

THE GOLD MEDAL AT THE LONDON EXHIBITION OF 1851.
THE GRAND MEDAL OF HONOR (THE ONLY AWARD) AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION OF 1855.
AND BY PRIZES FROM THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT AMOUNTING TO OVER $10,000.

In recommending it to their Patrons, TIFFANY & CO., after a very long and general acquaintance with the review of the best Establishments, feel that Mr. Frodsham's work by truths of extraordinary severity, are confident in asserting its superiority in every desirable respect, over any watch that has ever come under their inspection. For suitable proof of its performance are authorized to refer to the undersigned gentlemen who have purchased the Watch from them:

IRON IN THE BLOOD.

DYSPEPSIA, SCROFULA, GENERAL DEBILITY.
Affections of the Skin.
Headache.

Why is Iron beneficial in disease?
Why is it efficacious in so many diseases apparently opposite in their nature?
Why is a "PERUVIAN SYRUP," or Protected Solution of Protoxide of Iron combined, better than any other medicinal preparation of iron?

Since the remarkable cures effected through the Agency of the "PERUVIAN SYRUP" have been made public, the above questions are frequently asked respecting it. They are fully answered in a pamphlet on the "Importance of Iron in the Blood," which can be had on application. The pamphlet contains also numerous certificates of remarkable cures from the following well-known physicians, clergymen and others:

Rev. John Pierpont,	Rev. John W. Olmstead,
Rev. Warren Burton,	Lewis Johnson, M.D.,
Rev. Arthur B. Fuller,	Roswell Kinsey, M.D.,

THE PRACTICAL USES OF PHRENOLOGY are: First, To teach how to bring all parts of the system into harmonious and well-directed action. Second, To understand the function and uses of each separate organ. Third, To enable us to govern and educate each faculty and each propensity, increasing the power of some and properly diminishing that of others. Fourth, By combining these lessons, it enables us to "know ourselves," and to account readily for much of our Success, Mistakes, and evil, on Scientific PRINCIPLES. And, furthermore, it enables us to indicate, with great exactness in writing, the Precise Occupation, or "Calling" in life, in which each person may best succeed, and in which he may become most useful and happy.

[Do you fail to have a full written description when you can. It will serve your highest interests, as a practical guide through life.]

Popular Astronomy.
BY
O. M. MITCHEL, LL.D.,
Director of the Cincinnati and Dudley Observatories.
1 vol. 12mo. Illustrated. Price, $1 25.

This work, undertaken by the author, not for the use of persons already familiar with the general principles and facts of astronomy, but for

Popular Reading by the multitude, including the Family Circle, both Old and Young, has been so successfully accomplished, and so signally vindicates the possibility of simplifying and popularizing an abstruse science, that

SCARCELY ANY INTELLIGENT READER, WHO HAS GONE THROUGH A SINGLE CHAPTER, WILL BE SATISFIED UNTIL HE HAS FINISHED THE WHOLE BOOK.

The publishers, therefore, do not hesitate to express their conviction, that the work is SUPERIOR TO ANY POPULAR TREATISE ON ASTRONOMY WHICH HAS EVER BEEN OFFERED TO THE PUBLIC EITHER IN THIS COUNTRY OR IN ENGLAND.

HON. JOHN BELL, OF TENNESSEE, "UNION" CANDIDATE FOR PRESIDENT.
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY HUGHES, OF NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.]

THE UNION CANDIDATES.

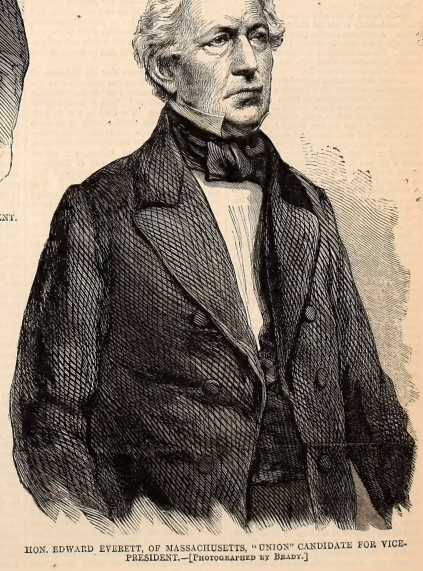
THE Party "of the Union and the Constitution," which met at Baltimore on 9th May, organized without difficulty, and on the second ballot nominated for President Hon. John Bell, of Tennessee. Hon. Edward Everett, of Massachusetts, was subsequently nominated for Vice-President. We give herewith portraits of both candidates.

HON. JOHN BELL, OF TENNESSEE.

Hon. John Bell was born near Nashville, Tennessee, on the 15th of February, 1797, and passed his early days among the honest and sagacious cultivators of the soil.

Entering Cumberland College, afterward the Nashville University, young Bell graduated in 1816, and two years afterward had mastered his legal studies and was admitted to the bar. Establishing himself at Franklin, Williamson County, he was at once recognized as one eminently well qualified to represent the people; and in 1817, when but twenty years of age, he was elected a State Senator. His début was brilliant; but he declined a re-election, preferring to devote himself to the practice of his profession.

In 1826 he became a candidate for Congress against Felix Grundy, one of the most popular men in the State of Tennessee, and who had the powerful support of Andrew Jackson, then a candidate for the Presidency against John Quincy Adams. Mr. Bell was elected. By successive elections he continued a member of the House of Representatives for fourteen years.



He entered Congress a warm admirer of Mr. Calhoun, and strongly opposed to the protective system, against which he made a speech in 1832. Subsequent investigations and reflection induced him to change his opinions on that subject. He was opposed to the appropriation of money by the general Government for roads and canals in the States, except in the case of some great road for military purposes, like the Pacific Railroad, and in favor of the policy of improving the great rivers and lake harbors. With all his apparent admiration for Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Bell opposed the South Carolina doctrine of nullification, and was made Chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, with special reference to the questions connected with that subject which might have to be considered and reported on. For ten years he was Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He was in favor of a United States Bank, though he voted against the bill for its recharter in 1832, because, as it is alleged, he believed that the subject was brought up at that time—four years before the expiration of the old charter—merely to defeat General Jackson in the ensuing Presidential election, and because he was afraid the President would veto the bill, which proved to be the case. He protested against the removal of the deposits, and refused to vote for a resolution approving that measure. This refusal was one of the causes which led to the subsequent breach between himself and President Jackson and the Democratic party, and finally to his co-operation with the Whigs. This change of party relations was much accelerated by his election to the Speakership of the House of Representatives in 1834.

In June of that year Mr. Stevenson resigned the chair upon being nominated Minister to Great Britain, and Mr. Bell was elected to succeed him, in opposition to James K. Polk, afterward President of the United States, who was the candidate of the Administration and of the Democratic party. Mr. Bell was supported by the Whigs and a portion of the Democratic party who were opposed to the intended nomination of Martin Van Buren as successor to General Jackson. The principal ground of Mr. Bell's opposition to Mr. Van Buren was his strong disapproval of the system of removals from subordinate offices for political reasons—a system which Mr. Van Buren had zealously promoted in the party conflicts of the State of New York; and which, it was supposed, he intended to carry out to its full extent in the administration of the Federal Government. The final separation between Mr. Bell and General Jackson took place in 1835, when Mr. Bell declared himself in favor of Judge White for the Presidency, in opposition to Mr. Van Buren. Up to that time there had been no opposition in Tennessee to General Jackson's Administration, and it was generally supposed that his personal and political influence could not fail to subdue the opposition raised by Judge White and his friends. The whole force of the Administration was exerted to this end. Judge White carried the State by a large majority, and Mr. Bell was re-elected to Congress. An impulse was given to the political character of Tennessee, which arrayed it in opposition to the Democracy during the four succeeding Presidential elections, 1840-'44-'48-'52.

When the reception of petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia was agitated in the House of Representatives, in 1836, Mr. Bell alone, of the Tennessee delegation, favored their reception. Subsequently, in 1838, when Atherton's resolutions were introduced, proposing to receive and lay these petitions on the table, he maintained his consistency by voting in the negative.

General Harrison, when elected President, invited Mr. Bell to enter his Cabinet as Secretary of War, a position which he resigned after Mr. Tyler became President. He was then tendered a seat in the Senate, but declined in favor of Mr. Foster. In 1847 he was elected, and in 1853 re-elected, a United States Senator from Tennessee; and his course in favor of the Compromise Measures, the internal improvement bills, the increase of our steam-navy, a Pacific railroad, agricultural colleges, and other similar measures, was as marked as was his opposition to the Nebraska Bill, the Lecompton Constitution, extravagant expenditures, and threats of disunion.

HON. EDWARD EVERETT, OF MASSACHUSETTS, "UNION" CANDIDATE FOR VICE-PRESIDENT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BEADY.]

Since his retirement from public life he has resided at his home in Nashville, where his accomplished wife and daughters are ever ready to join him in extending genuine Tennessee hospitality to their numerous friends.

HON. EDWARD EVERETT, OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. Everett, the golden-mouthed orator, was born at Dorchester, Massachusetts, in 1794. The son of a New England clergyman, he was educated with the care which such a father was likely to bestow on a son. His precocious was the fact, at thirteen he matriculated at Harvard, and graduated with honors four years later. His aptitude as a linguist was so notorious that the ruling powers of Harvard College kept their eye on him; and soon after he left the University, before he was twenty-one, he was offered the professorship of Greek, with the condition that, if he accepted it, he must spend three years in European travel, in order to fit himself for his duties.

In 1819 Mr. Everett entered upon the discharge of his duties as Professor of Greek; and shortly afterward, the editorship of the North American Review falling vacant, he assumed charge of that journal, and raised it to a high rank in literature.

In 1824, when Mr. Everett was thirty years of age, he began, simultaneously, his career as a politician and as an orator. An exhibit which he delivered in presence of the venerable Lafayette in that year attracted universal attention to his extraordinary powers; and from that time forth he became one of the leading orators of the country. In the same year he was sent to Congress from Middlesex. In the House he was chiefly noted for his industrious habits and vast learning. He was an invaluable man on committees. On all debates of importance his voice was heard; but he never sought to make speeches for the sake of hearing his own voice. What he said was brief and to the point. Thus, especially from New England, frequently thronged the House when he was to speak, in the expectation of hearing a grand oration; but they were generally disappointed. Mr. Everett never made a show of oratory in the House.

After ten years arduous labor in Congress, Mr. Everett was elected Governor of Massachusetts, which office he held, to the satisfaction of the people of that State for four consecutive years. In 1839 he was again a candidate, but was defeated by one vote out of over 100,000 cast. This defeat happily left him free to accept the mission to England, which was tendered him by the administration of Mr. Van Buren.

He was absent four years, during which time he won golden opinions from persons of every class in England. Among the statesmen who stand as high as Edward Everett in the British judgment at the present time. He was described by an English man at a table where we happened to be as a very important questions, yet so conciliatory as to leave any one to suppose that he was ready to yield every point in dispute and nothing as a mere argument "stuffed full of facts," and "as obstinate a Yankee as you could meet with in a month's journey in New England."

On his return to his own country he assumed the Presidentship of his old University at Cambridge. At that moment he had happily placed him beyond the necessity of daily labor for a livelihood. He was enabled to indulge to his heart's content in the studies which were dear to him, and which are the best solace of life.

Accident disturbed his pleasing labors. He was unexpectedly called to fill a leading office in the Cabinet—the Secretaryship of State. He abandoned his library, and betook himself to the drudgery of official life with as much cheerfulness as he had displayed when his first public honors burst upon him. His most important public act—his letter on the Texas question—was indited and published after his resignation of office; but the character of the man gave it importance; and there is reason to believe that it was not without influence on the mind of the leading statesmen of England. A subsequent and senatorial career justified the expectations which had been entertained of Mr. Everett. He played the part of a philosopher and a sage, and held himself aloof from the petty squabbles of politicians.

His subsequent career has been tranquil. He has appeared in public as an orator only. His oration on Charity; his oration on Washington; the profits of which are destined for the Washington Monument, and which has done more for that structure than all the private contributions of the public put together; his oration on Astronomy at the opening of the Cincinnati Astronomical Hall, in August, 1856, are master-pieces of eloquence which will live for centuries after Burke, and Sheridan, and Patrick Henry, and will be learned by boys in schools in ages far hidden in the future. If every one who has been charmed by Mr. Everett's orations votes for him he will probably preside over the Senate from 1861 to 1865.

OUR DIRTY LINEN AIRED ABROAD.

THE dirty linen which our Representatives in Congress and our metropolitan journals have been airing in Investigating Committees and leading articles has at length attracted attention abroad, and we are favored with a letter from Lord Macaulay, a speech from Earl Grey, and several articles in the London Times on the decline and fall of the Republic of the United States. The authorities of Lord Macaulay's assault upon American institutions is doubtful; his secretary and confidential friend assures the public that the great historian held opinions absolutely contrary to those expressed in the letter to Mr. Randall. But of the genuineness of the Grey and Times jeremiads there is no question. Their weight and authority are impaired, indeed, by the circumstance that both Earl Grey and the Times are opposing Lord John Russell's new Reform Bill, which, being democratic in its tendency, is liable to be injured by any exposition of the evils of democracy. Both assailants are interested, and therefore unreliable witnesses. But let that pass. Several of our own journals, more or less influenced by party political considerations, are disposed to admit the truth of Earl Grey's charges against this country; it is therefore worth while to look into them.

Earl Grey says: 1. That "the checks" provided by "the framers of the federal Constitution" against "the dangers of an unbalanced democracy" have been "almost swept away." I. When, and where? Whatever "checks" the federal Constitution may have originally contained against "the dangers of an unbalanced democracy" is existing still; for it has never been altered since the days of Washington and Jefferson. The Earl's knowledge of history is at fault.

2. He adds, that "it is admitted that the ablest and most enlightened citizens of the United States are absolutely excluded from all share in the government." I. Where is the mere idle rhodomontade of partisan presses and partisan speakers. The very contrary is the truth. The ablest and most enlightened citizens of the United States are to be found in the ranks of our political parties, and nowhere else. Where will you find, in private life, men of the ability of Webster, Clay, Calhoun, James Buchanan, William H. Seward, Jefferson Davis, James Guthrie, Nathaniel P. Banks, John A. Dix, and a dozen other eminent political leaders of the day? Is it in letters? The foremost historian of the country was Secretary of the Navy, and is a political leader; Mr. Everett has been Minister to England, Secretary of State, Hawthorne has just returned from the Liverpool consulship; Mr. Bryant is a leader of the Republican party. Is it in law? With rare exceptions all the foremost politicians of the day are also the leading lawyers of the country, and have abandoned the highest prizes at the bar for the more arduous and responsible duties. The men may be found, doubtless, in the ranks of science who are not politicians; but who would want Agassiz, or Dr. Carnochan, or Professor Peirce to study? Is it in literature? Who would eagerly would—by attempting a Congressional career? With the exception of these latter, all the commanding minds of the country are to be found in one or other of our political parties; and so far from its being true that ability and enlightenment are a bar to political influence, it may be asserted that they never were, and never was, a country in which able and enlightened men were so sure of that influence as they are here.

3. Earl Grey charges that the influence of the mob on our politics has imparted "an unscrupulous, overbearing tone" to our "dealings with foreign nations." This is a most English perversion of fact. The truth is, that no freeborn nation in the world submits to as much bullying by foreign powers as the United States. Our foreign Ministers and consuls, our navy and Congressmen and editors, are valiant enough in the newspapers and at Tammany Hall; but their despatches, their dispatches, they roar as gently as any sucking dove. Look at the unparalleled forbearance of the United States in the Enlistment dispute: at the mock way in which we suffer France to seize our Essential tolls on our shipping; at the long-suffering patience with which the Sound Dues question was compromised; the humiliating manner in which we submit to Spanish insolence, at the cowardly tolerance of Mexican assaults upon our countrymen; at the whole course of American diplomacy for the past twenty years; and let any honest man say whether weak and conciliatory are not more fitting epithets to apply to it than unscrupulous and overbearing! Earl Grey betrays himself when he adds that, but for England's forbearance to unstreating us as "spoilt children"—there would have been a war between this country and Great Britain before this. We never had a dispute with England in which we did not yield something of what our people deemed their fair rights for the sake of peace. We always have yielded, and always will yield—because we believe that yielding is, on the whole, less costly and troublesome than fighting. Earl Grey's approach reminds one of the footpad who took a gentleman's watch, hat, and boots; but, on his victim's pleading that he could not walk without boots, restored the latter, exclaiming that he never met so unconscionable and overbearing a fellow, and pray what would he want to bully him out of next?

4. Earl Grey charges that, while the commercial policy of England has been directed toward the removal of restrictions on commerce, ours "has maintained the narrowest system of exploded protection." This, as every one knows, is simply not true. The last two tariffs have each been steps toward free trade; and no man of any character in this country wishes to revive protective duties. At the same time, it must be remembered that protection never pressed as heavily on our people as it did on the pauper laborers of England, and there was the less necessity to be in a hurry to change our system.

5. Earl Grey complains of the coarseness and vulgarity of our Congressional proceedings. This is singularly suggestive of the remark of the exquisite in the old play, who was shocked at the rough dirt which defiled the clothes of soldiers in battle, and inquired why fighting could not be carried on in a gentlemanly way, so that a gentleman could go into battle and yet keep his clothes clean and not soil his ruffles? It is very easy for Englishmen to be grandly polite and ceremonious in Parliament when they have no topics for discussion more exciting than church rates, or the substitution of a £5 for a £10 franchise; but if Parliament had a vital, all-engrossing theme before it like American Slavery, members would as soon forget their good-breeding as our Congressmen do, and squires whose whole patrimony was at stake would be as violent in its defense as Mr. Barksdale or Governor M'Rae. Let a bill be introduced into the British Parliament for the abolition of primogeniture, or the confiscation of the estates of absentees, and then let us look out for polite discussion, elegant language, and courteous forbearance. The Congressional Globe contains no grosser instances of coarse language and violent temper than are to be found in Hansard on every occasion when the public mind in England has been profoundly stirred. In France, during the Constituent Assembly, there was an average of two or three duels every morning, growing out of the previous day's debate. The fact, politeness and courtesy are excellent things; but they are only to be expected to find them in debates which turn on the question whether people shall be robbed of their property or their lives.

6. Earl Grey makes a great point about the corruption which pervades our politics. The charge is well founded. Our State legislatures are generally corrupt. There are corrupt men in Congress; and the distribution of federal patronage is on a corrupt principle. There is a vast deal of corruption in our electoral business, which, however, is mainly due to our being blessed with a large influx of countrymen of Earl Grey, who are ignorant and unprincipled, and who are willing to sell their own votes to prevent the polling of other men's votes. But, after all, in this matter who shall throw the first stone? In the English journal in which we find the report of Earl Grey's speech several columns are devoted to an inquiry into a case of bribery at an English election; and we have reason to believe that there are generally even more merchantable throughout Great Britain than here. Not many years since a wealthy Englishman wanted to get into Parliament for a specific purpose, and came to an agent—the procuring of Parliamentary seats is a regular business in England—paid the sum demanded, and was duly elected. He achieved his purpose; but, being an economical man, he thought he would try what money could do. The borough which he represented sent two members to Parliament. The moral election came round on, he visited his Parliamentary agents and inquired the price of securing the other seat in his pocket for a ticket-of-leave man—a discharged convict, who had annoyed his neighborhood by getting drunk and breaking windows. A large sum was mentioned—and paid. In due time the ticket-of-leave man took his seat in the House. Shortly after the organization this eccentric member rose to resign his seat. He said that he felt he was not wanted there. His colleague—who had contented himself for a few years since, had been transported, restored to his home on a ticket of leave, and elevated to a seat in Parliament—was at once exposed to such a storm of hisses as to cause him to resign his seat. So far as his own seat was concerned, it was his intention to have a Parliamentary career of it, and he had no doubt that, with a sufficient sum of money, his efficient Parliamentary agents would have him elected.

This story, we think, will fairly balance the gossip about corrupt contracts on which Earl Grey dwells with so much unction; and we have not wasted time in referring to the recent exposures of corruption in the British navy yards, in the commissariat, and in the army. Earl Grey writing us with political corruptions is like the bituminator complaining of the voracity of the tom-tit.

We need not say that we are not blind to the great evils which embarrass the working of our political system. Very few presses have denounced them with more earnestness than ourselves. But we do not believe that they are inherent in, or consequences of, that system; nor can we see any other which offers a fair prospect of their alleviation. If it were possible to erect a monarchy or an oligarchy in this country, there is no reason for supposing that the change would afford any relief, while it would certainly entail new inconveniences from which we are now free. We believe, honestly, that in the intelligent masses of this country there is a desire and a capacity to cure the more flagrant abuses of our political affairs. The all-engrossing Slavery controversy at present diverts attention from the subject. Were that settled—even for a brief period—the work of reform would be commenced, and a very few simple provisions of law and administration would work a great improvement. We do not believe that twenty-five millions of educated men are incapable of self-government. In every society the friends of good government must largely outnumber the advocates of that which is bad; and when people learn that self-government involves a duty as well as a privilege, the rogues will necessarily be swamped. 'Tis a mere question of time; and for our part, despite Earl Grey, we are proud to say that we do not despair of the Republic.

BANK THIEVES.

THE Cashier of the Union Bank, in London, has just been detected in a petty defalcation of $1,300,000. The Union Bank kept its account with the Bank of England, as New York bankers keep their account with the Bank of Commerce, or the Republic, or the Metropolitan. The Cashier had two pass-books, one of which went to the Bank of England daily, and showed the true balance due the Union Bank; the other went to the Accountant of the Union Bank, and showed just the balance which the Cashier chose to leave. By skillfully watching sleight of hand with the two the Cashier was enabled to carry on a system of defalcation for five years; was able through the year 1857 without detection, and to steal and to lose in stock speculations over a million and a quarter of pounds. This, we believe, the greatest defalcation on record.

A wholesome moral may be drawn from it. Efficient supervision of the affairs of the Union Bank by the President and Directors would have brought the fraud to light within a month —before the bank had lost any money worth mentioning. Their neglect costs the bank $1,300,000. Are there any instances in this country which are left exclusively to the management of cashiers, and whose ruling authorities are content with a formal appearance of supervision?

We have seen a good many defalcations in American banks, but we never knew of any which ought not to have been prevented and guarded against. As a general rule, in this country, defalcations are committed by clerks, tellers, and cashiers, who fall into extravagant habits, speculate, or live profusely, and naturally defray their expenses out of the moneys which pass through their hands. In nine cases out of ten the expenditures of defaulting clerks have been for months or years a marvel and a puzzle to their entire acquaintance, save only the officers of the bank which they were robbing. It almost invariably turns out in their trial that every body foresaw the result except the parties directly interested therein. A little care on the part of their employers, a reasonable watchfulness over their habits and acquaintance, would, in nine cases out of ten, have saved all. Had the President of the plundered bank taken the trouble to "keep track" of the defaulter in his private life there would have been no defalcation.

This Union Bank case is different in character; it reminds one of the Schuyler frauds. The Cashier had been many years in the bank, was trusted, and was respected for his industry and ability as a banker. Having won this trust and respect, he was held to be above suspicion—whence the catastrophe. Bankers should learn from the case that, in banking business no man should be so implicitly trusted as not to be subject to supervision. Presidents must not blindly trust cashiers; directors must not blindly trust presidents; shareholders must not blindly trust directors. Human nature—in speculative communities—should never be exposed to too cruel temptation; the man who is not rigidly honest if he knows he is watched may fall away through weakness when he sees that detection is unlikely. Nor should any bank president rely upon what is stupidly called "a system of checks." The "system of checks" in use at the Union Bank of London is said to have been the most perfect in the world; yet we see how thoroughly it was evaded, and for five long years! There never was a "system of checks" which a smart rogue could not evade.

The case for bank managers, and the only safe plan, is—first, to know all their employés socially, to see how they live, with whom, at what cost, with what relationships, and what habits; and, secondly, never to trust any servant of the bank in any thing, but always, at proper intervals, to ascertain by personal inspection the true condition of affairs. A careful observance of these rules would render defalcations impossible.

THE LOUNGER.

THE ANNIVERSARIES.

UNIVERSAL benevolence has had its long week of festival. The annual meeting, mingling, and talking have taken place. Causes of every variety and grade of importance have been heard in their defense, explanation, and glorification. The susperfluous steam of feeling which accumulates during the year has been blown off at the safety-valve of an anniversary meeting, with endless speeches. Earl Grey had better reconsider his diatribes. Let him contemplate anew our religious and benevolent character, calculated in hard Federal currency.

It is easy to joke about the speechifying; much easier than it is, by-the-by, to make speeches. For if we have the "gift of the gab" in this country, we are apt to indulge it in "long and windy" good article." His lordship might perhaps take notice that the parliamentary quality of speaking would not serve on occasions. Public orations in which eloquence is in bad taste are not the orations Yankee Doodle is wont to hear. He prefers his ale of the triple X, and entirely eschews the lighter wines of the Continent.

Therefore during every anniversary week there is a great deal of good, hearty talk, and of the most earnest and stimulating eloquence, in the City of New York. The meetings are not unlike the Eastern caravanseries in which the trader from Aleppo finds himself side by side with the trader from Bagdad, and the Nubian merchant chaffers with a Jew. Each displays and commends his particular wares, and the Bedouin handkerchief contends with the Persian rug. So we have every kind of orator, from every part of the land, and every kind of oration. For it happens that the Bedouin handkerchief is not always wrought with pure gold, and the Persian rug may be sadly threadbare.

The performance of this particular week in the year necessarily makes us think of the value and character of associative effort. When individual action is superseded by the organized co-operation of multitudes, formality and mechanism unquestionably set in. It is the difference between going and taking a family yourself and giving a man two shillings to go in your place. Better so, certainly, than that the family should starve. But what is the true answer? "Little children, love one another!—The associated effort may be charity and Christianity—doubtful it is; but it is not a mechanical charity. And while we do not therefore deny nor depreciate the good it may produce, it might be well to think at the other end of the individual, and not be satisfied with this, as if it were really the thing. It is not enough to give all your relations even to the Foreign Islanders, the young man did that.

The tendency of the great society for doing good, whatever else it may be, is to obscure the sharp outlines of the Bible story of the young man.

The other point is, that all the discussion helps a general moral and intellectual activity. The blowing of the sea—the blowing of the wind—the more potential voice of man—these are the enemies of material and moral stupidity and death. It is not enough to have a great thought or a grand impulse. You must want to express it. "I thought he was a man of mind," I found that he did not care for an audience," was a very sensible and profound remark. So it is the voice which removes the slide, and sets the light in the heart and will not to shine out and illuminate the world. It is the voice of John the Baptist which announces the celestial morning. It is the voice of Luther which thunders the mene, mene, in the halls of the Vatican. It is the voice of Hampden which calls Cromwell, and the Court in Westminster Hall. It is the voice of Patrick Henry, and of James Otis, and of the Sons of Liberty which intones the Declaration of Independence.

In like manner, the eloquent voices, upon a hundred subjects which make up the charm of the Anniversary week, express the doubts, the dangers, the fears, the hopes, the weakness, and the heroism of the multitudinous objects which make our sympathies active all our talk, and we are satisfied. Every tyrant with a profoundly sagacious instinct shuns the voice; for he knows that the eloquent voice has two ends—one in the heart of the speaker, and the other in that of the hearer.

THE OTHER SIDE.

THE great lesson of experience is that there are two sides to every question, and the great truth of history is that we never learn it. In the small-est and the largest issues we are equally forgetful of it. Here is the case of Mr. Collier, the Shakespearian scholar, which offers the latest illustration. He was a man of estimable life, of unblemished character, of veracity never questioned, and he published some emendations of Shakespeare which he said he had found in an old folio copy that came to his hands by chance. With the enthusiasm of a student he suggested that they might have been written by Shakespeare, and, in a manner, authoritative. There was nothing impossible or improbable in any claim or statement made by Mr. Collier. The folio was old, the writing was there, the emendations, as Mr. White justly said in "Shakespeare's Scholar," would, in the absence of evidence of authority, be taken for what they were worth. That a man like Mr. Collier, whose reputation was that of a sound and scholar, should perpetrate a dull forgery, of a kind which by reiteration has long ago lost its point as a joke and remains only a stupid crime, was too incredible. He had nothing to gain by it. His antecedents offered no justification of it; and the whole proceeding would have argued a sudden paralysis of the moral sense amounting to an insanity.

Still the suspicion was suggested. The reader does not think any more highly of the commentators for that fact. It looked and looks like a personal jealousy. But the vein of suspicion once opened was worked with untiring alacrity, until a charge of utter falsity and the meanest forgery was dug out and flung at Mr. Collier. For the last year or two, in consequence, there has been that degrestory talking of bonds over him which amounts to a reluctant verdict of guilty upon all the counts. The general conviction has undoubtedly been that Mr. Collier was a literary forger.

And now suddenly the other side flashes into light, and it turns out that he is nothing of the kind. The author of the chief pamphlet against him is suddenly revealed as the especial friend of the superintendent of MSS. in the British Museum, whose appointment Mr. Collier had not favored. The marvelous details of evidence, upon clear investigation, utterly disappear. The character of the ink is satisfactorily explained. The marking process—the different forms of letters in the pencil and the pen-strokes are cleared up. A gentleman testifies to his knowledge of the folio before Mr. Collier bought it. The whole charge sinks like smoke, and the much accused and abused commentator appears to be as honest as other men.

I do almost wish that Mr. Collier had the test of it. Possession is nine points of the law. And so every side is fair and every statement conclusive until the other side is heard. It is because no lesson of good name arising from the strong representation of one side only. Men have the reputation of forgers, murderers, and thieves through error merely because they have not been heard. We rarely hear what a man says, for instance, but only what somebody else says he said, or thought he said, or heard he said.

HOW THE BEARER WONDERED WHAT WAS IN THE BASKET.

WHAT would be in the basket!
Well might she wonder so!
With a sudden look of vague anxiety
At the bright-probable contrariety,
If he had left it, and ran back a minute,
That he never might know what was in it!

The basket was not of that normal type
Stout and grim, which Fishmongers use,
Which we see adorning the black silk legs
Of Yankee fanciers of the reptilian
With a marvelous undecided concretion
Of "isinglass," southern-wood, prince's-feather,
Apples, and White-pepper, crammed together.
This side-spread basket, made of rattan,
Why, it might have come from Manhattan,
Hyde—or Hyderabad, Basket-peer—
Any described or undescribed!
The cover was—like the inquiries—cheched;
Only think what that Indian Madras might protect!
As Easter—well, as Whit-Sunday, or Christmas!
A yatagban's finery luxuriant pride;
Or, perhaps only the thing to shield the odds—
Some ripened kinkils, in their rich, fruity pods.

Was it a baby?
Maybe.
If "twere a bonnet,
Somebody must have sat down upon it;
It showed such a little bandbox air about it.
There hardly seemed the ghost of a chance
That it should be so.
Yet, thinking of that,
A horror stole o'er him from head to heel—
A sort of "scarce"—such as we feel
At a lordship, unnamed, fiendish guest
At a wedding—that he thing we like best!

What sizes it! Dough-nuts? hard cider? salt fish?
Some well-beloved and national dish?
But it had no smell.
It didn't exercise—it didn't stir.
Perhaps she killed it before she started!
Nay England women are so cold-hearted!

THE PRINCE OF WALES.

By the time we have been civil to the Japanese Embassadors, and have shown them the great public institutions of Old Bailey and the Cattle Exhibition Market, his Highness of Wales will be at our doors. It will be a pleasure to him, doubtless, to entertain with the hospitalities of the City Hall. A gentleman himself—by which all sensible men mean a man of native refinement, of education, and of more or less conventional culture (although this last quality is usually thought sufficient capital for a gentleman)—he will naturally wish to associate with gentlemen, and the Prince will naturally find his way to the Committee of the Common Council and Aldermen.

Being pre-eminently men, they are the proper hosts of the city's guest. They will show him, in their general deportment, the social graces, the courtesies of the attitudes which have endeared the name of American to gentlemen every where in the world. His stately conversation, also, of that will explain to his princely mind the secret of our triumphant position, which the world so gladly yields and acknowledges. The qualities of candor, moderation, universal intelligence, personal dignity, and unswerving public virtue, which are partly our pride and partly our boast, will open him in full effulgence when he confronts his municipal entertainers.

The result can not but be gratifying. As he pursues his investigations about the city and among its institutions under this distinguished and capable guidance, he will mark in all hands the civic order, neatness, and energy—(especially if, by extreme good chance, an election should occur during his visit)—and in the streets the well-dressed, filth, and bad smells, the drainage perfect, the sweeping magically invisible, and every where the signs of a free thrift, industry, and comfort, he will be profoundly affected. The Queen, indeed, might wisely pause and consider whether, upon his return with future occasion, he might not leave a striking symptoms of preference for our happy institutions. For it is clear that, having described to her the plentiful style in which we live, the glowing she depicted the sobriety, wisdom, economy, and dignity with which it is enjoyed, he will argue stoutly for our whole political system.

"For, dear mother," we may hear him saying, in our imagination, "a system which daily and yearly invariably secures such men and such a government—a system which is so perfectly well understood by the smallest boy in the city—is not to be resisted. It will prevail, and it ought to prevail. For such a spectacle as I have seen not only proves the character of the government, but of the constituency. These honest, sober, economical, intelligent, and dignified men, who spurn a bribe at the prophet spurned wine, before whose faces wrong and wrong-doers shrink and wither away—these are the elected by the citizens; and I therefore gladly assume among them the existence of the same qualities. It is a very happy, noble, generous, and chastely city. Nobody, though he brought the prejudices of a prince, can entertain any doubt as to its character, and the signal proof it affords of the success of popular institutions, after seeing its government intimately, as I have done."

This is evidently the explanation of Lord Grey's late speech, so full of bitter depreciation of the present American political condition. He is an old, long-baffled gentleman. He has had plenty of chances of knowing all about us, and he knows that H. R. H. will be immediately fascinated by what he sees of our men and our institutions. Therefore he skillfully tries to prejudice him before he comes. But it will be in vain. When H. R. H. has once instructed on the secrets of the City Hall, he will understand Lord Grey better than he probably does now.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WHEN the Pryer-Potter controversy was going on in Washington the name of the House was called upon some minor matters. When Mr. Potter's name was called an old Dutch member from Rensselaerina, who never takes up time unless he has something to say to the point, rose in his place and addressed Mr. Potter thus: "Mister Speaker, I will shust say ash how Minister Potter hash Pryer ongagement." Both sides of the House and the galleries united in an uproarious explosion of mirth at the honorable member's quiet style of, and it was only checked to be redoubled, when, after the name of Mr. Pryer was called, the same old Dutch gentleman said: "Vel, Mister Speaker, Minister Pryer has gone to pe ash shay in de Senate Chamber." For some moments the scene in the House was indescribable, and, for the once, five pound bowie-knives and slouched rifles were at discount.

Q. Which of the three great novelists of the present day writes exclusively Lytton, Warren, Dickens?

A. Dickens.

Q. Why?

A. Warren writes "Now and Then." Lytton "Night and Morning," and Dickens "In Your Eternal."

HOW TO GET OUT OF A DIFFICULTY.—In one of the populous and thriving manufacturing towns near Attleborough-Large the other day the operatives employed had a meeting to choose officers. It was known that there were two candidates for the honor, but it was not until the time of election that the exact state of the case was ascertained. On such occasion a suggestion was made that all the gentlemen desirous of becoming officers should retire during the proceedings. After the necessary movement, it was found that only three members of the company were left to proceed with business. The three gentlemen left to do their work, however, did not flinch from their duty, and, after a short time, the result of the ballot was announced back to the meeting. They were then informed that there was a first-rate difficulty about the selection, because the claims of all who had left the room were so equally balanced in relation to their services as to present no answer. Under these circumstances the meeting left it to the chairman's obvious and satisfactory way of escaping the difficulty by electing themselves to fill the three vacant posts.

A worthy Scottish Episcopalian nobleman advertised for a servant. A candidate called, and, making known his business, was shown into his lordship. Among the duties which "Flunkey" said he could include as his was blacking his lordship's boots.

"Very good indeed, that," said the "dry" old nobleman, "I always black my own boots—always. But how much wages do you require?"

Sixty guineas a year, my lord," replied Flunkey.

"Sixty guineas!" exclaimed his lordship, with consternation: "sixty guineas! Make it seventy, and I'll come and live with you."

NUMBO JUMBO.

NUMBO JUMBO was a Guy,
Frightened people fiercely,
Now they laugh at him all day long,
And laugh at Numbo Jumbo.

Numbo Jumbo did prevail,
With his stuffed and painted tin tail,
Now they turn no mental pale:
A fig for Numbo Jumbo.

Now, through Numbo Jumbo's hide,
Straw within can be descried;
Numbo Jumbo, sad to tell,
Despised is Numbo Jumbo.

Numbo Jumbo once could roar,
Shaking Jumbonian tin about,
But the nations heed no more
The voice of Numbo Jumbo.

Gently as the sucking dove,
Cooing in the key of love,
Scarcely heard above the above,
Bellows Numbo Jumbo.

Numbo Jumbo sinking names,
Belches forth more modern flames
At contemners of his claims:
Impotent Jumbo!

Numbo Jumbo sits on thorns,
Nose but mimics kiss his crown:
Let him then, for all he hums!
Good-night to Numbo Jumbo!

A GRATUITOUS THEFT.—What Sheridan said of wine may be applied to joking—the best is enjoy'd that which you crack at another person's expense.

THE LOST ROMAGNA.—Evil excommunications won't restore the lost Romagna.—Punch.

In Paris the gallery of the theatre is called Paradise. The Duchess of Orleans took a fancy to go to the play one night with the Duke her husband, and sit there. A young officer sat near her, was very free in his address, and, when the play was over, concluded by offering her a supper, which she seemed to accept. He accompanied her to the door, but was confounded when he saw her attendants and equipage, and her name. Recovering, however, his presence of mind, he handed her into the carriage, bowed in silence, and was retiring, when she said, "Sir, you forget the supper you promised!" He bowed, and replied, "In Paradise we are all equals; but in this world distinctions prevail. I seek you, madame, on earth." This prompt and proper reply obtained for him a place in the Duchess's carriage, and a better table.

"DITTO."—Here is a rhymed "modern instance" of an "old saw":

'Tis a very ancient saying,
Time till now has proved it true:
"Do unto all your neighbors
As you would have them do to you."

But another saying now prevails,
Of an entirely different hue:
"Do unto others before others,
Or they'll certainly do you."

An artificial florist lately described himself as "head gardener to the ladies."

A WORD TO THE WISE.

Love kissed a little maid,
Romping through the meadow;
Heedless to him was she obeyed,
Scornful of the shadow.

"Come with me," whispered he;
"Listen, sweet, to love and reason."
"By-and-by," she mused reply—
"Love's not in season."

Years went, years came;
Light and lovely studies;
Love met the maid again,
Drowned in deep meadow.
"Not so coy," urged the boy:
"Listen to love and reason."
"By-and-by" she mused reply—
"Love's still in season."

Years went, years came;
Light changed to shadow;
Love kissed the maid again,
Waiting in the meadow.
"Pass no more;" up rose the dream to s'er;
I can listen now to reason."
"Pass no more," mocked the boy
"Love's out of season."

Gentlemen who smoke allege that it makes them calm and contemplative. They tell us that the more they fume the less they fret.

A Poet says that the wind kisses the waves. That, we suppose, is the celebrated "kiss for a blow" about which we have heard so much.

"So far, so good," as the boy said when he finished the first pot of his mother's jam.

Why is a tooth drawn like a thing forgotten?—It is out of the head.

There is a kind of fortune called ill-luck; so ill that you hope it will be all it can be.

The girl who succeeds in winning the true love of a true man makes a lucky hit, and is herself a lucky miss.

A Mr. Lyon declined fighting a duel, and was called a dog. "Dog," he replied, "may call me a dog; but a live dog is better than a dead Lyon."

The shape of a kiss is said to be elliptical. This must be how the lovers' osculation are expressed when enjoying the luxury, for it is certainly a lip tickle.

"Why did you leave your last place?" inquired a young lady who was about to engage a new servant. "Why, you see, ma'am," replied the girl, "I was courted by a soldier; and when I opened the door folks took me for the mistress."

"I found," said Mark, "my nymph alone;
I knelt, and pressed her earnest prayer,
Condemn me not through love to prove
A sighing lover, not a tear,
And bless me! how she boxed my ears!"

A SPIRITUAL INQUIRY.—Is it likely that ghosts talk in the dead language?

HOW MR. GOTTLIEB BROKE HIS PORTY.—Then, you reckonmumper dat liddle pluck bony I pyed mit the bedder?" inquired Mr. Gottlieb, in the west of Lime, only I gits shested horrly bad." "Sir?" "Ish! Yah. You see, mine Sharley he vash a goot poy, but he gits, eat forry lame mit one eye. Den, ven you gits on him to rite, he vash shtubborn as a mule, and vill not shtart vonce mit a mintit. AN ARTFUCIO THIEF.—The greatest pleasure enjoyed by Prince Napoleon, when in exile, is to sit in his dressing-gown in a large arm-chair, before an easel on which there is a blank canvas, and, smoking his cigar, and swinging one on the other while he plays with his slipper and smokes his cigar, he waits for hours together for the picture. He has a fine gallery of modern pictures, and he has had a valuable addition remaining after by the best living artists. Two or three years ago a French diplomatist called on the prince: to his surprise he found the best sketches were gone, and said so to the prince. "True enough," replied the prince, "my best sketches have been stolen out of it." "Stolen! Do you suspect by whom?" "Oh yes, one of my accompanies. He took to imitating me in my love for art, and the rascal helped himself out of my sketches." "Well, but what have the scoundrel?" "Oh dear, no! The puppy showed such good taste in the selections he made I could not think of having him arrested."

LADIES AND FLOWERS.—"Bed checks are only evergets in contact in so many ways. Let a man sit and will find them where the rose so—out of doors." "Will they, indeed?" remarked Miss Louisa Amelia, as she laid down the number of the paper containing the extract. "Well, as the rose is the flower by which a lady to color, one might as well never get up at all, for I'm certain, ever since I remember, I've had a rose in the day. Now, if I'm ever metamorphosed into any thing pleasant, I hope it will be like a rose, for then I shall be the only vegetables that ever get a chance to go to the opera—gooseberries, indeed!"

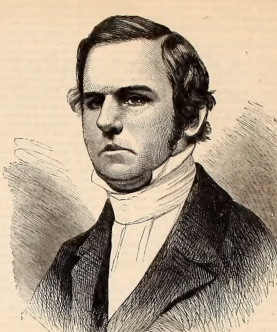
WASTE NOT, WANT NOT.—A gentleman who had put aside two bottles of capital ale to recreate some friends with occurred to him that he had left the servant, a country bumpkin, had emptied them both. "Scoundrel!" exclaimed his master, "what do you mean by it?" "Why, Sir, I saw plain enough by the cloods that it were going to rain, and I knowed as how you'd be wet, and I thought turn sour; for there's nothing I do abominate like water."

SCROGGIN TALENTS.—A Scotch nobleman, of no bright parts, chatting once with the Duchess of Devonshire, she asked him how many children he had? He replied that he was a much better figure from home than in Scotland. "Oh," said the duchess, "I am glad to understand that you are honor of the nation persons are stationed at every regress that that noble race in the country has sent in addition." "Then," answered sir, "I suspect your lordship was counting."

A man called upon a lawyer, the other day, and began to state his case in rather an abrupt manner. "Sir, I have come to ask advice." "Is a husband-in-law?" "A what?" spoke out the learned counsel. "Husband-in-law, Sir?" "I have never seen that defined in domestic relations." "Don't you know what a husband-in-law is? Sir, you're no lawyer; you're an ignoramus." I am a husband-in-law, Sir, but not in fact, Sir—my wife's run off."

A military officer, one day, while reviewing his company, happened to tie thrown from his horse, and, as he was rising on the ground, said to a friend who came to his assistance, "I thought I had improved in horsemanship, but I find I have fallen off."

BISHOPS OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

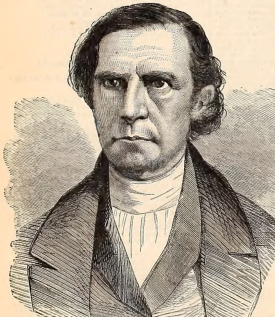


THE Quadrennial or General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, whose session is now being held in Buffalo, New York, represents one of the largest and most successful Protestant denominations in the New World. We submit to our readers the portraits of its bishops, who preside in succession over the assembly.

BISHOP MORRIS.

BISHOP MORRIS.

Dr. Morris is senior Bishop of the denomination. He is a native of Virginia, and is now about sixty-six years old. He joined the Methodist Church in his twentieth year, and began his ministerial travels in the Ohio Conference in 1816. He was a laborious and successful itinerant in several of the Western States for nearly twenty years, enduring all the privations and encountering many of the romantic adventures which were incident to the early Methodist ministry in the West. He tells many a capital story of that heroic age of his people, and no man can tell them better than the good Bishop, for, though supposed to be characteristically taciturn, he has a rare but quiet humor, which flows exhaustlessly on befitting occasions. In 1834 he was appointed editor of the Western Christian Advocate, at Cincinnati. In 1836 he was ordained a Bishop. He is a man of few words but thorough sense, presides with a complete mastery of his duties, preaches sermons remarkable for their brevity, terseness, and unction, and is considered to be a man of almost infallible safety as a counselor. He is small in stature, noticeably rotund, and presents a physiognomy grave without severity, calm without stolidity. He is the author of a successful volume of sermons—a rare fact in this day; some 10,000 volumes have been sold. A volume of "Miscellanies" has also been contributed by his pen to the growing literature of his Church. His writings are distinguished by real ability, good sense, apt illustrations, and a style of rare condensation, vigor, and simplicity.



BISHOP JANES.

BISHOP JANES.

Dr. Janes is well known to the American public, especially in this section of the country; for a more energetic and devoted man is not to be found in the ecclesiastical ranks of the nation. Small in person, not robust in health, but really an invalid most of his public life, and with a voice of almost feminine weakness, he has nevertheless traveled, preached, made speeches, and managed the great interests of his denomination with such unrelaxing assiduity, eloquence, and good sense that a more effective representative of Methodism is not to be found among all its hosts; nor has he been surpassed, in these respects, since the veteran Asbury's day.

He was born in Sheffield, Massachusetts, April 27, 1807. He entered the ministry in the Philadelphia Conference in 1830. After ten years of indefatigable labors he was elected one of the Secretaries of the American Bible Society in 1840. His activity in this office was extraordinary, and his extensive travels, as an advocate of the society, brought him into general acquaintance with the Christian public throughout the country. He is master of his position as a bishop, to which dignity he was promoted in 1844. During the sixteen years since his election he has traversed the nation continually. As a preacher, he is, in spite of physical disabilities, not only eloquent, but powerful, simple in style, methodical in arrangement, lucid in illustration, and pungent in exhortation. He is always ready and successful as a platform speaker. He has the reputation of uncommon talents as a manager of the great financial, educational, and kindred affairs of his Church. The Roman hierarchy would, in fine, be proud of a man of such capabilities.

BISHOP SCOTT.

BISHOP SCOTT.

Dr. Scott was born at Cantwell's Bridge, Newcastle, Delaware, October 11, 1802, and is therefore nearly fifty-eight years old. He entered the Methodist ministry, in the Philadelphia Conference, in the year 1826, and occupied "circuits" in Delaware and Maryland, and "stations" in Philadelphia, down to the year 1840, when he was appointed Principal of Dickinson Grammar School at Carlisle, Pennsylvania. His successful self-education procured him the titles of A.M. and D.D. He has been a member of every General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church since 1832. On leaving Carlisle he resumed his pastoral labors in Philadelphia. In 1848 he was elected book agent to the Methodist Book Concern in this city, where he continued till 1852, when he was chosen Bishop by the largest ballot given for the four candidates then elected. He is tall and slight in person; his hair is "sandy;" his eyes blue, nose large and well formed, mouth chiseled to an expression of much refinement. Moral and mental refinement is indeed the characteristic of his physiognomy. He presides with quiet dignity, dispatches business rapidly but without hurry, commands universal deference by his amiable Christian character, and preaches always with interest and profit to his audience, but with no pretentious ability. He appears enfeebled by chronic disease, and age begins to mark his face and mien.

BISHOP SIMPSON.

BISHOP SIMPSON.

Bishop Simpson was born in Cadiz, Ohio, June 21, 1810. He has always been an example of Western energy; of a strenuous physique, bold but cautious intellect, indefatigable labors, and great popular success. He mastered the German language before he was nine years old, and, later, the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and French, besides a thorough course of mathematics. He graduated at Madison College, where he received the instructions of Drs. Bascom and Elliott. About 1833 he abandoned the profession of Medicine, for which he had been licensed, and began his career as a Methodist preacher on West Wheeling Circuit, Virginia. After four years of pastoral labor

BISHOP AMES.

BISHOP BAKER.

he was appointed Professor of Natural Science in Allegheny College, Pennsylvania, and in 1839 was elected President of Indiana Asbury University, whence he removed in 1848 to Cincinnati to take editorial charge of the Western Christian Advocate. In 1852 he was elected bishop. Personally, Dr. Simpson is not imposing; he stoops somewhat; his face is a small, sharp triangle; his forehead a cap-ital refutation of phrenology; his voice harsh and badly managed; his action in the pulpit defective and even awkward; but as a public speaker few men in his church equal him, and none surpass him. His energetic and versatile intellect warms as he proceeds, till it blazes, and throws an irresistible spell over his large audiences. He shows mastery in every thing he attempts, and is now recognized as one of the "strongest" men of his denomination. His late visit to England produced a sensation through the ranks of British Methodism.

BISHOP AMES.

Dr. Ames is a native of Athens, Ohio, and was born May 20, 1806. He studied at the Ohio University; was tutor in M'Kendree College, Illinois, in 1826 and 1827; was sent out to preach by the famous Peter Cartwright in 1830. "Uncle Peter," it is said, would always "make or break" his young "itinerants." He effectually made Dr. Ames. In 1830 he was chosen Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society, and traveled in that capacity more than 25,000 miles the ensuing four years. In 1832 he was elected bishop. He has a noble "personal presence," calm but strong features, a remarkably clear head, is a capital parliamentarian, is always self-possessed, and renders it difficult for his conferences to get into a "flurry," however exciting the subject in debate. A species of quiet magnetism seems to emanate from him and pervade the assembly; stentorian disputants find it strangely difficult to get "into liberty" under his presidency, but business proceeds rapidly and safely. He is considered one of the most capable of ecclesiastical managers, and competent to have taken rank as a first-rate statesman. As a preacher he is always instructive, practical, and effective. The "prose" which usually characterizes genuinely great men is obvious in all his acts, and gives a quiet dignity to his features and his whole bearing.

BISHOP BAKER.

Dr. Baker is the junior Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was born in Marlow, New Hampshire, in 1812, and was educated by the late Dr. Wilbur Fisk, at Wilbraham, Massachusetts, and the Wesleyan University, Middletown, Connecticut. The venerable Lucius Clark licensed him to preach in 1830. In 1831 he became a teacher in the Methodist Academy at Newbury, Vermont, and, in 1835, was chosen its Principal. In 1844 he began his "itinerant" labors, and in 1847 was appointed Professor in the Methodist General Biblical Institute at Concord, New Hampshire, whence he was called to the Episcopate in 1852. Bishop Baker is stout almost to corpulency; his complexion blooms with health; his features express great modesty and amiability—his head is large, his eyes of hazel color, his mouth generous. In the pulpit he is always interesting without being remarkable. Both his intellect and his character are marked chiefly by an exact balance of faculties. He is considered a thorough logalist in church questions, and one of his works is among the recognized standards of Methodist legal interpretation. He is, we believe, the only man besides Bishop Morris, among the present Methodist Bishops, who has appeared as an author.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

(Printed from advance proof-sheets purchased from the author exclusively for "Harper's Weekly.")

THE HOUSEKEEPER'S NARRATIVE CONCLUDED.

MISS HALCOMBE had never left Blackwater Park!

When I heard those words all my thoughts were startled back on the instant to my parting with Lady Glyde. I can hardly say I reproached myself; but at that moment I think I would have given many a year's hard wages to have known four hours earlier what I knew now.

Mrs. Rubelle waited, quietly arranging her nosegay, as if she expected me to say something.

I could say nothing. I thought of Lady Glyde's worn-out energies and weakly health; and I trembled for the time when the shock of the discovery that I had made would fall on her. For a moment even my fears for the poor lady silenced me. At the end of that time Mrs. Rubelle looked up sideways from her nosegay, and said, "Here is Sir Percival, ma'am, returned from his ride."

I saw him as soon as she did. He came toward us, slashing viciously at the flowers with his riding-whip. When he was near enough to see my face he stopped, struck at his boot with the whip, and burst out laughing, so harshly and so violently that the birds flew away, startled, from the tree by which he stood.

"Well, Mrs. Michelson," he said, "you have found it out at last—have you?"

I made no reply. He turned to Mrs. Rubelle.

"When did you show yourself in the garden?"

"I showed myself about half an hour ago, Sir. You said I might take my liberty again as soon as Lady Glyde had gone away to London."

"Good night. I don't blame you—I only asked the question." He waited a moment, and then addressed himself once more to me. "You are believed, are you?" he said, mockingly. "Here! come along and see for yourself."

He led the way round to the front of the house. I followed him, and Mrs. Rubelle followed me. After passing through the iron gates he stopped, and pointed with his whip to the disused middle wing of the building.

"There!" he said. "Look at the first floor. You know the old Elizabethan bedrooms? Miss Halcombe is snug and safe in one of the best of them at this moment. Take her in, Mrs. Rubelle (you have got your key?); take Mrs. Michelson in, and let her own eyes satisfy her that there is no deception in the case."

The tone in which he spoke to me, and the minute or two that had passed since we left the garden, helped me to recover myself a little. What I might have done at this critical moment, if all my life had been passed in service, I can not say. As it was, possessed as I was by the principles, and the bringing-up of a lady, I could not hesitate about the right course to pursue. My duty to myself and my family left me but a alike fortunde me to remain in the employment of a man who had shamefully deceived us both by a series of circumstances.

"I must beg permission, Sir Percival, to speak a few words to you in private," I said.

"Having done so, I shall return to the house with this person to Miss Halcombe's room."

Mrs. Rubelle, whom I had forgotten by a slight turn of my head, insolently sniffed at her nosegay, and walked away, with great deliberation, toward the house.

"Well?" said Sir Percival, sharply, "what is it now?"

"I had to mention, Sir, that I am desirous of resigning the situation I now hold at Blackwater Park." That was literally how I put it. I was resolved that the first words spoken in my presence should be words which expressed my intention to leave his service.

He met me with one of his blackest looks, and thrust his hands savagely into the pockets of his riding-coat.

"Why?" he said; "why, I should like to know?"

"It is not for me, Sir Percival, to express an opinion on what has taken place in this house. I desire to give no offense. I merely wish to say that I do not feel it consistent with my duty to Lady Glyde and to myself to remain any longer in your service."

"Is it consistent with your duty to me to stand there casting suspicion on me to my face?" he broke out, in the most violent manner. "I see what you're driving at. You have taken your own construction—the construction of an innocent deception practiced on Lady Glyde for her own good. It was essential to her health that she should have a change of air immediately—and, you know as well as I do, she would never have gone away if she had known Miss Halcombe was still left here. She has been deceived in her own interests—and I don't care who knows it. Go, if you like—leave me and my affairs to housekeepers as good as you to be had for the asking. Go when you please—but take care how you spread scandal about me, or, by the Lord Harry, you're out of my service. Tell the truth, and nothing but the truth, or it will be the worse for you! See Miss Halcombe yourself, and tell her she hasn't been as well taken care of in one part of the house as in the other. Remember the Doctor's own orders that Lady Glyde was to have a change of air at the earliest possible opportunity. Bear all that well in mind—and then say any thing agreeable or disagreeable about it you dare!"

He poured out these words fiercely, all in a breath, walking backward and forward, and striking about him in the air with his whip.

Nothing that he said or did shook my opinion of the disgraceful series of falsehoods that he had told in my presence the day before; or of the cruel deception by which he had inveigled Lady Glyde from her sister, and had sent her uselessly to London, when she was half distracted with anxiety on Miss Halcombe's account. I naturally kept these thoughts to myself, and said nothing more to irritate him; but I was not the less resolved to persist in my purpose. A soft answer turneth away wrath; and I suppressed my own feelings accordingly, when it was my turn to reply.

"While I am in your service, Sir Percival," I said, "I hope I know my duty well enough not to inquire into your motives. When I am out of your service, I hope I know my own place well enough not to speak of matters which don't concern me."

"When do you want to go?" he asked, interrupting me without ceremony. "Don't suppose I am anxious to keep you—don't suppose I care about your leaving the house. I am perfectly fair and open in this matter from first to last. When do you want to go?"

I have no wish to leave at your earliest convenience, Sir Percival."

"My convenience has nothing to do with it. I shall be out of the house, for safe and sure, to-morrow morning; and I can settle my accounts to-night. If you want to study any body's convenience, it had better be Miss Halcombe's. Mrs. Rubelle's time is up to-day; and she has reasons for wishing to be in London to-night. If you go at once Miss Halcombe won't have a soul left here to look after her."

I hope it is unnecessary for me to say that I was quite incapable of deserting Miss Halcombe in such an emergency as had now befallen Lady Glyde and herself. After first distinctly ascertaining from Sir Percival that Mrs. Rubelle was certain to leave at once if I took her place, and after also obtaining permission to arrange for Mrs. Dawson's resuming his attendance on his patient, I willingly consented to remain at Blackwater Park until Miss Halcombe no longer required my services. It was settled that I should give Sir Percival's solicitor a week's notice before I left; and that he was to undertake the necessary arrangements for appointing my successor. The matter was discussed in very few words. As the discussion Sir Percival abruptly turned on his heel, and left me free to join Mrs. Rubelle. That singular foreign person had been standing constantly on the door-step all this time, waiting till I could follow her to Miss Halcombe's room.

I had scarcely walked half-way toward the house when Sir Percival, who had withdrawn in the opposite direction, suddenly stopped and called me back.

"Why are you leaving my service?" he asked.

The question was so extraordinary, after what had just passed between us, that I hardly knew what to say in answer to it.

"Mind! I don't know why you are going," he went on. "You must give a reason for leaving me, I suppose, when you get another situation. What reason? The breaking-up of the family? Is that it?"

"There can be no positive objection, Sir Percival, to that reason."

"Very well! That's all I want to know. If people apply for your character, that's your reason, stated by yourself. Go in consequence of the breaking-up of the family."

He turned away again before I could say another word, and walked rapidly into the grounds. His manner was as strange as his language. I acknowledge he alarmed me.

Even the passion of Mrs. Rubelle was getting exhausted when I joined her at the house door.

"At last!" she said, with a shrug of her lean foreign shoulders. She led the way into the inhabited side of the house, ascended the stairs, and opened with her key the door at the end of the passage, which communicated with the old Elizabethan rooms—a door never previously used in my time, at Blackwater Park. The rooms themselves I knew well, having entered them myself, on various occasions, from the other side of the house. Mrs. Rubelle stopped at the third door along the old gallery, handed me the key of it, with the key of the door of communication, and told me I should find Miss Halcombe in that room. Before I went in I thought it desirable to have understood whether our attendance had ceased. Accordingly, I told her in plain words that the charge of the sick lady henceforth rested entirely on myself.

"I am glad to hear it, ma'am," said Mrs. Rubelle. "I want to go very much."

"Do you leave to-day?" I asked, to make sure of her.

"Now that you have taken the charge, ma'am, I leave in half an hour's time. Sir Percival has kindly placed at my disposition the gardener and the chaise whenever I want them. I shall want them in half an hour's time to go to the station. I am packed up, in anticipation, already. I wish you good-day, ma'am."

She dropped a brisk courtesy, and walked back along the gallery, humming a little tune, and keeping time to it cheerfully with the nosegay in her hand. I am sincerely thankful to say that was the last I saw of Mrs. Rubelle.

When I went into the room Miss Halcombe was asleep. I looked at her anxiously as she lay in the dismal, high, old-fashioned bed. She was certainly not in any respect altered for the worse since I had seen her last. She had not been neglected, I am bound to admit, in any way that I could perceive. The room was dreary and dusty, and dark; but the window (looking on a solitary court-yard at the back of the house) was opened to let in the fresh air, and all that could be done to make the place comfortable had been done. The whole cruelty of Sir Percival's deception had fallen on poor Miss Glyde. The only ill-usage which either he or Mrs. Rubelle had inflicted on Miss Halcombe consisted, so far as I could see, in the first offense of hiding her away.

I stole back, leaving the sick lady still peacefully asleep, to give the gardener instructions about bringing the Doctor. I begged the man, after he had taken Mrs. Rubelle to the station, to drive round by Mr. Dawson's and leave a message, in my name, asking him to call and see me. I knew he would come on my account, and I knew he would remain when he found Count Fosco had left the house.

In due course of time the gardener returned, and said that he had driven round by Mr. Dawson's residence after leaving Mrs. Rubelle at the station. The Doctor sent me word that he was poorly in health himself, but that he would call, if possible, the next morning.

Having delivered his message the gardener was about to withdraw, but I stopped him to request that he would come back before dark, and sit up that night in one of the empty bedrooms, so as to be within call in case I wanted him. He understood readily enough my unwillingness to be left alone all night in the most desolate part of that desolate house, and we arranged that he should come in between eight and nine. He came punctually; and I found cause to be thankful that I had adopted the precaution of calling him in. Before midnight Sir Percival's strange temper broke out in the most violent and most alarming manner; and if the gardener had not been on the spot to pacify him on the instant, I am afraid to think what might have happened.

Almost all the afternoon and evening he had been walking about the house and grounds in an unsettled, excitable manner; having, in all probability, as I thought, taken an excessive quantity of wine at his solitary meals. However that may be, I heard his voice calling loudly and angrily in the new wing of the house as I was taking my backward and forward along the gallery the last thing at night. The gardener immediately ran down to him, and I closed the door of communication, to keep the alarm, if possible, from reaching Miss Halcombe's ears. It was full half an hour before the gardener came back. He declared that his master was quite out of his senses—not through the excitement of drink, as I had supposed, but through a kind of panic or frenzy of mind for which it was impossible to account. He had found Sir Percival walking backward and forward by himself in the hall, swearing, with every appearance of the most violent passion, that he would not stop another minute alone in such a dungeon as his own house, and that he would take the first stage of his journey immediately, in the middle of the night. The gardener, on approaching him, had been hunted out, with oaths and threats, to get the horse and chaise ready instantly. In a quarter of an hour Sir Percival had joined him in the yard, had jumped into the chaise, and, driving the horse into a gallop, had driven himself away with his face as pale as ashes in the moonlight. The gardeener had heard him shouting and cursing at the lodge-keeper to get up and open the gate—had heard the wheels roll furiously on again, in the still night, when the gate was unlocked—and knew no more.

The next day, or a day or two after, I forget which, the cause was brought back from Knowlesbury, our nearest town, by the hostler at the old inn. Sir Percival had stopped there, and had afterward left by the train—for what destination the man could not tell. I never received any further information, neither did himself, or from any one else, of Sir Percival's proceedings; and I am not even aware, at this moment, whether he is in England or out of it. He and I have not met since he drove away, like an escaped criminal, from his own house; and it is my fervent hope and prayer that we may never meet again.

My own part of this sad family story is now drawing to an end.

I have been informed that the particulars of Miss Halcombe's waking, and of what passed between us when she found me sitting by her bedside, are not material to the purpose which I to be answered by the present narrative. It will be sufficient for me to say, in this place, that she was not herself conscious of the means adopted to destroy her from the inhabited to the uninhabited part of the house. She was in a deep sleep at the time, whether natural or artificially produced she could not say. In my absence at Torquay, and in the absence of all the resident servants, except Margaret Porcher, who was perpetually eating, drinking, or sleeping when she was not at work), the secret transfer of Miss Halcombe from one part of the house to the other was no doubt easily performed. Mrs. Rubelle (as I discovered for myself in looking into the room) had provisions and all other necessaries, together with the means of heating water, broth, and so on, without kindling a fire, placed at her disposal during the few days of her imprisonment with the sick lady. She had declined to answer the questions which Mrs Halcombe naturally put, but had not, in other respects, treated her with unkindness or neglect. The disgrace of lending herself to a deception is the only charge with which I can conscientiously charge Mrs. Rubelle.

I need write no particulars (and I am relieved to know it) of the effect produced on Miss Halcombe by the news of Lady Glyde's departure, or by the still more melancholy tidings which reached us only too soon afterward at Blackwater Park. In both cases I prepared her mind beforehand as gently and as carefully as possible; having the Doctor's advice to guide me in the last case only, though Mr. Dawson is known to myself alone to the house for some days after I had sent for him. It was a sad time, a time which it suffers me to think of or to write of now. The precious blessings of religious consolation which I endeavored to convey were long in reaching that Halcombe's heart; but I trust and believe they came home to her at last. I never left her till her strength was restored. The train which took me away from that miserable house was the train which took her away also. We parted very mournfully in London. I remained with a relative at Islington, and she went on to Mr. Fairlie's house in Cumberland.

I have only a few lines more to write before I close this painful statement. They are dictated by a sense of duty.

In the first place, I wish to record in my own personal conviction that no blame whatever, in connection with the events which I have now related, attaches to Count Fosco. I am informed that a theory in suspicion has been started, and that some very serious constructions are placed upon his lordship's conduct. My persuasion of the Count's innocence remains, however, quite unshaken. If he assisted Sir Percival in sending me to Torquay, he assisted under a mistake for which, as a foreigner and a stranger, he was not to blame. If he was concerned in bringing Mrs. Rubelle to Blackwater Park, it was by misfortune and not his fault when that foreign person was base enough to assist a deception planned and executed out by Englishmen in his house. I protest, in the interests of morality, against blame being gratuitously and wantonly attached to the proceedings of others.

In the second place, I desire to express my regret at my own inability to remember the precise day on which Lady Glyde left Blackwater Park for London. I am told that it is of the last importance to ascertain the exact date of that lamentable journey; and I have anxiously taxed my memory to recall it. The effort has been in vain. I can only remember now that it was toward the latter part of July. But I know the difficulty after a lapse of time of fixing precisely on a past date unless it has been previously written down. That difficulty is greatly increased in my case by the alarming and confusing events which took place about the period of Lady Glyde's departure. I heartily wish I had made a memorandum at the time. I heartily wish in my memory of the date was as vivid in my memory of that poor lady's face when it looked at me sorrowfully for the last time from the carriage window.

THE NARRATIVE OF HESTER PINHORN, COOK IN THE SERVICE OF COUNT FOSCO.

[TAKEN DOWN FROM HER OWN STATEMENT.]

I AM sorry to say that I have never learned to read or write. I have been a hard-working woman all my life and have kept a good character. I know that it is a sin and wickedness to say the thing which is not; and I will truly beware of doing so on this occasion. All that I know I will tell; and I humbly beg the gentleman who takes this down to put my language right as he goes on, and to make allowances for my being no scholar.

In this last summer I happened to be out of place (through no fault of my own) and I heard of a situation, as plain cook, at Number Five, Forest Road, St. John's Wood. I took the place on trial. My master's name was Fosco. My mistress was an English lady. He was Count and she was Countess. They had a girl to do house-maid's work when I got there. She was not over clean or tidy—but there was no harm in her. I and she were the only servants in the house.

I had not been very long in my new place when this house-maid came to me and said company was expected from the country. The company was my mistress's niece, and the back bedroom on the first floor was got ready for her. My mistress mentioned to me that Lady Glyde (that was her name) was in poor health, and that I must be particular in my cooking accordingly. She was to come the next day, or it might be the day after, or it might be even longer than that. I am sorry to say it's no use asking me about days of the month and such like. Except Sundays, half my time I take no heed of them, being a hard-working woman and no scholar. All I know is, it certainly was not long before Lady Glyde came, and, when she did come, a fine time of it we had of it, surely. I don't know how master brought her to the house, being at work at the time. But he did bring her there, for I opened the door to him, and house-maid opened the door to them and showed them into the parlor. Before she had been a long query in the kitchen again with me we heard a harry-skurry up stairs, and the bell ringing like mad and my mistress's voice calling out for help.

We both ran up, and there we saw the lady laid on the sofa, with her head hanging over, and her hands fast clenched, and her head drawn down to one side. She had been taken ill in a sudden fright, my mistress said; and master he told us she was in a fit of convulsions. I ran out, knowing the neighborhood a little better than the rest of them, to fetch the nearest doctor's help. The nearest help was at Goodrice's and Garth's, who worked together in partners, and had a good deal of connection, as I have heard, all round St. John's Wood. Mr. Goodricke was in, and he came back with me directly.

It was some time before he could make himself of much use. The poor unfortunate lady laid out of one fit into another, and I took on as till she was quite wearied out, and as helpless as a new-born babe. We then got her to bed. Mr. Goodricke wrote for a bottle of the medicine and came back again in a quarter of an hour or less. Besides the medicine he brought in a lot of hollow machines with tubes shaped like a kind of trumpet, and, after waiting a little while, he put one end over the lady's heart and the other to his ear, and listened carefully. When he had done he says to my mistress, who was in the room, "This is a very serious case," he says: "I recommend you to write to Lady Glyde's friends directly." My mistress says to him, "Is it heart-disease?" And he says "Yes;" and my mistress cast dangerous looks at. He told her exactly what he thought was the matter, which I was not clever enough to understand. But I know that he ended by saying that he was afraid neither his help nor any other doctor's help was likely to be of much service.

My mistress took this ill news more quietly than my master. He was a big, fat, cold sort of elderly man, who looked as white as white, and spoke to them as if they were so many Christian children. He seemed terribly cut up by what had happened to "poor dear Glyde! poor dear Lady Glyde!" he says, and went stalking about, wringing his fat hands from like a play-actor in a melodrama. For one question my mistress asked the doctor about the lady's chances of getting round he asked to speak to her in the next room, he quite tormented us all—and, when he was quiet at last, out he went into the bit of back garden, shaking master's hand, and easily making me to take them up stairs and make the sick room look pretty with them. As if that did any good! I think he must have been, at times, a little soft in his head. But he was not a bad master: he had a monstrous civil tongue of his own, and a jolly, good-natured sort of look with it. I liked him a deal better than my mistress. She was a hard one, if ever there was a hard one yet.

Toward night-time the lady roused up a little. She had been so wearied out by both that by the convulsions, that she never stirred hand or foot, or spoke a word to any body. She moved in the bed now and looked about her at the room and us in it. She must have been a nice-looking lady, when well, with light hair, and blue eyes, and all that. Her rest was troubled at night—at least, so I heard from my mistress, who sat up along with her. I only went in once or twice myself, to see to see if I could be of any use; and then she was talking to herself in a confused, rambling manner. She seemed to want something, but to some body who was absent from her somewhere. I couldn't catch the name the first time; and the second time master locked the door, with his regular mouthful of questions, and another of his trumpery nosegays. When I went in early the next morning the lady was clean worn out again, and lay in a kind of faint sleep. Mr. Goodricke brought his partner, Mr. Garth, with him to advise. They said she must not be disturbed out of her rest on any account. They asked my mistress a many questions, on the other end of the room, about what the lady's health had been in past times, and who had attended her, and whether she had ever suffered much, and long together, under distress of mind. I remember my mistress said "Yes" to that last question. And Mr. Goodricke looked at Mr. Garth and shook his head, and Mr. Garth looked at Mr. Goodricke and shook his head. They seemed to think that the distress might have something to do with the mischief at the lady's heart. She was but a frail thing to look at, poor creature! Very little strength, I say time, I should say, had any little strength.

Later on the same morning, when she woke, the lady took a sudden turn, and got, seemingly, a great deal better. I was not let in again to see her, no more was the house-maid, for the reason that she was not to be disturbed by strangers. A word of that being sent to master through my master. He was in wonderful good spirits about the change, and looked in at the kitchen door from the garden, with his great big curly-brimmed white hat on, to go out. "Good Mrs. Cook," says he, "Lady Clyde is going on like a house on fire now than it was; and I am going out to stretch my big legs with a sunny little summer walk. Shall I order for you, and I market for you, Mrs. Cook? What are you making there? A nice tart for dinner? Much trust, if you please—much crust very good, that; and suits and crumbles delicious in the mouth." That was his way. He was past sixty, and fond of pastry. Just think of that!

The doctor came again in the forenoon, and saw for himself that Lady Glyde had woke up better. He wanted to talk to her, or to be her talk to us, in case she was that way disposed, saying she must be kept quiet before all things, and encouraged to sleep as much as possible. She did not seem to want to talk whenever I was in the room, and, moreover, I couldn't make out what she was saying—she seemed too much worn down. Mr. Goodricke takes an uncommon good opinion about her as master. He said nothing when he came down stairs except that he would call again at five o'clock. Some time (I can't say exactly, for master came home again) the bell rang hard from the bedroom, and my mistress ran out into the kitchen to tell me to run for Mr. Goodricke, and tell him the lady had fainted. I got on my bonnet and shawl when, as good luck would have it, master made himself came to the house for his promised visit.

I let him in, and went up stairs along with him. "Good Mrs. Cook," says he, says my mistress to him at the door; "she was awake, and looking about her, in a strange, forlorn manner, and I thought her eyes a sort of full cry, and she fainted in a moment." The doctor went up to the bed, and stopped down over the sick lady. "She has suffered very serious, all at a sudden, at the sight of her, and put his hand on her heart.

My mistress stared hard in Mr. Goodricke's face. "Not dead!" says she, whispering, and turning all of a tremble from head to foot.

"Very ill, my patient, very quiet and grave. "Dead, I was afraid it would happen suddenly when I examined her heart yesterday." My mistress sank down in the arm-chair while he was speaking, and trembled and trembled again. "Dead!" she whispers to herself; "dead so suddenly! dead so soon! What will the Count say?" Mr. Goodricke advised her to go down stairs and take a dose of a little. "You have been sitting up all night," says he, "and your nerves are shaken. This person," says he, meaning me, "this person will stay in the room till I can send for the necessary assistance." My mistress did as he told her. "I must prepare the lady's friends," I must carefully prepare the Count." And so she left us, shaking from head to foot, and went out.

"Your mistress is a foreigner," says Mr. Goodricke, when my mistress had left us. "Does he understand about registering the death?" "I don't know, sir," says I, "but I should think not." The doctor considered a minute, and then, says he, "I don't usually do such things," says he, "but to save the family the trouble in this case if I register the death myself. I shall pass the district office in half an hour's time, and it can easily call in. Mention, if you please, that I will do so." "Yes, Sir," says I, "with thanks, I'm sure, for your kindness in thinking of it." "You don't mind staying here till I can send to the proper person?" says he. "No, Sir," says I; "I'll stay with the poor lady till then." I suppose nothing more could be done, Sir, than was done?" says I. "No," he says, "nothing more could have suffered sadly before ever I saw her: the case was hopeless when I was called in." "Ah, dear me! we all must go some time or other, I'm sure, Sir?" says I. He gave no answer to that; he didn't seem to care about talking. He said, Good-day" and went away.

I stopped by the bedside from that time till the time when Mr. Goodricke sent the person in, as he had promised, to register the death, Jane Gould. I considered her to be a respectable-looking woman. She made no remark, except to say that a gentleman stood was master of her, and that she had winded a many of them in her time.

How sooner bore the news when he first heard it is more than I can tell, not having been present. When I did see him he looked awfully overcome by it, to be sure. He sat quiet in a corner, with his fat hands hanging over his thick knees, and his head down, and his eyes looking at nothing. He seemed not so much sorry as scared and dazed like by what had happened. My mistress managed all that was to be done about the funeral. It must have cost a sight of money, the coffin, in particular, being most beautiful. The dead lady's husband was away, as we heard, in foreign parts. But my mistress (being her aunt) settled it with her friends in the country (Cumberland, I think) that she should be buried there, in the same grave along with her mother. Every thing was done handsomely in respect of the funeral, I say again; and master went down to attend the burying in the country himself. He looked grand in his deep mourning, with his big, solemn face, and his slow walk, and his broad hat-band—that he did!

In conclusion I have to say, in answer to questions put to me,

1. That neither I nor my fellow-servant ever saw my master give Lady Glyde any medicine himself.

2. That he was never, to my knowledge and belief, left alone in the room with Lady Glyde.

3. That I am sure in my own way what caused the sudden fright which my mistress informed me had seized the lady on her first coming into the house. The reason is very easy explained either to me or to my fellow-servant.

The above statement has been read over in my presence. I have nothing to add to it or to take away from it. I say, on my oath as a Christian woman, This is the truth.

THE NARRATIVE OF JANE GOULD.

I WAS the person sent in by Mr. Goodricke to do what was right and needful by the remains of a lady who had died at the house named in the certificate which preceded this. I found the body in charge of the servant, Hester Pinhorn. I remained with it, and prepared it, at the proper time, for the grave. I was laid in the coffin in my presence, and I afterward saw the coffin screwed down previous to its removal. When that had been done, and not before, I received what was due to me, and left the house. I refer persons who may wish to investigate my statement to Mr. Goodricke. He has known me for more than six years, and he will bear witness that I can be trusted to tell the truth.

I.

EARLY in the summer of 1850, I, and my surviving companion, left the wild woods of Mexico; I was among the few saved from the sea. It was my third escape from peril of death. Death by disease, death by the Indians, death by drowning—all three had approached me; all three had passed me by.

The survivors of the wreck were rescued by an American vessel bound for Liverpool. The ship reached her port on the thirteenth day of October, 1850. We landed that day, my companion and I arrived in London the same night.

These pages are not the record of my wanderings and my dangers way from home. The motives which led me from my country and my friends to a new world of adventure and peril are known. Even that self-imposed exile I came back—as I had hoped, prayed, believed, I should come back—changed man. In the scenes of a new life I had tempered my nature afresh. In the stern school of extremity and danger my will had learned to be strong; I had come to be resolute, my mind to rely on itself. I had gone out to fly from my own future. I came home to face it, as a man should.

To face it with that inevitable suppression of myself which I knew it would demand from me. I had parted with the weakness bitterness of the past, but not with my heart's remembrance of the sorrow and the tenderness of that memorable time. I had not ceased to feel the one irreparable disappointment of my life—I had only learned to bear it. Laura Fairlie was in all my thoughts when the ship bore me away and I locked my last at England. Laura Fairlie was in all my thoughts when the ship brought me back and the morning light showed the friendly shore in view.

My pen traces the old letters as my heart goes back to the old love. I write of her as Lawra Fairlie still. It is hard to think of her, it is hard to speak of her by her husband's name.

There are no more words of explanation to add, on my appearing for the second time in these pages. This final narrative, if I have the strength and the courage to write it, may speak on.

My first anxieties and first hopes, when the morning came, centered in my mother and my sister. At the necessity of preparing them for the joy and surprise of my return, after an absence during which it had been impossible for them to receive any tidings of me for months past. Early in the morning I sent a letter to the Hampstead Cottage, and followed it myself in an hour's time.

When the first meeting was over, when our quiet and composure of other days began gradually to return to us, I saw something in my mother's face which told me that a secret oppression lay heavy on her heart. There was more than love-tears was more than the anxious eyes that looked on me so tenderly; there was pity in the kind hand that slowly and fondly strengthened its hold on mine. We had no concealments from each other. She knew how the hope of my life had been wrecked—she knew why I had left her. It was on my lips to ask as composedly as I could, if any letter had come for me from Miss Halcombe—if there was any news of her since I had left London. But when I looked in my mother's face I lost courage to put the question even in that guarded form. I could only say, cheerfully and restrainedly,

"You have something to tell me."

My sister, who had been sitting opposite to us, rose suddenly, without a word of explanation—true, at first, to her nature.

My mother moved closer to me on the sofa and put her arms round my neck. Those fond arms trembled; the tears flowed fast over the faithful, loving face.

"Walter!" she whispered—"my own darling! my heart is heavy for you. Oh, my son! my son! try to remember that I am still left!"

My head sank on her bosom. She had said all, in saying those words.

II.

It was the morning of the third day since my return—the morning of the sixteenth of October I had remained with them all that time. I could not find the heart to embitter the happiness of my return to them, as it was embittered to me. I could not wish my mother to rise from my bosom and accept my life resignedly—to let my great sorrow come in tenderness to my heart, and not in despair. I was useless and hopeless. No tears soothed my aching eyes; no relief came to me from my sister's sympathy or my mother's love.

On that third morning I opened my heart on them. At last the words passed my lips which I had longed to speak on the day when by mother told me of her death.

"Let me go away alone for a little while," I said. "I shall be better when I have looked once more at the place where I first saw her—when I have knelt and prayed by the grave where she have laid her to rest."

I departed on my journey—my journey to the grave of Laura Fairlie.

It was a quiet autumn afternoon when I stopped at the solitary station, and set forth alone, on foot, by the well-remembered road. The waning sun was shining faintly through thin white clouds; the air was warm and still; the peacefulness of the lonely country was overshadowed and saddened by the influences of the falling year.

I reached the moor; I stood again on the brow of the hill; I looked on, along the path—and there were the familiar garden trees in the distance, the clear sweeping succession of the drive, the high white walls of Limmeridge House. The chances and changes, the wanderings and dangers of months and months past, shrunk and shriveled to nothing in my mind. It was like yesterday since my feet had last trodden the fragrant heathy ground! Looking at it, I could see her coming to meet me, with her little straw hat shading her face, her simple dress fluttering in the air, and her well-filled sketch-book ready in her hand.

O Death, thou hast thy sting! O Grave, thou hast thy victory!

I turned aside; and there below me, in the glen, was the lonesome gray church; the porch where I had waited for the coming of a woman in white; the hills encircling the quiet burial-ground; the brook bubbling cold over its stony bed. There was the marble cross, fair and white, at the head of the tomb—the tomb that now rose over mother and daughter alike.

I approached the grave. I crossed once more the low stone stile, and bared my head as I touched the sacred ground. Sacred to gentleness and goodness; sacred to reverence and grief.

I stopped before the pedestal from which the cross rose. On one side of it, on the side nearest to me, the newly-cut inscription met my eyes—the last, cruel, cruel blank letters which told the story of her life and death. I tried to read them. I did read as far as the name. "Sacred to the Memory of Laura——" The black lines dim with tears; the fair head drooping wearily; the innocent, parting words which implored me to leave her—oh, for the hapless last memory of her than this; the memory I took away with me, the memory I bring back with me to her grave!

A second time I tried to read the inscription. I saw, at the end, the date of her death; and above it—

Above it, there were lines on the marble, there was a name among them which disturbed my thoughts of her. I went round to the other side of the grave, where there was nothing to read—nothing of earthly vileness to force its way between her spirit and mine.

I knelt down by the tomb. I laid my hands, I laid my head, on the broad white stone, and closed my weary eyes on the earth around, on the light above. I let my soul go back to me. Oh, my love! my love! my heart may speak to you now? It is yesterday again since we parted—yesterday, when you kissed me at the garden gate—yesterday, since my eyes looked their last on you. My love! my love!

* * * * *

Time had flowed on, and Silence had fallen, like thick night, over its course.

The first sound that, after the heavenly peace, rustled faintly, like a passing breath of air, over the grass of the burial-ground. I heard it nearing me slowly, until it came close to my ear—came like footsteps moving onward—then stopped.

I looked up.

The sunset was near at hand. The clouds had parted; the shining light fell mellow over the hills. The face of the day was cold and clear and still in the quiet valley of the dead.

Beyond me, in the burial-ground, standing together in the shadow of the church porch, I saw two women. They were looking toward the tomb; looking toward me.

III.

They came a little on; and stopped again. Their veils were down, and I could not see them. When they stopped, one of them raised her veil. In the still evening light I saw the face of Marian Halcombe.

Changed, changed as if years had passed over it! The eyes large and wild, and looking at me with a fear which terrified them. The face worn and wasted piteously. Pain and fear and grief written on her as with a brand.

I took one step toward her from the grave. She never moved—she never spoke. The veiled woman with her cried out faintly. I stopped. The springs of my life fell low in the shuddering of an unutterable dread crept over me from head to foot.

The woman with the veiled face moved away from her companion and came toward me slowly. Left by herself, standing by herself, Marian Halcombe spoke. It was the voice that I remembered—the voice not changed, like the frightened eyes and the wasted face.

"My dearest friend!" she said, and her say these words softly, in the awful silence. She sank on her knees, and raised her clasped hands to the heaven. "Father of mercies! Father! Father! help him, in his hour of need."

The woman came on—on—and silently came on. I looked at her—at her, and at none other, from that moment.

The voice that was praying for me faltered and sank low—then rose on a sudden, and called affrightedly, called despairingly to me to come away.

But the veiled woman had possession of my body and soul. She stopped on one side of the grave. We stood face to face with the tombstone between us. She was close to the inscription on the side of the pedestal. Her gown touched the black letters.

The voice came nearer, and rose and rose more passionately still. "Hide your face! don't look at her!" it cried to me; "take, spare him—"

The woman lifted her veil.

SACRED TO THE MEMORY OF LAURA,
LADY GLYDE.

Laura, Lady Glyde, was standing by the inscription, and was looking at me over the grave.

THE END OF THE FIRST PART.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, May 7, in the Senate, Senator Anthony presented to the Senate a remonstrance against any alteration in the patent laws. Senator Bayard gave notice he patentees the right of appeal from the decision of the Commissioner. A bill was passed to settle the titles to lands set apart for the half-breeds in Kansas. The resolutions of Senator Crittenden, which have already formed the topic for protracted debate, came up. Senator Davis spoke at length in their support. Senator Bowen took occasion to repudiate any sympathy with Mr. Douglas. Senator Clingman followed, but before he had concluded, the Senate adjourned.——The House yassed, without debate, a bill reported by Dr. Davis, of Maryland, for the retirement on Foreign Affairs, authorizing the appointment of a full Minister to Switzerland, but before he had settled a Secretary, at $1500 per annum. On the motion of Mr. Grow, the consideration of the Pacific Railroad was postponed till Thursday in order to take up the Tariff Bill. Messrs. Morrison, Grow, Sherman, and Stevens spoke briefly in favor of the measure.

On Tuesday, May 8, in the Senate, a resolution, providing for an expedition to observe the total eclipse of the sun in July, was agreed to. Senator Wigfall and Senator Clingman subsequently resumed his remarks in opposition to the resolutions of Mr. Crittenden. Senator Bayard followed, and the Senate then went into Executive Session.——The House, in Committee of the Whole, considered Mr. Houston, of Alabama, in an argument against the Tariff Bill, which was followed by Mr. Morrill and Mr. Allison followed. Every attempt at a call of the House resulting in the want of a quorum, the House, at 4 P. M., went into Journal.

On Wednesday, May 9, in the Senate, Senator Davis introduced his bill proposing to transfer the Indian Bureau from the Interior to the War Department. Senator Lane spoke to exonerate himself from the charge of fraud in connection with the Oregon war debt. The Homestead Bill was then taken up, when Senator Grimes, of Iowa, moved as an amendment that the privileges of the measure be extended to all unmarried men over twenty-one years of age. Senator Hale strongly objected to the bill as an imposition. The bill was defended by Senator Johnson, of Arkansas. Subsequently the amendment Grimes was rejected, and the Senate adjourned without a vote.——In the House, the consideration of the Whole on the Tariff, speeches were made by Messrs. Millson, of Virginia, Montgomery, Kellogg, Florence, etc., but no vote was taken.

On Thursday, May 10, in the Senate, the Homestead Bill amendments offered by Senators Rice and Douglas having been rejected, the measure was finally passed by a vote of 46 to 8.——The House had Territorial business before it, and the discussion of the Tariff Bill in Committee of the Whole, that measure was reported to the House, and adjourned.

On Friday, May 11, the Senate passed several private bills and the Deficiency Appropriation Bill. An extensive session was then held, and the Senate adjourned until Monday.——In the House, a bill was reported providing for carrying out the stipulations of the treaty with Nicaragua. The Committee on Commerce reported bills for organizing Territorial governments for Jefferson, Arapahoe, Lapinera, and Nicolas, and they were all laid on the table. The Commissioner of Patents was then arraigned and sent in relation to the House to witness the reception of the Japanese Embassy. Subsequently the House refused to adjourn for the purpose.

THE BALTIMORE CONVENTION.

The Baltimore Constitutional Convention achieved the object of its meeting, on May 10, by nominating for President, John Bell, of Tennessee, and for Vice-President, Edward Everett, of Massachusetts. Upon the first ballot the strength of Mr. Bell was so nearly apparent, that upon the second nearly all the delegates hastened to register their votes for him, and he was declared the unanimous choice of the Convention. Mr. Everett was subsequently, and by acclamation, nominated for second office. Prior to the balloting, the Committee upon Business reported a platform of principles adverse to the existence of any declaration of principles; pronouncing the Constitution sufficient, and inferring that which is to be before the people. The proceedings were marked with exemplary order, and the concluding scene of the delegates of General Houston bear their disappointment impatiently.

TREATIES BEFORE THE SENATE.

The Herald correspondent writes: "There are now before the Senate for ratification the treaties negotiated as follows: The one with Mexico, Nicaragua, Honduras, and Costa Rica, by Messrs. Dimmick, Dodge, and Cass; besides the New Granadian Treaty, which is now awaiting the exchange of ratifications. The publication of each and every one of these treaties is of vital importance to the American States, having been negotiated after long delay and great trouble, and which will tend, in a great degree, to the settlement of many questions of the long pending and complicated questions of foreign policy in a harmonious manner between the parties. The treaties negotiated by Mr. Preston settles all the questions in dispute between the United States and Nicaragua amicably and justly, and in a manner highly creditable to both governments. Should the Senate, the present disagreements of the Senate, and especially the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, refuse to act upon these matters in charge, they will, in all probability, fail to the ground for want of sufficient and prompt action."

ARRIVAL OF THE JAPANESE.

The United States steam frigate Roanoke, forty-four guns, Captain William F. Gardner, commanding, bearing the flag of Flag-Officer William J. McCluney, Commander-in-Chief of the United States naval squadron, having on board the Japanese Embassy, arrived and anchored in the North River on Thursday night. Every precaution was taken on board from the Secretary of the Navy, down to the Japanese guard, to prevent the Press from, and not enter this port. The Roanoke left next day with the Japanese, according to arrangement.

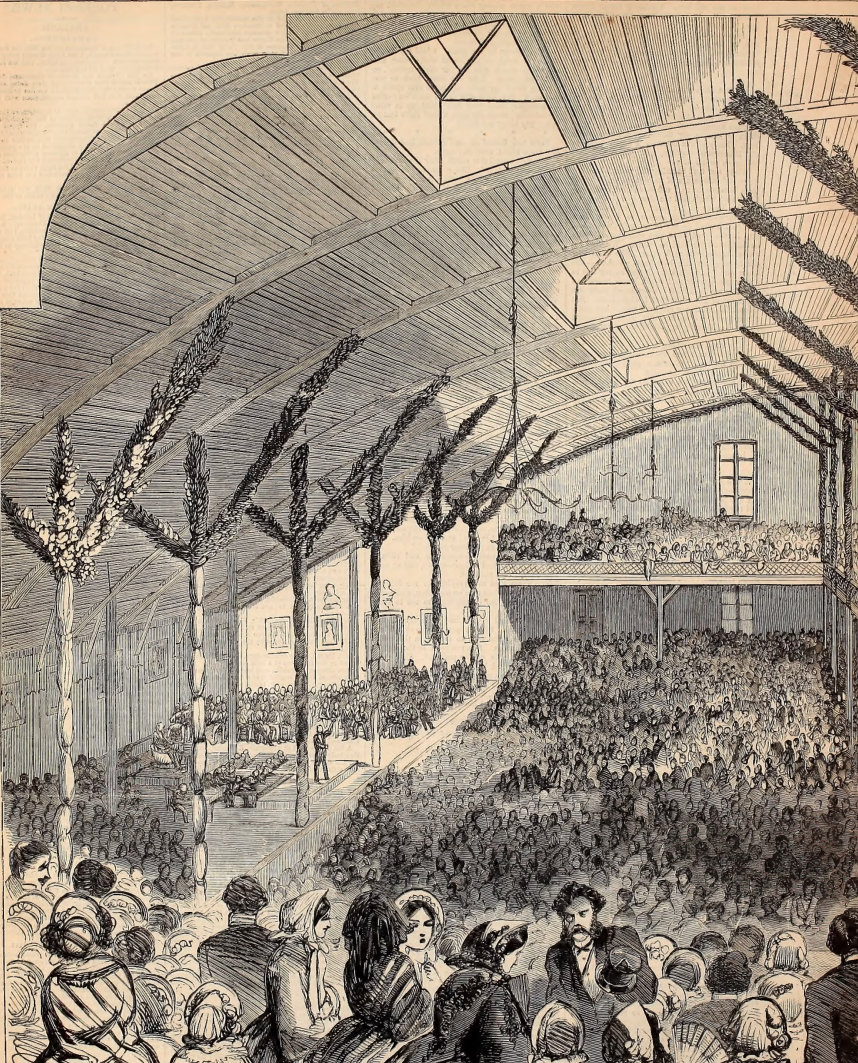
A BUDGET OF HORRORS.

A man named Cook attempted to shoot a man named Leonard at the breakfast table at the Broadway Hotel, Cincinnati, Kentucky. Two shots were fired, and Leonard's arm shattered. Cause—woman.

A fight with knives resulted at Cynthiana, Kentucky, a few days since, by being shot at by John Trenkle's bar-keeper.

Mr. Douglas, of Denville, Kentucky, was found dead in his stable, supposed to have been murdered by one of his slaves.

Captain Elliott, of Maysville, Kentucky, has died of wounds received by being shot by Frank Hall.



A Mr. Hutchinson, of Warren County, Indiana, died lately from burns produced by the explosion of a fluid lamp.

Mrs. Dugan, of the same county, died also of burns produced by the explosion of a fluid lamp.

Mrs. Gleaser, of Mobile, and two children were drowned lately by the upsetting of a fluid lamp.

Mrs. George Selders, of St. Louis, was dreadfully burned about the head and face by the explosion of a fluid lamp. All the hair was burned from her head, and she was blind.

The young ladies of Hopedale, Illinois, met to trim a church for a wedding.

THE REPUBLICANS IN NOMINATING CONVENTIO

ON, IN THEIR WIGWAM AT CHICAGO, MAY, 1860.

TAKEN BY STORM.

On the extreme point of Sandy Hook, near the light-house, stands a rough wooden building, which serves the double purpose of telegraph station and office of the agent for the Associated Press. At a low table, under the only window which the shanty can boast, Edward Barnard passed the leisure hours of his long watch, from sunrise to sunset, in devotion to such studies as he might best master with the little assistance he could find. At the age of nineteen he was left to his own lesson, by reason of his skill as a boatman, to board the homeward-bound ships and procure their news, to be telegraphed to New York. During the first year he found the life exceedingly dull; but when Uncle Harry Warden was appointed keeper of the light-houses, Ed Barnard, or Barney, as he was usually called, went to board at the keeper's house, and existence suddenly became more or endurable but quite interesting. Of course that little brown-eyed maiden the keeper's only daughter, pretty Ellen Warden, had no influence in changing the young man's heart; he took but little notice of her, and at times even seemed to avoid her. Poor little Ellen! Coquettish by nature, her coquetry availed not with the frank, straightforward Edward Barnard; he had no more idea of flirtation than of needle-work or the opera. And so it happened that Ellen found Sandy Hook a very dreary place indeed. Such a sad face she wore, and such repining mutes that her poor father, though sorry enough to part with her, at last determined she should return to their friends on the main land. On the morning of her departure Barnard was off before breakfast. He must have gone very far out, for his boat was not in sight even from the top of the "big light." Did she wish to see it at that moment in the hope that he would return? Sure is it, had not her father hastened her step, she would have left without one steamboat and been left. The parting seemed to grieve her to the heart; she wept bitterly, and would not be comforted.

Meantime, Barnard was spending the morning in the most strangely unprofitable manner. Instead of following his business with his usual zest, he concreted his boat under the wharf and himself in the cedars. Hour after hour he lay upon the soft turf, apparently thinking of nothing, and left hand of cor. At dinner-time he returned to the house, but without much appetite, the natural consequence of such unaccustomed abstinence. He told the Uncle did not seem to Barney quite so near Paradise as before, but by devoting himself to study with more assiduity than ever he contrived to wear the time away.

Let me now say a word concerning Ellen Warden. Barney's mother's death she had not been separated from her father until now, and 'twas quite natural she should miss him greatly. Yet 'twas not her father she left behind in dreams and the necklace of tiny shells, with mother-of-pearl charms, which were the dearest of her treasures, her father's second child. Her filial affection was strong though, and she longed to see the good old keeper so earnestly that, when she had been absent several months, she must even go and visit him a day or two. Accordingly, bright and early one morning, while Uncle Harry was at breakfast, Ellen appeared on him by running in and throwing her arms about his dear old neck.

"Why, little birdie!" cries the astonished keeper, "where did you come from?"

"All the way from Holmedale, father. We started yesterday, but stopped overnight on the Highlands. Are you glad to see me?"

"Sit on my knee, lass, and I'll tell thee. How like thou art to thy mother!"

After a moment she glanced through the open door, and asked, demurely enough,

"Where's Edward, Edward Barnard?"

Slowly and absently the keeper answered, "It has gone—"

"Gone!" cries the young lady, with an accent of consternation at once tragic and comic; "has he really gone, father?"

"Why, yes, child. I did not say he was dead did I? Barney has gone up to the light—that's all. He'll be down in a moment."

Sure enough, he was just as the birdie was blushing with confusion because of having betrayed an interest in him. He was, as I have said, frank and honest young boatman; and the pleasure which made his heart beat so qui-kly shook also in his face with a glow that gave him a new beauty to the eyes which had beamed fondly upon him one moment, and then were dropped modestly to the floor. In that first instant of meeting she read the secret which Barnard hardly dared acknowledge even to himself. She knew that this fine young 'longshoreman—strong, brave, and skilful—tenderly subdued; was her property, to have and to hold; her conquered vassal, owing her allegiance forever. In the hour of triumph she felt that she could afford to be magnanimous, and so her greeting had so much of heart's gladness in it that her captive was sure he had never known what happiness was until this moment. She proved a most imperious sovereign, though; one who kept her throne by any but her absence, having concluded that her father was growing too old to be left alone. Poor Barney's life became a tumultuous one afore as it ever had been on the sea; one moment buoyed up on the topmost wave of high hope—the next, dashed down to the lowest depths of despond. No April day could be so prodigal of clouds and sunshine as this little queen abusing the power of her absolute sway.

During a heavy storm in the spring time Barney discovered a brig ashore on the Romer, foremast over the side, jamming, bul-ged first, like a battering-ram, against her garboard as she listed over with every sea. Going to the house Barney met Captain Ben and told him of the wreck. Captain Conover at once set about rousing his men, saying a long line to go off to her immediately. Uncle Harry did not like the idea of their going at all, thinking the chances were desperate indeed.

"I know they are desperate," said Captain Ben, with a grim smile. "There'd be no use of wrecks, ef it 'twan't for desperate chances. What makes it worse, we're short-handed, with two of the boys laid up."

"I'll go, for one," said Barnard, quiet as though 'twas to go fishing.

Captain Ben shook his head: "No, yonker, you mustn't go. There's a lass in the house there would never forgive me if it should so happen that you did not come back with us."

Without reply Barnard ran up stairs to make preparation for the perilous trip. On his return he was engaged in the hall with Ellen's little figure, and the softest, sweetest voice in the world asked, "Are you going, Edward?"

"Yes, Nelly, I am going."

"Bend down your head, will you, please?"

As he complied with her request his heavy curls fell over her face, and, blushing, she slid it in her bosom. Then taking a ring from her largest finger she placed it on his smallest one, whispering, "That was mother's wedding-ring."

One moment the little form was pressed close to his heart; one kiss, that burned for hours on her lips, and he was gone.

How long and dreary was that day. Most of the time Ellen passed in her own room. Rocking gently in her little chair she caressed the black curl which twined around the finger where her ring had been—counting it against her cheek, and wrapping it carefully in her kerchief, then—singing the while the lullaby baby-songs her mother had sung.

'Twas quite night when the boat returned. Four came into the house—three strangers and one of the wrecks.

"Where are the others?" demanded Uncle Harry.

"In the 'big light?'" answered the wrecker. "Cap'n Ben said better not bring 'em here, so I came up to see if you'd take care of these from the wreck, and let us have some bandages and such like."

Nelly felt a sickening shudder creep over her, and the strange lifeless form of Barney stood like her in the morning. Captain Conover himself, pale and bleeding, was cutting the coat-sleeve from Edward's shattered arm. The other two strangers were taking care of the boat, which, after human life, always receives their first attention. Captain Ben did not notice the girl, who, pale and terrified, and the first intimation he had of her presence was her heart-broken cry as she sank upon the stones beside the "big light." "Oh, Barney, Barney, dear, to be sure, but you shall take care of him and make him a sound man again."

Captain Ben, and Barnard were on board the brig when she broke up, and, before the boat could rescue them, the floating pieces of wreck, dashing about in a cross-sea, had well-nigh crushed them. Captain Ben escaped with sound bones, though badly bruised; but poor Barney had his left arm and two ribs broken, the left side bruised, and many a hard knock beside. They removed him carefully to the keeper's house, and Captain Conover dressed the fractures with the skill of an old surgeon. Then Ellen took her place at his bedside—the place which she would occupy for days, and the happy time of fever and delirium which followed—scarce consenting to leave him, even when he slept, for the long dark hours when he was not to wake. Thanks to her tender care—thanks to a strong physique and a temperate life, his convalescence, slowly approaching, at last reached the days when grew longer and the soft winds of summer, fresh from the Atlantic, breathed through the open windows. Happy days, too, when the first pleasure-day in June a little excursion was made to the Highlands in Barnard's own boat. So delighted was he to be on deck once more, and to be declared himself quite well again. "Dear Nelly, I shall be a trouble to you no longer. Are you not glad?"

Nelly answered with a little sigh, and was very quiet all that day; and it came to pass, thereafter, that she withdrew herself from his side. Not from her intimacy which had been so grateful to the convalescent, which had served him as foundation for so many castles in Spain. Greatly he missed her and grieved, and finally sought explanation of this most mysterious change. Nelly listened in silence, read, when he had done, with his plaint, turned away weeping, and left him, avoiding him now more than ever. Then the mystery increased, Barney and the lovers scarce spoke to each other. Nelly was silent and sad; pale, and often in tears. Pining for him? For what? Who reads the heart of a girl?

Early in the fall there came to the Hook a party of gentlemen in search of game. Some of them some young fellows they were; mustached, well dressed, and well mannered. Nelly's spirits revived. The officers, well pleased to have so agreeable in a place of so little promise, were certainly very attentive. Edward, flirt and indignant, secluded himself with his boat. He was seen only on duty; and yet when he happened to meet her sometimes, her true eyes would beam upon him the same glance of earnest kindness as before, her voice thrill with emotions which but one in the world can excite. When the Carleton Club, in the river, gave their annual regatta, Barnard wrote a little note inviting Nelly to the race. Nelly went down the river bank carrying the note in her hand. Finding Barnard there, she stood in the door a while, veiling the innocent paper in pieces. When 'twas all destroyed she sprinkled the bits on the floor, saying, "I can't go with you to-morrow," and so departed. Next morning was mild and inviting. Edward was early astir, and set sail, alone, in his boat, not to be the race in the river, but many miles out on the sea. When he returned in the evening the officer's eight-oared barge was also returned from the river, the liver-ropes handled by Nelly. After their supper was over Nelly, with coolest bravado, came to Edward's door and knocked. Not in unwholesome thought, and spoke with mocking politeness, "Why were you not at the races?

Any your friends would not be half so long at it if had you only been with us."

He looked at her sadly a moment; then held out his hand, saying, "I think you could believe that 'twas you who gave me this ring? When I think of the manner of giving I can hardly believe it myself."

Blushing and embarrassment followed, but soon she could quietly answer, "I fear you attach too much import to what was but little risqué. If you think that it meant more than friendship perhaps you had better return it."

"Nelly, can you have very well how much that ring means to me. I pray, then, that no hasty word, perhaps not wholly intended, may deprive me of hope to build on that. Wait for two or three days, and then if you wish me to know that I must not any more look upon you as I have done, throw a red rose-bud from your room as you were to-day when you came home in the barge, and—you shall have—your ring."

On the third day thereafter Nelly went down to the station with a great white rose on her dress, and under it, almost hidden, a little bud of red. Barnard was puzzled, but the rose was not returned.

Toward noon, one dreary day early in November, the Uncle Harry's overhead tongue to wheel up into battle-array, and to send forth gusty, blustering threats of strife. The keeper in the "big light" tended his small craft covering-flag and hurrying inside the Hook, while the larger vessels, keeping on their way, acknowledged the danger by reducing sail and making all snug. Far away, in the southeast, a faint line of smoke told him of a steamer inward bound, none having put out that morning. Could the tugs having fish under lee of the light-ship.

"The worst luck in the world," thought the old man. "Barney 'll be off soon, and I'll be all alone. Never mind—this the storm comes on so black he can't see the signal, if there is one."

Hurrying down, he met the object of his anxiety coming from the house clad in his storm togs and dove-cage in hand.

"You are going out? Eye just come down, and there's no signal in sight."

"Telegraph from the Highlands, Uncle Harry. Steamer from the Golden Gate. News of the Californ his elections. There, don't scold—I must go, you know."

And so he went, despite the warnings and entreaties of the good keeper, who, remounting to the top of the "big light," watched the little skiff until it was lost to his sight in the coming storm.

Edward had calculated to meet the steamer before the squall came upon him, and take a few hours' sail for a boat as was his wayward, by waiting for a pilot, not caring to approach a lee-shore without one. He discovered this, and had just time to take her bearings when the sea shut out from view by the driving spray torn from the surface of the sea by the fierce gusts of the tempest. On he drove, carefully holding his course but not seeing the steamer, until he thought he must have passed her, when suddenly a huge black mass rose before him, like a phantom springing from the depths of the ocean. He rounded to under her counter before being discovered by her, and then, amidst the shrieking of the wind through the rigging, 'twas impossible to make himself heard. They knew him of course, and though not expecting him in such weather, his package, being ready, was weighted and thrown into his boat. Securing the envelope under his pea-jacket, he hurriedly left the private, who flew like an arrow straight for home. With the package was an urgent invitation for the pilot to board the steamer and stay by her until the gale was over. He was at first tempted to do so; but a thought of those who would be anxious for his safe return, determined him to decline the kind request, so waving his hat in farewell he put the boat about, and in another moment was once more alone in the storm.

He had been out about three hours, and supposed himself to be twenty-five miles or more from Sandy Hook. He knew the coast well, however, and though his sail was reefed down to hardly more than a hand's-breadth, he kept along at a rate that he was sure would take him to the Hook. Here no reflections, however, were not of the most cheerful character as he looked back on the locker watching that he should not run too far under. Nelly had lately grown more capricious than ever, and when he had left her so seriously with her, she either discomfited him with merry mockery, or with cold words and haughty glances would turn away and leave him. "I will see a kitten shall be this evening," thought he; "but to-morrow colder than I am now, and that's too cold for comfort." Here his reverie was interrupted by a faint cry, almost lost in the roar of the tempest. Directly astern, drifting fast before the gale, was a large sail-boat, with pale faces and dripping garments and the boom flying. Some helpless creature—could it possibly be a woman?—was clinging to the tiller, though without attempt to guide the ill-fated craft, which more steer as she span round before the wind. As he bore down on the sinking sail-boat he could see that its only occupant was a woman, or rather girl, for she was evidently quite young, and how a mere boy could have managed it. "Throw a rope, boy, now," thought he, "he could jump out of that fast enough; but a girl—well, she must take the only chance there is." Ranging so close alongside that the two boats touched, he threw the end of a line, which the girl fortunately caught. Making signs to her to fasten it round her waist, he cried, "Stand on the wash-board and jump as we lift with the sea!"

With intelligent obedience she stood an instant, with one foot on the rail, watching for the right moment, and when it came, springing forward, she landed safely in Barnard's arms. Without wasting time in words—for they were fast drifting seaward —he deposited her on the stern-sheets, and again trimmed in for home. He was obliged to lay much closer to the wind than before, having lost at least five miles dead to leeward. Once more on his course, his attention was devoted to his fair passenger.

In response to Barnard's questions, she informed him her name was Annie—Annie Wilson; her father, a shipping merchant in New York, owned a cottage near Rockaway, where the family were spending the summer. They had all returned to town, however, and the apartments were closed house. She had learned to sail a boat about the little bay where they lived, and long entertained an ambition to go outside once, on a fine, quiet, broad ocean, "just to see how it would seem." Opportunity occurring in the absence of the family, she had made bold and prospered exceedingly, until she attempted to return, when a strong head-wind was to be encountered, and then, even with her manœuvre experience in boating, progress was rather slow. She thought she should have reached home finally though; but that a sudden flaw twitched the sheet from her hand, nearly upset the boat, and sent her drifting out to sea, where she certainly would have perished had she not been rescued by the timely appearance of one whose face vanished from the bottom of her heart, and whom she would pray for as long as she lived." A few tears on account of father's anxiety for his runaway girl, which ceased when assured that her father should be telegraphed to immediately; more expressions of gratitude to her preserver, her benefactor, and the weary head sank upon his shoulder, the bright blue eyes closed, and she slept of exhaustion.

Barney held on his course until he weathered the point of the Hook, preferring to run round into the bay rather than attempt to land with his fair encumbrance, through the surf. 'Twas a little past ten o'clock when he beached the boat, opposite the keeper's house, and gave his hail Uncle Harry came down with a lantern. When Miss Wilson awoke she was hardly able to move, but with assistance walked to the house, receiving Nelly's offer to carry her there. Nelly was glad, very glad to see Barnard safely returned, though she would have died rather than confess how much she had been surprised by seeing a beautiful young lady enter with him. Barnard gave his charge Nelly's room, and left her to Nelly's tender look of her. She was too tired to wait, even for supper, and would retire immediately; she should have Nelly's room. Nelly's room! Nelly's bed! even though she did take both of Edward's hands, and say: "Good-night, dear Mr. Barnard! Heaven bless you, and keep you in this night and every night."

Barney regrouped to Miss Wilson, in Eighteenth Street; but that gentleman had been sent for from Rockaway. The message should be given him immediately on his return. Hoping to have a kind word from Nelly, he returned to the house. He was disappointed, however, for he saw her again but a moment, and then she did not speak. The next morning Edward found a message at the station stating that Mr. Wilson would start for the Hook in his own boat. As he approached the house with the news, Miss Wilson left Nelly and came forth to greet him. As they stood, hand in hand, near the door, he, looking down lovingly upon her, and she, looking fondly up to him, Nelly could not help hearing and seeing all that passed between them. She heard:

"And so we must lose you. They are coming to take away my treasure, which I have but just found. Annie, I think I am entitled to one-third of you, at least; that's legal salvage."

"You are entitled to my eternal gratitude; and as to losing me, that is not to be. We shall always be friends, shall we not? I shall like you ever so much; indeed, I do now. I think you are splendid!"

Nelly not caring to hear more, had the cruelty to announce breakfast.

About an hour Mr. Wilson came. His daughter was waiting on the wharf for him, and during half an hour they two were alone with each other. Then Nelly summoned them to the house, where Barnard was writing up Uncle Harry's accounts. After greetings and thanks came an awkward pause. The weight of obligation oppressed Mr. Wilson, and he knew not how to seek relief. He, to his daughter, "Ma chère, are you ready?"

Yes, Sir; I learned from books."

"Excuse my questions; but do you know other languages?"

"None but Spanish, and just a little Italian."

"You were at work on these books. Do you understand the science of accounts?"

"I think I may say I do."

"Would you like to enter my counting-room, Mr. Barnard?"

"I hardly know, Sir. Twould take a great temptation to make me leave here," looking over to the door where Nelly was standing.

To Mr. Wilson "temptation" means money. He says, "What would you think of fifteen hundred the first year, and two thousand the next?"

Edward is astonish-ed! Two thousand dollars seems like a large fortune. And yet he wishes those brown eyes would ask him not to go. Mr. Wilson, watching him, understands his hesitation at once. "Do not be in haste to decide, Mr. Barnard; think over the matter, and write me your answer."

Another look toward Nelly. She has turned away, and is quietly tearing to pieces the necklace of shells he made for her. The tears which would fall from the brown eyes he could not see.

"The advantages of your offer are so apparent that there exists but one question in my mind with regard to it. If you feel indebted to me, and desire in this way to make me a present of money, 'twould be wrong for me to accept it; but if you can really give me some money to earn so much, 'twould be equally wrong to refuse.'

"I like your scruples, Mr. Barnard; and take pleasure in assuring you that the sum I mentioned is the same we have always paid for work which I'm sure you can do."

"Then I shall be right glad to undertake it." He spoke very slowly, but not a look came from the brown eyes to interrupt him; and so 'twas decided he should go.

Uncle Harry mourned the loss of his pupil as though he were a son. "We shall miss you so, my boy. I was in hopes you'd stay with us; yes, Barney, I did hope you and my girl would keep strike well enough to row in the same boat all your lives."

Such words might have made Barnard repent his decision, and remain a "longshoreman yet, but that Nelly continued obdurate as ever. Annie Wilson's wining face would come between her and Barnard; and if bitter tears fell upon her book low she was only the more cold and distant in his presence. And so the young man went away, grieved and almost hopeless, yet wearing the ring which she gave to him long ago.

Hardly was Edward installed in his new position when the ice called upon to endure another effusion of gratuitous thanks. A gentleman, whom Mr. Wilson introduced as Bently, called at the office and was promising in professions of gallantry, and offers of friendly service. More, with much tact and delicacy, he really did render much aid to the young stranger in the metropolis. Edward did not quite understand all this kindness at first, but Annie Wilson explained the mystery, and, blushingly, told him all about it. In return he confided to her all his troubles with Ellen; and so it happened that in writing to Ellen, as she had promised to do, Annie's letters were filled with Barnard's praise—he was all that is good, noble, brave, and kind, and was greatly pitied when these letters were not answered—thinking she had written pleasantly and politicly; not dreaming that her words of admiration would be as gall and wormwood to the lonely girl on Sandy Hook.

Barnard had been in town about a month, and was visiting Annie one evening, when he was taken into confidence by Bently—who was there of course—and the great secret was divulged to him. The wedding was to take place on Annie's birthday, in February. "And now," said Bently, "Annie and I want you to stand up with us, and Annie says Miss Warden must be one of the bridemaids."

Edward would be only too happy, but Nelly—that is Miss Warden—he did not know, perhaps she might object.

"Oh, you can persuade her, I'm sure!" cries Annie. "At least you will ask her, will you not?"

Yes, certainly, he would ask her. And so the next Saturday found him on the way to Sandy Hook.

Even a period so short as a month, in a city like New York, suffices to effect a great change in the appearance, the mien, of a young man, when first brought in contact with its influences. The change is not only for the worse—which is sure to be improved—but in his character, which may be improved, or the reverse. In Barnard's case, associations of the first class, surrounded by the latest refinements of civilization, had given him a graceful activity, a certain air of elegance, which he was scarcely conscious of, but which was very visible to those who had known him before. Uncle Harry would hardly restrain his admiration while Ellen was timid, a little afraid of the fine gentleman; but he soon convinced them that the same honest heart throbbed beneath the new broadcloth as heretofore under the Guernsey frock. Nelly made vigorous attempts to be formal and distant; but the quick pleasure would make the brown eyes seek the welcome face, would give to her manner the old kindly familiarity. But after sayings, "I am estimated that he would like to see her alone a moment, he had an important request to make, then all her pride returned. Did he think to humble her in a moment, because she had grown so refined and handsome; or did he wish to make his important request, in order to satisfy his curiosity and leave him free to take Annie Wilson? Yes, she would grant the interview, and if he wished to be free, she would take back her lover's ring, and never, never part with it again.

This was the first prearranged tête-à-tête he ever sought with her, and he found it rather formidable. Indeed he was so much embarrassed he hardly knew what to say. "I suppose, Annie," meant Miss Wilson—has told you—that is, written to you about the wedding?"

"Wedding!" cries Nelly, aghast. "I had not heard. When is it to be?"

"On the 5th of February—Annie's birthday."

"So soon!" murmured the stricken girl. "So soon!"

"Yes. I hardly thought 'twould occur so early; but the preparations are nearly all made, and my request to you is that you will be one of the bridemaids. Annie has set her heart on it, and perhaps I need not add that I too would be very glad if you would."

"Very glad! Where was all her pride now? Cowering upon the sofa, her little frame convulsed with sobbing, her face hidden in her hands, she wailed out, "Oh, Edward, have I deserved this?"

"Deserved!" cries the bewildered youth. "Is he discovered? Would it be such a punishment, then, simply to stand up with me?"

"Don't, Edward. Please don't. 'Twould kill me to see you married—I know it would. When your wedding-day comes, I shall wish I was in the bottom of the ocean."

"My wedding-day? See me married? I'm not going to be married. Mr. Bently is to be the groom. Oh you dear little blush-rose, have you entertained yourself at last? You shall not run away now. Nay, then, I'll hold you, if I must."

And so he did a long, long time.

Mr. Barnard was mistaken when he said he was not to be married. Nelly became Mrs. Barnard on the 5th of February.

NO. VII.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

In the confession that I have often travelled from this Covent Garden lodging of mine on Sundays should give offense to those who never travel on Sundays, they will be satisfied (I hope) by my adding that the journeys in question were made to churches.

Not that I have any curiosity to hear powerful preachers. Time was, when I was dragged by the hair of my head, as one may say, to hear too many. On summer evenings, when the sun shone, and bee and bird might have better addressed my soft young heart, I have in my day been caught in the toils of a broken reed, who, from the top of a pew, violently scrubbed from the neck to the roots of the hair, as a purification for the Temple, and have often been carried off into strong fits of unconscious electricity to be steamed like a potato in the unventilated breath of the powerful Bonnegrace under and his congregation, until the iron grew mind I had was quite steamed out of me. In which pitiable plight I have been hauled out of the place of meeting, as the clothes of the old ladies, and catcalled respectably Boanerges Boiler, his fifthly, his sixthly, and his seventhly, until I have regarded that reverend boy in the light of a most dismal and oppressive Charade. Time was when I was carried off to platform assemblages at which no human child, without the gift of years, could possibly keep its eyes open, and when I felt the fatal sleep stealing, stealing over me, and when it gradually bared the drowsy countenances of the orators, and catechised

OUR JAPANESE VISITORS.

We publish on this page three engravings of Japanese subjects, which will be viewed with interest now that every body is talking about our Japanese visitors. The picture representing Japanese noblemen is from a photograph, and will convey a faithful idea of the way they dress and their general appearance. The picture of the principal street in Jeddo is from a Japanese drawing. Our visitors have several artists with them, who will doubtless sketch our streets and publish the pictures when they return. It may be hoped that the pictures will be in a higher style of art than the view of Jeddo. The picture of the tea-garden introduces the beholder to one of the most interesting institutions of Japan—Japanese cafés, in fact, where people go to drink tea and pass an hour in a cool, pleasant atmosphere, attended by graceful maidens.

Mr. Oliphant was charmed by the waitresses at these establishments, who, he says, are as fair as European girls, and are graceful and respectful in manner. It is a pity our visitors had not brought a few of their fair countrywomen with them.

We shall next week present the reader with more sketches of our distinguished visitors.

CHAPTER XV.

DROWNING A MOTHER TO MURDER A DAUGHTER.

"No sooner had I assured the old lady that I would transfer them to my vessel than her daughter made a step forward, and, letting her shawl fall upon the deck, she seized my hand with both of hers and said, in a low contralto voice:

"'Heaven bless you, Señor.'

"By the cestus of Venus, caballeros, the pressure of that girl's hand, and the deep, speaking look of gratitude she gave me out of her liquid eyes quite did my business! I raised her soft patrician hand to my lips and kissed it respectfully. Ha! I noticed, too, as I released her round slender fingers, that she wore a sapphire of great brilliancy—ay, here it is now! I keep it in remembrance of the girl."

Saying this the host shook back the lace ruffles of his sleeve, and, crooking his little finger, exhibited the jewel to his guests.

The Doctor looked as cold as marble, and said not a word.

"Well, gentlemen, I soon got that ship in a tolerably wholesome state of command. I made my trusty old boatswain, Pedillo, lock the fuddled skipper up sound and tight in his own stateroom, and the rest of my men took a few ropes' ends and belted the lubbers of a crew until they went to work at the pumps with renewed vigor. I also insisted upon the scared male servants of the passengers lending a hand at that innocent recreation, for you see I had no intention of letting the ship go down—"

"With the Capitano Brand in her," interrupted Señor Sanchez.

"No, by no manner of means; for the ship I felt was settling fast, and I could hear the loose cargo, which had broken adrift below in the main hold, playing the devil's own game; smashing and crushing from side to side as the vessel rolled, and coming in contact with the stanchions and beams, with a surging swash of water, too, which told the tale without the trouble of breaking open the hatches. I took, however, the precaution to run my eye over the manifest to see if, perchance, there was any treasure in the after run or any where else; as, in case there had been, I should have made some effort to get at it; but there was nothing on board but wine, dried fruits, and heavy bale goods, not worth the time or trouble, in the aspect of affairs at that time, to save as much as a single cask or a drum of prunes. I glanced, too, at the clearance list, and saw that the names of the passengers were La Señora Luisa Lavarona, and the Señorita Lucia, lady and daughter, with half a dozen orders and titles, of the Judge in Porto Rico. Bueno! roll me an orange if you please, Doctor! Ah, gracias, thanks."

The Doctor rolled the orange, and had it been a grape-shot or any other iron missile its aim would have gone straight through the Captain's body just above his left waistcoat pocket.

"In the mean while the old lady rushed around in a tremendous hurry, in and out of the cabin, losing her balance occasionally in the lurches, ordering her maids to pull out trunks and boxes on to the deck; then giving me a hug to relieve her feelings, and praying and crying between whiles in the most whimsical manner. Not contented either with getting out a pile of luggage and chests that would have swamped a jolly-boat, she insisted upon writing until a locker was broken open in the cabin pantry for the purpose of rescuing six cases of old port wine which had been, she told me, sent as a present from the Archbishop of Lisbon to his friend the Judge. At this juncture I persuaded her to send her daughter and a few light articles first on board my vessel, when the boat would then return for herself and the remainder of their property. Accordingly I carefully wrapped the lovely girl in shawls and cloaks, and got her over the side and down into my boat, pitched a few light caskets and cases in after the young beauty, and then, with a quiet word or two into Pedillo's sharp ear, the boat shoved off. I suppose it may have been half an hour before my boat returned, and then I learned from the coxswain that he had shown his charge down into my private cabin, and she appeared as comfortable and resigned as possible. Well, we made quick work of it now, tumbled a good many things into the boat, when I myself got in to receive the old lady and her retinue. By-the-way, among the articles were the boxes of wine: this is some of it"—tapping the decanter now nearly empty from the attacks of the priest—"and in my opinion it does great credit to the taste and judgment of that venerable Archbishop.

"Where was I? Oh! ah! We were waiting alongside the ship, with her lower chainplates not a foot above water, for the Donna to be hoisted over the rail, since she would not permit any of her attendants to precede her—though Heaven knows they were anxious enough to do so. By this time, too, after my men had left the deck of the ship, the crew had somehow got hold of a barrel of wine, and letting the pumps work themselves, were guzzling away in grand style. I began to lose patience at last, and shouted to the old lady to come at once, or I should be compelled to leave her. She merely leaned over the rail, however, and chattered forth that she had in the world was at my service—of course, figuratively she meant—but she must stay another minute to find a jar of preserved ginger, which was her only cure for the colic."

"You didn't take the offer of the old lady as a figure of speech, I presume?" asked the Doctor.

"No!" muttered the one-eyed old wretch, with a sneer.

"And that jar of ginger spared her any more attacks of colic?"

"Caballeros, you are both right! I did accept the gift of her worldly goods in the frank spirit in which it was offered, without any reservation; and, to my almost certain knowledge, the Señora Lavarona was never more troubled with illness of any kind.

"The fact was, that finding the ship fast sinking, and her crew becoming boisterous and rebellious as the imminent danger burst upon them, they proposed, since their own boats were stove, to take possession of mine! That was a joke, to be sure! A dozen drunken lubbs, with naked hands, to capture ten of the old Centipede's picked men, with a pistol and knife each under their shirts; and"—here the speaker laughed heartily—"and Captain Brand beside them! Diavolo! what silly people there are in this world!"

The good Padre joined his superior in this ebullition of feeling, and seemed to enjoy the joke immensely, rolling his goggle eyes and head from side to side, kissing his crucifix, and exclaiming, with devotion,

"Que hombre es eso! What a man he is!"

Well, Señores, the next minute we let go the painter and floated astern past the ship's counter, and a few strokes of the oar-blades sent us dancing away to leeward, where the schooner was lying with her fore-sail up, and the jib-sheet hauled well to windward. We made no unnecessary noise in getting alongside, and it took no great time to get the boat clear, a tackle hooked on, and to swing her on board over the long gun. Then we drew aft the sheets, set the fore-sail, and the Centipede was once more reeling off the knots on her course."

"But the ship, my son?"

"Why, my Padre, I was so busy attending to the schooner, and afterward going below to break the sad news to my lovely dark-eyed passenger of the loss of her mother, that I had no time to direct to the ship. Pedillo, however, told me that he heard a good deal of frantic shrieking, and prayers, and cursing, with, for a little while, the renewed clank of the chain-pumps; but after that we had got too far to windward to hear more. About midnight, though, Pedillo and some of the watch thought they saw a white shower of foam like a breaking wave, and a great commotion in the water; but that was all. So, you see, what really became of that old craft we do not positively know; though for a long time afterward I read the marine lists very attentively, but yet I never saw any accounts of her arrival at her destination.

"Perhaps," added Captain Brand, with a peculiar smile, as he lit a fresh cigar, "her arrival may have escaped my notice, as I hope it may, though I think not."

Don Ignacio intimated, by waving his forefinger to and fro, that such a hope had no possible foundation in fact; and he stated, too, that he knew the underwriters had paid the full insurance on the missing ship.

"Ah! well, that seems to settle the matter, truly," murmured the Captain, as if he had long entertained painful doubts on the subject, and now his mind was finally relieved.

"But, hijo mio! son of mine! la Señorita—hiccup—with the almond-shaped eyes—Santissima!—hic—how did she bear the—death of her—hic—mother?"

"Por Dios, Padre! there was a scene which would have drawn tears from a—"

"Pirate," suggested the Doctor.

The Padre blubbered outright, and his round, tipsy eyes nearly popped out of his head.

"Ay, Monsieur, even from mine! But to go back a little. When I had got all snug on board the schooner, I went below, and moved softly on tip-toe along the passage to the door of my beautiful cabin.

"You remember, amigo," said the narrator, turning toward Don Ignacio, "how that cabin was fitted, and how much it cost to do it. I think you paid the bill for me, no?"

Oh yes! Captain Brand was quite right. Don Ignacio remembered it well, and the bill was a thousand gold ounces, sixteen thousand hard silver dollars; and he no means dear at that, for the Don never allowed any body to cheat him.

"Cheats, himself, though—sometimes. Don't charge more than the usual commission."

The one-eyed usurer looked wicked at this remark, but he said nothing, being occupied at the moment rolling up a paper cigar with one hand, and wetting the brown forthinger of the other.

"Well, caballeros, I peeped through the lattice-work of the cabin-door, and there reclined my pretty prize—I recall her as if it were yesterday—on one of the large blue satin damask lounges of the after transoms. Her head rested on one of her round, ivory arms, half-hidden in the luxurious pillows; her shawl, too, was thrown back; and with a somewhat disordered dress, and a mass of glossy hair clustering in ringlets about her neck and white shoulders, I thought then, as I do now, that she was a paragon of loveliness. I saw her, as she thus reclined, by the light of a large shaded crystal lamp, which hung by silver chains from the cabin-beams, and shed a rose-tinted effulgence over the whole apartment. When I first approached the door the girl was looking out of those large liquid lamps so superbly framed in her own fringe of dusk lashes, in evident curiosity around the elegant cabin. Her looks wandered from the Turkey carpet on the floor to the beautiful silk hangings, that exquisite set of inlaid pearl ebony furniture, the display of nicknacks, and Dresden porcelain panels of the sides, and, in fact, nothing seemed to escape her; and the good taste of the fittings evidently met her approbation. At times, too, she would turn her gaze out of the narrow little window of the stern, and peer anxiously over the vessel's wake, which by this time was skimming along like a wild duck, and leaving countless bubbles behind her. At the first sound I made, however, in opening the door, she started up and stepped forward to meet me.

"Oh, Señor Capitano, mi madre! my mother! What detains her? We seem to be going very fast through the water!'

"I gently took the girl's outstretched hands and led her back to the cushioned transom. Then I told her, as kindly as I could, that I did all in my power to save her good mother, but that the crew had mutinied—they had taken possession of the unfortunate ship—great confusion existed; and as I feared, you know, that my own boat would be swamped by remaining longer alongside, I was compelled to leave her to her fate.

"But my mother, Señor!' exclaimed the girl with anguish, 'she was saved?'

"No, Señorita,' I said, 'she went down with the ship; but the last words she uttered—that is to me—were to invoke a blessing on my head, and to consign all she possessed to my care.' The poor thing swooned away as I uttered these words, and it was a long time before she came to again. When she did, however, regain consciousness tears came to her relief, and I did all I could to soothe her distress by telling her that, if the wind came fair, she would in the course of a few days be restored to her father."

"But the wind didn't come fair, eh?" broke in Don Ignacio, "and she didn't see—"

"No, amigo, the wind held steady from the opposite quarter, and I thought it better not to beat up with a fished foremast, and all that—and—as she did not see her father."

Captain Brand here wet his thin lips with a few sips of wine, and "Babette, bring coffee!" and resumed his story.

"When the girl became a little more calm I induced her to retire to my state-room, where I left her to sob herself to sleep. Don't spill that coffee, Babette, and put the liqueurs on the table. There, that will do, old lady.

"Well, Señores, the next morning my pretty prize was too ill to leave her room; but as I handed her a cup of chocolate through the door curtains she thanked me with much gratitude for what I had done, and knew that her dear father, the Judge, would bless me."

"So he will," snarled the one-eyed old rascal, "if he ever sees you, when he draws the black cap over his head."

"Possibly he may, though perhaps it will be some considerable time before he has that pleasure.

"For three days I never even saw my pretty passenger, though I heard her low, sweet voice occasionally when I laid out something for her to eat in the adjoining cabin. She sang, too, some little sad songs with a voice which vibrated upon my ear like the notes of an Æolian harp sighing in the night wind. Dios! how I regretted then, and afterward, that I did not have a cabinet piano!"

"Presented to you," suggested the Doctor.

"Yes, presented to me, so that she might have touched the keys with those ivory and rose-tipped fingers.

"So the time passed, the schooner flying on under whole sails, the wind about two points free, and the weather as fine as silk. It was the fourth evening, I think, after parting with the Oporto trader that I induced my fair passenger to come on deck and take a little breath of sea air. You will observe, caballeros, that I did not make this suggestion in the day time, because the Centipede's crew, you know, were rather numerous, and some of them not so handsome in point of personal looks as ladies at all times care to behold. Besides, there were certain things about the deck—racks of cutlasses, lockers of musketry along the rail, and a long brass twelve-pounder, which is not altogether hidden by the boat, you know, and might have given rise to a little curiosity, or maybe suspicion, even in the mind of a girl, as to our character, pursuits, and so forth, which I should have been puzzled to answer. Therefore I chose the clear starlight night to pay my homage, and accordingly I went below about four bells of the first watch to escort the little lady to the deck. She was dressed, and waiting for me in the cabin; and if I was so struck with her beauty when I first saw her, my heart thumped now against my ribs like a volley of musket-balls against an oak plank. She wore a black silk robe, such as Spanish women wear at early mass, and around the back part of her head—where the hair was gathered in a glossy knot, and secured by a gold bodkin—fell the heavy folds of a black lace mantilla, the lower end fastened sash fashion around her lithe waist. She stepped, too, like a queen on a pair of slim, long, delicate feet, with arched bell and instep, as if she were in command of the schooner.

"By my right arm!" exclaimed Captain Brand, shaking that member aloft in a glorious fit of enthusiasm, "I am quite sure she had conquered me, and that was more than half the battle! Well, I led her to the quarter-deck, where some cushions and flags had been placed for her near the weather taffrail, and where she sat down. Well, Senores, the graceful girl beside me never spoke scarcely for half an hour. I divined, however, what her thoughts might have been in dwelling on the painful scenes she had recently witnessed, and I held my peace also. For you see I have had considerable experience with women, and I have ever found that a man loses more by talking than by remaining watchful and attentive."

Captain Brand looked, as he gave utterance to this philosophical sentiment, as if he were a thirsty, cold-eyed tiger, lying in wait to spring upon an unwary passer-by.

"Yes, I waited, until at last she spoke.

"'Capitano,' she said, 'what a beautiful vessel you command, and how fast she sails!'

"What I replied, my friends, is neither here nor there; but I sank down on the cushions beside the lovely girl, and poured out a torrent of passionate words—which I really felt, too, at the time—as I don't think I ever uttered before or since. She was a little startled and nervous at first, but after a while I saw her stately head droop to one side till it rested on my shoulder. I stole my arm around her yielding waist, and clasped her to my breast."

Here Captain Brand looked as if the tiger had already sprung upon the passer-by, and was sucking the blood with his claws buried deep into the carcass.

"Señor," she murmured, in the low, sweet plaintive note of a nightingale, 'I am a young and inexperienced girl of an old and noble family; you have saved my life, my mother is gone, and I have no one to advise with, and if my dear father smiles upon my choice I will marry you, but do not, I implore you, deceive me!'"

"And you did not deceive her, I hope," broke in the Doctor, with a shiver of light from his determined eyes that was almost painful to see, so earnest and terrible it was, as he leaned forward with both of his clenched hands quivering nervously on the table.

Captain Brand looked at the Doctor with rather a suspicious stare, and then his features drop from his arm-pits till they rested on the flaps of his waistcoat pockets, he replied in a careless tone:

"Oh no, Monsieur, I never deceived—s—that is to say, intentionally deceived a woman, in all my life!"

"Let us hear more, my son," said the priest, who had now woke up from a short nap, and took a deep interest in the love-making episode of his Captain.

"Buena, caballeros!" continued the narrator, as he tossed off a thimbleful of maraschino from a wicker-bound square bottle, after his coffee. "Well, gentlemen, the young Don Ignacio Quesnel, Señorita Lucia, and I sat there under the weather rail till the first faint streaks of early dawn in the tropics began to announce the coming of the gray morning. Then she arose, and, leaning with a soft pressure on my arm, I took her to her cabin, kissed her sweet hands, and bade her good-night."

At this stage of the narrative Captain Brand threw himself triumphantly back in his large Manilla chair, and ran his white muscular hands through his dry light hair. Ay! the tiger had clutched his prey. An unprotected young and lovely girl had been won and lost, and her palpitating heart was soon to be torn from her tender body.

A Friend in Need. Try it.

Sweet's Infallible Liniment is prepared from the recipe of Dr. Stephen Sweet, of Connecticut, the great bone setter, and has been used in his practice for the last twenty years with the most astonishing success. As an external remedy it is without a rival, and will alleviate pain more speedily than any other preparation. For all Rheumatic and Nervous Disorders it is truly infallible, and as a curative for Sores, Wounds, Sprains, Bruises, &c., its searching, healing and powerful properties, for prompt, eerie, excite the just wonder and astonishment at what it will do in a short time. Sold by all the leading druggists and dealers of remarkable cures, performed by it within the last two years attest this fact.

NEURALGIA AND RHEUMATISM!

The Thousands who suffer torture from these terrible diseases will find instant relief and a speedy cure in this pain by using the great internal remedy, WATSON'S NEURALGIA CURE. It is a well known fact that will permanently eradicate all traces of the disease from the system. Waste not your time and money on outward applications. Liniments and Oils only temporize, and are of doubtful efficacy. An internal remedy is required, one that will reach the source of the trouble. The NEURALGIA KING is the name of the article which had this power. Price One Dollar a bottle, or 6 for $5 00.

Dyspepsia.

One great predisposing cause to this disease, is the neglect and irregularity of action of the functions of the stomach and bowels. When these fail to regularly perform their duties, for any length of time, Dyspepsia in some of its forms is also most sure to follow. Brown's Lazative Troches or Cathartic Lozenges will effectually aid Nature to restore these to a healthy action. Physicians who know their ingredients freely recommend them.

J. R. Stafford's Olive Tar
AND Iron and Sulphur Powders.

Read the testimonials of the following distinguished individuals, the original of whose letters may be seen at this office, as to the power which these remedies have over disease:
George Law, Esq., No. 243 Fifth Avenue, New York, recommends the use of Olive Tar for colds, coughs, rheumatism, bruises and sprains. He also commends the use of the Iron and Sulphur Powders for eruptions and other diseases of the blood.
Simeon Leland, Esq., Metropolitan Hotel, Broadway, New York, uses Olive Tar to relieve pains and to cure eruptions. He also uses the Iron and Sulphur Powders to cure diseases of the skin and blood, and always both remedies are effectual.
O. Charlick, Esq., President of the Eighth Avenue Railroad, New York, considers Olive Tar the best external remedy he has ever known used, and also that Tar, whether inhaled or applied, is very beneficial for diseases of the throat or lungs.
Sold by the Olive Tar Company, 442 Broadway, and by all druggists.

The present Number commences the Twenty-first Volume of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. When, ten years ago, the Publishers proposed to issue a Magazine which "should piece within the reach of the great mass of the American people the unbounded treasures of the Periodical Literature of the day," they did not dare to hope that within five years a circle of seventy thousand would be gathered, whose contributions, as far as the Magazine is concerned, would amply supersede the productions of their European contemporaries. But with each successive year the number and value of the Original Papers has increased, and for five years the Magazine has been the largest and best illustrated publication, written expressly for its pages, by American Authors. There is no country in the State in the Union, in which it has not, been represented in its pages. The Publishers believe that the Twenty-first Volume of the Magazine contains a more copious exhibition of American Life, Character, and Scenery than can be embodied in any, or all other publications of the kind.

In commencing a new decade of the Magazine the Publishers feel themselves warranted in assuring their Readers that during the next Ten Years, and the increased facilities at their command, will enable them to make it still more worthy of the very liberal support which it has received. The main features which have given it its distinguishing character will be retained, and such others will be added as their experience has shown to be desirable. In a few days Volume will be commenced a Novel of American Life and character, written by an Author whose isolated Tales have been received with marked favor.

Round Hill Water Cure and Hotel,

At Northampton, Mass., continues to be a favorite resort of invalids, out of families and others seeking relaxation and pleasure. It is delightfully situated and charming mountain scenery, and partially surrounded by forty acres of forest park, while the views from the extended verandahs are worth a journey to see.

The success of H. Halsted, M.D., the proprietor and principal physician, in the cure of woman's diseases, is well Known. For the successful treatment of various other chronic complaints at Round Hill, see Circular sent gratis, or Treatise on Watercpathy, 25 cents.

"This much is true; Dr. Halsted has great success in his practice, and his institution is widely resorted to."—Atlas and Bee

"His success in the treatment of disease is undisputed."—Tribune.

"Round Hill. We freely, and with the unanimous assent of all who have ever visited this charming spot, commend it as a delightful place of sojourn. The scenery is of unrivaled beauty, the air pure, and fever, give it inexhaustible variety, which have been embellished by tasteful cultivation. There are numerous delightful drives in the vicinity, and the hotel is well kept, combining every accommodation for guests, as well for their comfort as amusement."—N. O. Picayune.

Captain Marcy's Prairie Traveller.

A RELIABLE GUIDE TO

Pike's Peak,

UTAH, OREGON AND CALIFORNIA.

The Prairie Traveller.

A HAND-BOOK FOR OVERLAND EMIGRANTS.

With Maps, Illustrations, and Itineraries of the Principal Routes between the Mississippi and the Pacific. By Randolph B. Marcy, Captain U.S. Army. Published by Authority of the War Department. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

This volume has been prepared by Captain Marcy, of the Army, after an experience of 20 years upon the frontier, and with special reference to the requirements of emigrants and travellers in the plains, and it will be found to contain all the information necessary to enable them to overcome the numerous obstacles they are liable to encounter, and teach them how to travel through the Indian country with safety to themselves and their animals.

No man intending to visit Pike's Peak will be without the book, if he knows it. Recommended it is by him, as it contains, among other things, itineraries of the best roads that have been traveled, from the Missouri River, with the measured distances between each camping place, and of a minute description of the water, wood, and grass. Captain Marcy, who is perfectly familiar with the country about Pike's Peak, has an accurate description of it, with a map.

Should the emigrant, after his arrival at Pike's Peak, desire to go to New Mexico, Utah, Oregon, or to the newly-discovered Washoe Mines in Carson Valley, he will find among the numerous itineraries the most careful and minute directions for the best roads to each place.

With this book in his hand the traveller will be able, on starting out from each camp, to tell precisely how far he has to go before he reaches the next camping place, which will enable him to regulate his drives to the best advantage for his animals.

THE PRACTICAL USES OF PHRENOLOGY are: First, To teach the relative functions of parts of the system into harmonious and well-directed action. Second, To understand the functions and uses of each separate organ. Third, To enable us to govern and educate each faculty and each temperament, increasing the power of some and properly directing others. And, Fourth, By combining these lessons, it enables us to "know ourselves," and to account readily for each matter, thought, and act, on SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES. And, Fifth, Moreover, it enables us to indicate, with great exactness in writing, the Profession, Occupation, or "Calling" in Life, in which each person may best succeed, and in which he may become most useful and happy.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $3 00 A YEAR.

The Fourth Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY is now in progress. Last year over 4,500,000 Numbers of HARPER'S WEEKLY were sold, nearly double the circulation of any paper for reference. The New Volume, the Proprietors desire to state, will be issued even more elaborately and more interesting than its predecessors.

It has been the aim of the conductors of HARPER'S WEEKLY, in the first place, and before any thing else, a FIRST-CLASS NEWSPAPER—a pictorial history of current events, equal to the daily press in fullness of description, and superior to the weekly press in condensing information in a form How far they have attained their aim, the volumes now published will show. The published Index to the Illustrations in the Third Volume will bear evidence to the fidelity with which every important event of the year past has been related and illustrated in the pages of HARPER'S WEEKLY. The pictorial relic especially of the Japan mission, to the heads—The Italian War, the Great Eastern Steamship, the Harper's Ferry Insurrection, the Kansas Expedition, the Paraguay Expedition, China, etc., etc. The value of the pages has been realized by supposing that it did not exist, and by trying to conceive how little people would easily know of passing events if they had to rely on written descriptions alone. In this respect, the arrangements for the coming year are more complete than they have been heretofore. HARPER'S WEEKLY has regular artist correspondents in the principal cities of the globe, and is sure of promptly obtaining sketches of every leading event in which our countrymen are concerned. It commands the pencil of the first artists at home, and, as in the case of the late outbreak at Harper's Ferry, can render its readers eye-witnesses of striking scenes whenever they occur. It will, moreover, in order to present its readers with a complete illustrated history of our age, continue to transfer to its pages the best and most generally interesting pictures from foreign illustrated journals, just as the daily papers transfer to their columns the articles in foreign newspapers. In a word, the Publishers of HARPER'S WEEKLY may rely on finding in its pages next year an accurate, well-drawn, well-engraved, and well-printed picture of the principal events which occurs, and a portrait of every man who attracts the general attention of the people of this country.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue, as heretofore, to publish the best tales that are written by native and foreign authors. It has already published a Tale of Two Cities, by CHARLES DICKENS (with original illustrations drawn for HARPER'S WEEKLY); Hard Cash and Griffith Gaunt, by CHARLES READE; The Dead Secret, by WILKIE COLLINS; Lois the Witch, by Mrs. CATHARINE SEDGWICK; Good Fight, by CHARLES READE; Framley, by GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS; The New Partner (a Tale of Wall Street), by HOLME LEE; Mary Seaham, and The Mysteries of the Faraways, by ELIA BURMAN; Lucy Hardinge, by the author of Two Years Ago; a Series of Journeys, by CHARLES DICKENS; The Woman in White, by WILKIE COLLINS; Christmas Stories, by CHARLES READE, and Captain Brand, of the Schooner Centipede, by HOLME LEE. The Tale now publishing is by HOLME LEE.

On or before the conclusion of these tales, others of equal merit will be commenced. It is the intention of the publishers to secure every week a thoroughly readable story of interest, original or adapted, as may be necessary to add, that the foreign serials which authors by the Proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY, will be issued by the proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY, in order to secure, for the first time, the earliest sight of precisely what amounts to a handsome copyright to the author.

In addition to each number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will contain a short compact history of the week, in which will be found, in a condensed form, the latest political results, the most important public acts, and the most interesting literary events. They are always ready to give the highest place to original matter; but they will not exclude a first-class tale because it is foreign, in order to print an inferior one which happens to have been written here.

STEINWAY & SONS'

PATENT OVERSTRUNG GRANDS,

AND SQUARE PIANOS

Are now considered the best Pianos manufactured.

☞ Opinion of nearly all the greatest and most prominent Musicians and Artists regarding these Instruments:

The undersigned, having personally examined and practically tested the improvement in Grand Pianos invented by H. STEINWAY, in which the covered strings are overstrung above those remaining, do hereby certify:

1. That as a result of the said improvement the volume of the Piano is greatly improved in quality, quantity, and power.

2. The sound by Steinway's improvement is much more even, less harsh, stronger, and much better prolonged, than that realized in any other Piano with which we are acquainted.

3. The undersigned regard the improvement of Mr. Steinway as most novel, ingenious, and important. No Piano of similar construction has ever been known or used, as far as the undersigned know or believe.

There is no Doubt of it.

The world is satisfied there are good remedies if they could only be found. Now, ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are one of these good remedies that thousands would be glad to know, and will bless the day when they do have experience of their great curative and pain-relieving properties.

We call attention to the following letter, the original of which is at No. 4 Union Square, and may be inspected. The facts demand attention. The name is not published, but may be seen as above. We hope the party will yet permit his respectable and honored name to be published. We are permitted to show the letter.

THOS. ALLCOCK & CO.

MESSRS. THOS. ALLCOCK & CO., No. 4 Union Square, N. Y.

Enclosed I send you an order for your excellent Porous Plasters. They have done me a great deal of good. Two years ago, on the 15th of March, I was run over by a lumber wagon, which injured my back severely, and broke off one of the spinous processes, (the lowest joint of the back bone,) and ruptured the ligaments between four of the others. A bump of about 1½ inch was all the external evidence of the injury for the pain was far greater than dying every day would be. I applied to the best physicians of New York, Wisconsin, and Michigan, who failed to relieve me, though, in justice to them, I must say some of their prescriptions I did not follow. I gave up all hopes of permanent relief from pain, when I happened to read your advertisement, which I had seen before, but had paid no attention to it, but was persuaded to send for a dollar's worth, and at least make trial of them. This was several months ago. The first plaster did me good. I then sent for half a yard, and put it on my back, reaching from hip bone to hip bone. I have worn it for five or six weeks, and feel nearly as well as ever. I think nothing but Allcock's Porous Plaster has done me any good, and if it is not that, then I am getting well of an injury from which the best surgeons and physicians told me, "You have a chance to live, and you have a chance to die." I shall keep on sticking to the plasters, if they will stick to me, and, judging from those already tried, I think they will. I am yours truly.

Original, dated April 18th, 1860, marked 160, may be seen at No. 4 Union Square.

SECOND LETTER FROM MESSRS. J. W. JOHNSON & CO., HARTFORD, CONN., THIS YEAR.

HARTFORD, March 22, 1860.

MESSRS. THOMAS ALLCOCK & CO.:

Gentlemen—Please send us by express one gross more of your Medicated Porous Plasters. They sell better than any other plasters. They are the no plus ultra in the shape of a plaster. They relieve all and cure many of serious spinal and other affections. Send immediately. Yours,

J. W. JOHNSON & CO.

This is the second gross Johnson & Co. have had this year. We have assurances from our agents everywhere that the Medicated Porous Plasters are doing much good, and will take the place of most other strengthening plasters.

NERVOUS AFFECTIONS CURED.—Julius Metz, Esq., of Brooklyn, the well-known Professor of Music, was long subject to an affection of the muscles of the chest, attended with much spasmodic asthma. His physical sufferings were great, and his professional duties much interfered with. The application of one Plaster cured him.

All Physicians who have ever seen these Plasters, recommend. Mr. Caldwell, Dr. Wallbridge, and Dr. Jacobvinet, report that probably these Plasters are specifics in all diseases of the skin surface. Their value is beyond dispute.

Hear what the Hon. Carl Schultze, of Chicago says:

"To the Editors of the New York Criminal Zeitung:

"Gentlemen: Please inform the public, that I have quite recovered from the severe pains in my chest, from which I have so long suffered. Allcock's Porous Plaster cured me, of which he spoke so highly. I had tried almost every thing to relieve the pain, without any benefit, before I used this Plaster, which I engage to say, in a few days after putting it on, perfectly relieved me. I have worn the plasters for the last nine months, changing once in a week, and without any return of the pain in my chest, or the least difficulty in taking any kind of food. This can be attested by all my friends and my family. Show Dieckman this letter, and please to publish it in your paper.

"Most respectfully, CARL SCHULTZE."

NOTE.—LETTER OF CRIMINAL ZEITUNG.—We insert this letter with pleasure, as it affords us an opportunity of saying that any one afflicted with pain in the chest, accompanied with indigestion, can, by applying at the office, receive ample testimony from one who has been restored to health by these very Plasters of Mr. Allcock, which he uses and sells for a similar affection.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are sold at No. 4 Union Square and 224 Canal Street, New York, at twenty-five cents each, and by the yard, price $3, by all dealers. By sending $1, four plasters will be sent to any part of the U. S. free of charge.

VOL. IV.—No. 178.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

HON. ABRAM LINCOLN, OF ILLINOIS.

REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR PRESIDENT.

We engrave herewith the portrait—from a photograph by Brady—of Hon. Abram Lincoln, of Illinois, the Republican candidate for President. The following sketch of his career is from the Herald:

Abram Lincoln, the Republican candidate for the Presidency in the campaign of 1860, is a native of Harden County, Kentucky. He was born February 12, 1809. His parents were born in Virginia, and were of very moderate circumstances. His paternal grandfather, Abram Lincoln, emigrated from Rockingham County, Virginia, to Kentucky about 1781–82, where, a year or two later, he was killed by Indians. His ancestors, who were respectable members of the Society of Friends, went to Virginia from Berks County, Pennsylvania. Descendants from the same lineage still reside in the eastern part of Pennsylvania.

Abram Lincoln, the subject of this memoir, further removed from Kentucky to Spencer County, in Indiana, in 1816.

Mr. Lincoln received a limited education. In 1830 he removed to Illinois, and passed the first year in Macon County, engaged in agricultural pursuits. He next went to New Salem, at that time in Sagamon County, now Chenard County, where he remained about one year as a clerk in a store. About this time the Florida or Black Hawk War broke out, and on the call from the Federal Government for volunteers, a company was raised in New Salem, and Lincoln was elected captain. He served during this memorable campaign. On his return to Illinois, in 1832, he became a candidate for the State Legislature, but was defeated. The next three succeeding biennial elections he was elected to the Legislature by the Whig party. During his legislative term he studied law, and subsequently engaged practically in the profession at Springfield; but his practice at the bar did not withdraw his attention from politics, and for many years he was one of the leaders of the Whig party in Illinois, and was on the electoral ticket in several presidential campaigns. He was a disciple of Henry Clay, and exerted himself in his behalf in 1844, by making a tour of Illinois and advocating Clay's election to the Presidency. He was elected to Congress in 1846, and served until 1849.

While in Congress the Wilmot Proviso warfare was in progress, and which disturbed the peace and harmony of the country until it shook the foundation of the Union from its centre to its circumference. He voted forty-two times for the Proviso. He was also active, in connection with Seward, Chase, Giddings, and other abolitionists, in the agitation of that subject. He also opposed the Mexican War, and declared it unconstitutional and wrong, and voted against the bill granting 160 acres of land to the volunteers.

In the National Convention of 1848, of which he was a member, he advocated the nomination of General Taylor, and sustained the nomination by every canvass of his own State. In 1852 he was efficient in his efforts for General Scott, and was considered by the Whigs of Illinois and the Northwest as one of their leaders. From 1849 to 1854 Mr. Lincoln was engaged in the practice of his profession.

In 1849 he was a candidate before the Illinois Legislature for United States Senator, prior to which he stumped the State for the Whigs. When the issue met, the Democracy was in the ascendant, General Shields, the Democratic candidate. In 1850 he was again the candidate of the Whigs for United States Senator before the Legislature chosen that year; but the Democracy being in the majority, Lincoln was again defeated and Judge Trumbull, the Democratic candidate, elected. In 1855 Mr. Lincoln's name headed the Frémont electoral ticket in Illinois. In 1858 it was the desire of the Illinois Republican State Committee to have Mr. Lincoln succeed Douglas in the United States Senate, and to effect this he stumped the State for the Republicans; and it was during this campaign that Mr. Lincoln made the best political speeches of his life, and from which the people of the Union will at once read his sentiments on the great questions of the day. He is a tariff man, in favor of a protective policy, opposed to the Dred Scott decision, urging as an especial reason for his position that it deprives the negro of the rights of that clause in the Constitution of the United States which guarantees to the citizens of each State all the rights, privileges, and immunities of the several States.

In the campaign in Illinois in 1858, when he stumped the State in opposition to Douglas, he showed himself an adept in political strategy, and suited his speeches to the locality in which he spoke. His partizans claim that he had the advantage of the Illinois Senator as well in eloquence as in tact, and commend very highly the manliness and courage which he displayed on several occasions when they met in debate.

HON. ABRAM LINCOLN, OF ILLINOIS, REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR PRESIDENT.

[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

In personal appearance Mr. Lincoln, or, as he is more familiarly termed among those who know him best, "Old Uncle Abe," is long, lean, and wiry. In motion he has a great deal of the elasticity and awkwardness which indicate the rough training of his early life, and his conversation savors strongly of Western idioms and pronunciation. His height is six feet three inches. His complexion is about that or an octoroon; his face, without being by any means beautiful, is genial looking, and good humor seems to lurk in every corner of its innumerable angles. He has dark hair tinged with gray, a good forehead, small eyes, a long penetrating nose, with nostrils such as Napoleon always liked to find in his best generals, because they indicated a long head and clear thoughts; and a mouth which, aside from being of magnificent proportions, is probably the most expressive feature of his face.

As a speaker he is ready, precise, and fluent. His manner before a popular assembly is as he pleases to make it, being either superlatively ludicrous or very impressive. He employs but little gesticulation, but when he desires to make a point produces a shrug of his shoulders, an elevation of his eyebrows, a depression of his mouth, and a general malformation of countenance so comically awkward that it never fails to "bring down the house." His enunciation is slow and emphatic, and his voice, though sharp and powerful, at times has a frequent tendency to dwindle into a shrill and unpleasant sound; but, as before stated, the peculiar characteristic of his delivery is the remarkable mobility of his features, the frequent contortions of which excite a merriment his words could not produce.

Mr. Lincoln is the author of the basis upon which Seward formed his "irrepressible conflict" platform, as will be seen from the subjoined extracts from his speeches. Lincoln's "irrepressible conflict" sentiments were uttered in a speech delivered at Springfield, Illinois, June 17, 1858, and Seward's speech on the same topic in October, 1858. Mr. Lincoln, in his speech at Springfield, Illinois, on the 17th of June, 1858, said:

In my opinion it will not cease [the slavery agitation.—Ed.] until a crisis shall have been reached and passed. "A house divided against itself can not stand." I believe this Government can not endure permanently, half slave and half free. I do not expect the Union to be dissolved—I do not expect the house to fall—but I do expect it will cease to be divided. It will become all one thing, or all the other. Either the opponents of slavery will arrest the further spread of it, and place it where the public mind shall rest in the belief that it is in the course of ultimate extinction; or its advocates will push it forward, till it shall become alike lawful in all the States—old as well as new—North as well as South.

In another speech at Chicago, on the 10th of July, 1858, he said:

I have always hated slavery, I think, as much as any Abolitionist. I have been an Old Line Whig. I have always hated it, and I always believed it in course of ultimate extinction. If I were in Congress, and a vote should come up on a question whether slavery should be prohibited in a new Territory, in spite of the Dred Scott decision I would vote that it should.

In another speech at Springfield, Illinois, July 17, 1858, he said:

I nevertheless did not mean to go on the banks of the Ohio and throw missiles into Kentucky, to disturb them in their domestic institutions.

In another speech at Galesburg, October 7, 1858, he said:

I believe that the right of property in a slave is not distinctly and expressly affirmed in the Constitution.

Mr. Lincoln was comparatively unknown to the people of this section of the Union until during the past winter, when he made a tour of the Middle and New England States, delivering political stump speeches.

The following is from the Tribune:

Abram Lincoln was born in Hardin County, Kentucky, February 12, 1809, and is now fifty-one years old. He is very probably of the race of the Massachusetts Lincolns, though his parents were off Quaker stock, that migrated from Pennsylvania to Virginia, where his grandfather removed in 1781–'82 to Kentucky, and was there surprised and killed by Indians while at work on his clearing. Like most pioneers, he left his family poor; and his son also died prematurely, leaving a widow and several children, including Abram, then six years old. The family removed soon after to Southern Indiana, where Abram grew to the stature of six feet and some inches, but enjoyed scarcely better opportunities for instruction than in Kentucky. Probably six months in all of the rudest sort of schooling comprehends the whole of his technical education. He was in turn a farm laborer, a common workman in a saw-mill, and a boatman on the Wabash and Mississippi rivers. Thus hard work and plenty of it, the rugged experiences of aspiring poverty, the wild sports and rude games of a newly and thinly peopled forest region—the education born of the log-cabin, the rifle, the axe, and the plow, combined with the reflections of an original and vigorous mind, a eager in the pursuit of knowledge by every available means, and developing a character of equal resource and firmness—made him the man he has since proved himself.

At twenty-one he pushed further west into Illinois, which has for the last thirty years been his home, living a year near and, for some years past, in Springfield, the State capital. He worked on a farm as hired man his first year in Illinois; the next year he was clerk in a store; then volunteered for the Black Hawk war, and was chosen a captain by his fellow-soldiers; the next year he was an unsuccessful candidate for the Legislature; he was chosen the next, and served four sessions with eminent usefulness and steadily increasing reputation; studied law, meantime, and took his place at the bar; was early recognized as a most effective and convincing speaker before the People of Whig principles and the Protective policy, and of their illustrious emblazoner, Henry Clay; was a Whig candidate for elector in nearly or quite every Presidential contest from 1836 to 1852, inclusive; was chosen to the XXXth Congress from the Central District of Illinois in 1846, and served to its close, but was not a candidate for re-election; and in 1849 measurably withdrew from politics and devoted himself to the practice of his profession until the Nebraska Iniquity of 1854 called him again into the political arena. He was the candidate of the Whigs for the United States Senate before the Legislature chosen that year; but they were not a majority of the body; so he declined, and urged his friends to support Judge Trumbull, the candidate of the anti-Nebraska Democrats, who was thus elected.

In the gallant and memorable Presidential contest of 1856 Mr. Lincoln's name headed the Fremont Electoral Ticket of Illinois. In 1858 he was unanimously designated by the Republican State Convention to succeed Mr. Douglas in the Senate, and thereupon canvassed the State against Mr. Douglas with an ability in which logic, art, eloquence, and thorough good-nature were alike conspicuous, and which gave him a national reputation. Mr. Douglas secured a predominance in the Legislature and was elected, though Mr. Lincoln had the largger popular vote, so that if the question had been decided by the majority of the people the champion of Squatter Sovereignty and of indifference as regards slavery extension would not now be a Senator from Illinois.

HON. HANNIBAL HAMLIN.

Hon. Hannibal Hamlin, who was nominated by the Republican Convention at Chicago for Vice-President, was born in Paris, Oxford County, Maine, in August, 1809, and is now in the fifty-first year of his age. He is by profession a lawyer, but for the last twenty-four years has been, for much of the time, in political life. From 1836 to 1840 he was a member of the Legislature of Maine, and for three of those years he was the Speaker of its House of Representatives. In 1843 he was elected a member of Congress, and was re-elected for the following term. In 1847 he was again a member of the State Legislature; and the next year was elected to fill a vacancy, occasioned by the death of John Fairfield, in the United States Senate. In 1851 he was re-elected for the full term in the same body, but resigned on being chosen Governor of Maine in 1857. In the same month he was again elected to the United States Senate for six years, which office he accepted, resigning the Governorship. He is still a member of the Senate. This record is an evidence of the confidence with which he has always been regarded by his fellow-citizens in Maine.

Up to the time of the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, in 1854, Mr. Hamlin was a member of the Democratic party. That act he regarded as a proof that the party, with which he had been all his life connected, no longer deserved the name of Democratic, and was treacherous to the principles he had always defended. Thenceforward he gave his support to the Republican party, of which he has ever since continued a faithful and distinguished leader.

THE "GOLDEN BEE."

PART I.

Ladies with precious merchandise, the growth of Chinese soil,
And costly work of Chinese hands, the patient wealth of toil,
Over the wave with outspread sails, like white-winged birds at rest, Swiftly, gayly, homeward bound, sped on the Golden Bee.

Stored with such peachy-textured silks as shimmer in the sun,
With crumbless rainbow-tinted gleams and never keep to one—
Silks as English queens might wear on her coronation day,
She had chests of fragrant tea-leaves to make social household hearts,
Or to be the one sweet luxury of widows' scanty hearts;
With grotesque and dainty ivories, carved by coarse-grained hands,
For idle money-spinders in rich European lands.

Cloudless the sky, fresh blew the breeze—the Captain's heart was light,
As on the deck he lingered late and watched the coming night;
Where waves adieu made the joy and beauty of his life.

Soon should he hiss his bonnie boy, and hold him on his knee,
Awhile he'd listen eager-eyed to stories of the sea;
Then should he take his darling wife from the Captain smiled,
Smiled fatherlike to think of her, his little unseen child.

A tear ran down his sunburnt cheek, a mild joy lit his sailor-eye,
As o'er it were thoughts of love and home—so near they seemed to lie;
Such thoughts as Parsee merchants, and for the fair young wife,
Whose sweet affection made the joy and beauty of his life.

Soon should he kiss his bonnie boy, and hold him on his knee,
Awhile he'd listen eager-eyed to stories of the sea;
Then should he take his darling wife from the Captain smiled,
Smiled fatherlike to think of her, his little unseen child.

THE MARCH OF FASHION.

WELL, Fashion progresses—like the crab or the tortoise; and now we have bonnets (shall we say hats, as they call them in Minnesota?) planned after the models which prevailed in the days of Madame Recamier and graced the court of Napoleon the First. Every bonnet is its own umbrella; and there is room enough between the head-covering and the head for a good sized sign-board stating whether the wearer is wife, widow, or maid, and if either of the two latter, how much money she can call her own. We recommend the suggestion to bonnet-makers. On a pale satin ground, in commercial characters, the inscription would look remarkably neat.

In Paris they are, as usual, ahead of us. There, bonnets have been discarded, and robes a queue formally adopted. The merit of this last innovation consists in the unparalleled destruction of material it involves. A lady writes: "Four morning walks render a robe a queue a perfect chiffon, only fit to be given to one's lady's maid." Stones and pavements have no respect for silks or satins. If the new fashion prevails, we shall have to adopt pages as well; and Mrs. Soiechangeante of Fifth Avenue must have her little Buttons to follow her, train in hand, at every step. This will be all very well in Paris, where none but the rich are fashionable; but here, where every white woman dresses in the height of fashion, what a demand there will be for pages! The market for boys has already an upward tendency.

On the hoop question we have placed our opinions on record. Fashion must prevail, however; and the old style of clinging skirts impends in the future. One thing is not clear. In the days of Napoleon the First ladies were restricted by fashion to a very scant allowance of stuffs. They were, according to Madame D'Abrantes, a fair average; three inches more or less made a material difference in the amount of cash they had to spend. What will the dry-goods dealers do if this new fashion be consistent as far as this?

The French artists depict the goddess whom they call La Mode revolving in a never-ending, never-changing circle. And so it seems. Our ladies have already got back to the Empire style of bonnets, and are on the verge of adopting the Empire skirts. They will naturally be followed by the men. Top-boots, tight knee-breckes, and monstrous hats, with blue brass-buttoned coats, await us in the future. Let us bow to the decree. Provided we don't come to ingwilleties, curled-up toes, and the primitive costumes of the decades of Reason, we ought to submit with resignation.

THE LOUNGER.

THE NEW ALADDIN.

"MY DEAR LOUNGER, . . . once heard a story of Aladdin which was more Yankee than Arabian. Do you know what I mean, and, if so, would you kindly tell the story?
HARRIET."

The Lounger believes that this is the story.

Aladdin began by swapping jack-knives and getting the best, and bartering halves of melons and stuck together the whole ones. When he grew older, and sold berries which he picked on the hillpastures, he invented the bottom of the quart, so that a little capital was carried forward to the next measure. He hayed hard all summer—and went to evening school all winter, and learned the golden rule of arithmetic—addition for himself, and subtraction for his neighbor; and, in all the games, he was partial to the rule of 3 turned over. "You tickle me, and I'll tickle you, if I can; but at all events you tickle me."

At an early age Aladdin was considered to be good at a bargain; which meant, that he could always succeed in exchanging the worse for the better—always having the blind eye of a horse to the wall when he wanted to sell him, and always looking straight at it when he wanted to buy him; and the approving nod shook the head, and said, "Let Aladdin alone to succeed."

He grew up and left the village for the world. "He'll be rich!" said the village, with more enthusiasm and envy than any village ever does to a prospering boy. "He'll be honest, faithful, generous!" To Aladdin the whole world was but a market in which to buy cheap and sell dear. For him there was no such thing as poverty, or piety, or honor. To him all lands and waters are alike, for each is unhallowed by association. No Homer sings for him along the Hellespont—only curses the wind that will not blow him to Odessa. No sirens call to him from the sunny shore; he loves the sharp oath of a brutal boatswain.

With a Bible in his hand and a quid in his mouth he squints about the holy places in Jerusalem, and calculates the cost of the sepulchre. He scratches his name with a jack-knife upon Egyptian obelisks by the side of the hieroglyphic names of Rameses and Thothmes—assures that school early history with their grandeur; and the reverend echoes of the Libyan desert, that have sat there since they heard the shout of Alexander's army marching to find the oracle of Ammon, are awakened by the shrill whistling of Yankee Doodle and Dan Tucker.

He insults the Grand Lama—he hobnobs with the Great Mogul—he turns his back upon Emperors—he pinch out of the Pope's snuff-box. from the living animal with cheers long with the Turks, and rides Turks, and rides

He turned his goods and his opportunities over and over again, and they are all changed into piles of money. The wise village welcomes him, and proudly points him out to the Aladdins of a younger generation as the shining example of the successful man—"For, my dear son, just think of it! He began with nothing, and now look!"

My dear son does look, and he sees Aladdin owning millions of dollars, and of all the Doing-good societies of which he is not president he is director. His name is as good as gold. He has bought pictures and books and statues. He has also bought a Mrs. Aladdin. He is housed in luxury, but he pricks his mouth with the silver fork. He has a home for a poet, but he boasts that he never reads any thing but the newspapers. He goes to church twice on Sunday, and only wakes up when the preacher reviles and denounces the sinners of Sodom—the touch of Jesus of Nazareth. His head is bald and shiny with all the sermons that have hit it and glanced off. He clasps his hands in prayer, just as he does when the contribution box is passed round; and he goes home, like a thrifty successful man, thanking God that he is not as other men are—that he pays his debts, and forgets before the fire in the easy-chair, and tells the children to remember that honesty is the best policy, and looks sleepily at Mrs. Aladdin through the thick smoke.

By-and-by old Aladdin dies. The conventional services are held over the body, the hearses and mourning carriages are called out by the undertakers. The papers regret that they are summoned to depart from this life a man so universally esteemed, a public-spirited citizen, and pious man. Then the precocious swapper of jack-knives and model for the rising generation is gone. We are told by the stars that he never saw now born over him with a soft lustre that he knew not how to turn into money; and the south wind, for whose breath upon his hot brow he was never grateful, now strews his last bed with unconscious violets, which his head crushed in living. And the men who are to be formed upon that model and pursue a similar success, careless of all but their bodies, "Sic sed old Aladdin is gone at last; will he eat up with?" The sculptor carves a church upon his tombstone and grave, and calls it "Faith;" and we shall know them," while some quiet Charles Lamb, with insanity in the family, asks, as he puts aside the last good cut, and reads Aladdin's epitaph, "Where be all the bad people buried?"

GODWIN'S FRANCE.

A FEW weeks since the Lounger spoke of the first volume of Parke Godwin's History of France, as nearly ready. It has since been published; and no reader will deny that the expectation of his friends and the public has been amply fulfilled. It is a work which at once takes rank with our best histories and secures the literary position of its author; and it is such historical commendation, under circumstances which can not be known by the world of readers, is a triumph of the private energy and ambition which furnish the best credentials for the character of the work. The composition of great historical works is the peculiar province of leisure which our own historians and the more famous ones abroad have commanded. But to the hand accustomed to the pen, the preparatory proportions with detailed fidelity, picture-queness, and vigor, is the proof of qualities in the historian that are very sure to command success as well as to deserve it.

The first volume of this history includes, of course, the introductory portion of the whole. As treated by Mr. Godwin, it comprises a clear and succinct account of the geography of Gaul and of the earliest inhabitants of France, followed by a Roman conquest under Julius Cæsar, who is sketched with masterly power, and moves through the pages with living reality. The Roman dominion and introduction of the great General is fully justified by his story of his career. The subsequent state of the country, its subject to the Roman yoke and decline, leads to a condensed, graphic, and comprehensive picture of Rome under the emperors, and a delightful and valuable account of the introduction of Christianity as a historical power; with brief, but pregnant and satisfactory glimpses of its preachers, its converts, and its martyrs. The following volume, we reach the reign of Constantine, whose relations to the new religion are made very clear, and the rise of Clovis with the invasion of the eastern and western empire, the Gallic revolts, and the German invasions, pass in rapid succession before the reader's mind. The rise of the temporal power of the Papacy—a question at the present moment of universal interest—is fully and impartially treated and explained; while Charles Martel emerges, kingly and victorious, from the cloud of Gallic confusion, and stands in the very front of the scene. The Saracens, founds an imperial dynasty, dies in the plenitude of power; and, after some delay, that magnificent figure, which has so long filled men's story, Charlemagne—or, as Godwin, following the later scholars, chooses to call him, Karl the Great—stalks into the scene. At his coming the entire continuous light of history breaks in; and the volume closes with the dissolution of the enormous empire of the Franks, which Karl had governed for fortyseven years. "No one can tell," says a monk, "the mourning and lamentation that there was throughout every where, so that even the Pagans wept him as the Father of the World." Well might the people have so mourned for a ruler who could and did it then knew was gone from it forever." (P. 475.)

It is impossible not to acknowledge the very great skill with which Mr. Godwin has managed his material; the full advantage he has taken of every proper point for picturesque description; and the general symmetry, vigor, and interest of his work. A peculiar raciness of style, which is very different from the ordinary level of historical composition, is a perpetual charm in his pages; while the fullness and precision of the notes attest the patient and conscientious care with which he has wrought out each detail. He has the satisfaction of knowing that the least interesting part of his task is accomplished—that with every succeeding epoch of his narration public attention will be more and more excited. He has the deeper satisfaction of knowing that, in contributing a classic work to the literature of his time and country, he has given that country another light upon the "dim and perilous way" which all nations travel, and has built a lasting monument for his own name.

G. P. R. JAMES.

WE have all had our little joke at James and his tireless horsemen; but we have also all read many pleasant stories with interest and not to be pained to hear of his illness. A letter from Vienna states that about a month since Mr. James had an attack of fever at Venice, where he is Consul-General.

Such an event may be regarded as the public termination of a literary career which is probably unparalleled in fertility. James's original works amount to nearly eighty, in more than one hundred and ninety volumes; while his miscellaneous stories and papers might easily fill eight or ten volumes more. He is now an old man, having been born in 1801. It is an interesting fact that Washington Irving was the indirect means of the introduction of James to the world, which have so pleased the public—"it is stated, in the most recent biographical sketch of James (American Cyclopædia, Vol. xi. p. 1), that a publisher, urged by Irving to attempt some important work, and he wrote the Life of Edward the Black Prince. Irving read it, and said, 'Here is a place, and his "Richelieu" is more than a quarter of a century old.

His resolute industry as an author has succeeded in giving him a position and prominence which genius has often failed to give. He is the father of his household of over the million, without any of the peculiar humor, vivacity, and sincere antiquarian passion which constitute the excellence of Scott's literature. He is the very speller who has amused so large an audience for so long a time has my room at the top of the house, and my seven year men arise around him and pass on before him, but he has cheerfully held his own ever, without losing the love of his readers or his companions. If his hand rests now from its labors, there will be many a heart unknown to him sorry to learn it, and many a hearty hope that the stroke, which probably terminates his literary activity, may still leave him cheerfulness and contentment, and quiet years in the circle of his friends and family.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

ENCOMMISCIATION UNDER DIFFICULTIES.—The following notice has been extensively posted in Paris "Bell-obtained by Auction."

LATE FROM THE SCHOOL-ROOM.

MISTRESS.—"I'm reading such a pretty tale."
GOVERNESS.—"You must say narrative, Minnie—not tale."
MINNIE.—"Yes, ma'am; and do just look at Mud! how he's wagging his narrative!"

In a country town in Massachusetts, many years ago, lived a man known as Uncle Zeke Cushing. He had a peculiar habit of saying the most unpleasant, for the simple reason that Tower had killed his favorite ox. Tower died; but when he was buried, Uncle Zeke, as he looked upon the corpse, and turned away, grittin his teeth, exclaimed, "Darn the devil now!"

A few weeks ago, as the passengers on board the steamer Perry, during her passage from Newport to Providence were quietly smoking their cigars above in her forward cabin, one among them, a lover of "Ducken," proposed to his fellow-smokers that they should go down and get a game. The number required, lacking one, was obtained, and now the game began. Two or three "Ducks" had succeeded to the the arrival of the next comer before proceeding with the game. Soon a fourth appeared, and the game began. The pursuer through the cabin-door and took a seat, pulled out a pack of cards, and commenced taking notice of any one, became interested in the sheet before him. The persevering stranger cautiously approached the unsuspecting, and tapping him on the shoulder, politely invites him to take a hand. "I am a perfect stranger and quiet reply, "but I am an Episcopal clergyman, and think my flock would make severe remarks should I play cards." Well, I'll tell you what. Make a big horn, and paint yourself crawling out of the little end of it."

T CHARADE.

My first, Prometheus-like, from heaven,
Has drawn inspiring fire;
But not, Prometheus-like, condemned
To feel the vultures dire;
His effort raised the sinner's soul,
Or kindled soft desire;
His calmed the passions, or the heating heart,
Or raised its pulses higher.

My second is in season with
The yellow harvest moon,
And blooms in brilliant azure hues
When autumn winds assume grieves
When heavy frost is seen at morn,
And autumn leaves decay,
Chains kindred with the evening star,
And kindred with the day.

My whole—oh mention not my whole!
Despised, for that cause!
A feeble, puny, useless thing,
Not worthy e'en to pay for fuel.

The following epitaph was left by Dr. Dodge, of Maine, with directions that it should be inscribed on his tombstone. His relatives did not get it there, although they felt with him that it was singularly appropriate:

"Here lies Old Dodge, who dodged all good,
But never dodged the evil;
He dodged his last, but all he could,
He couldn't dodge the devil."

In an altered form it has found its way into print before as a fancy epitaph. But the truth of the case is as I have stated.

THE NEW ROGUE'S MARCH.
Air.—"See the Conquering Hero Comes."

Ope thy gate, O Newgate, let a new Rogue in,
He was never worst thought-gate—ever fit for;
Big as Bow's or west thought-gate—ever fit for;
Here, in pomp and splendor, comes the Bounded more.

Robbing his employers, is this Rascal's crime—
Fiascos case for lawyers, villainy sublime;
Theft, imagination, whose amount astounds.
Nene, by computation, three hundred thousand pounds!

After gain he hasted, lured by gain alone,
He was greedy—bolted—let the Bank be known;
How those sum were doing poses all belief,
Confidence inspires a rogue to be a thief.

Hide, you knaves inferior, your diminished heads,
Bow to your superior—skies the ground he treads.
Never before him, never hence, shall rival cites!
Grovel and adore him, prigs of smaller size.

Blush for your offenses, burglars at the crank,
Thinking your immense plunder a thing for a Bank;
Shamed by his large plunder, coiners of the Road,
Trip the counterfeit under guilt of lighter load.

Felons, hail your greater; trumpets sound, and drums
Beat before the traitor; in he comes, he comes!
Giveaway—make room for him, Empire! Noble sire,
Take ye then, oh, take him, tarnkeys, to your care.

In one of the prettiest and most enlightened towns of the Prairie State the children were assembled one Sabbath afternoon in the basement meeting-room for a Union Sunday-school Concert. A newly arrived clergyman being present, was courteously invited to address them. He explained the parable of the Prodigal Son. Stirring fancy's pencil he gave the picture a graphic power to all the odd gentleman's circumstances immediately previous to his arrival at home. "I pass by," he said, "the many brothers, a pleasant cottage, before which is spread a grassy lawn. At the end of the lawn is a road beneath the western horizon. There, in his easy-chair, before the door, sat the old father reading the paper!" Any well informed mommerary expected the additional announcement that the old man had received a telegraphic dispatch that his son would be in by the next train.

"NEWMAN'S whisky" enjoys a reputation in these parts which entitles it to be celebrated "throughout County" of our neighboring State, and all of our drinking saloons are among the "regulars" on the morning list. A few days since a dissipated specimen of gentility stepped into Newman's establishment and called for a glass of the "old Dendrick," and called for "whisky straight," which it was handed him. Having tossed off the contents of the glass, he turned to the bar-keeper and inquired, "Is this Newman's whisky?" "Newman's," was the reply. "Well, tell Mr. Newman I still say him for the first time I see him"—with that he quietly walked out, with a satisfied expression of face, leaving the quick-witted bar-keeper one "sprinkle" wiser.

In one of the prettiest and most enlightened towns of the Prairie State the children were assembled one Sabbath afternoon in the basement meeting-room for a Union Sunday-school Concert. A newly arrived clergyman being present, was courteously invited to address them. He explained the parable of the Prodigal Son. Stirring fancy's pencil he gave the picture a graphic power to all the odd gentleman's circumstances immediately previous to his arrival at home. "I pass by," he said, "the many brothers, a pleasant cottage, before which is spread a grassy lawn. At the end of the lawn is a road beneath the western horizon. There, in his easy-chair, before the door, sat the old father reading the paper!" Any well informed mommerary expected the additional announcement that the old man had received a telegraphic dispatch that his son would be in by the next train.

"NEWMAN'S whisky" enjoys a reputation in these parts which entitles it to be celebrated "throughout County" of our neighboring State, and all of our drinking saloons are among the "regulars" on the morning list. A few days since a dissipated specimen of gentility stepped into Newman's establishment and called for a glass of the "old Dendrick," and called for "whisky straight," which it was handed him. Having tossed off the contents of the glass, he turned to the bar-keeper and inquired, "Is this Newman's whisky?" "Newman's," was the reply. "Well, tell Mr. Newman I still say him for the first time I see him"—with that he quietly walked out, with a satisfied expression of face, leaving the quick-witted bar-keeper one "sprinkle" wiser.

CHIME OF THIRTEEN BELLS FOR CHRIST CHURCH, CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS, MANUFACTURED BY MESSRS. HENRY N. HOOPER & CO., OF BOSTON

CHIME OF CHURCH-BELLS.

WE publish above a faithful picture of a chime of bells from a photograph by Black & Batchelder, of Boston, Massachusetts. This chime of bells was cast by Messrs. Henry N. Hooper & Co., at their foundry in Boston, for Christ Church in Cambridge, Massachusetts. As the drawing indicates, the chime is composed of thirteen bells. In consequence of the size of the belfry, the space occupied does not admit of the bells being shown to advantage. The photograph was taken in the foundry yard, and the group of men are the operatives in the establishment.

DESCRIPTION OF THE BELLS.

1st, on the key of D	weighs	2168 pounds.
2d, on the key of E	weighs	1687 pounds.
3d, on the key of F sharp	weighs	1275 pounds.
4th, on the key of G	weighs	1201 pounds.
5th, on the key of A	weighs	999 pounds.
6th, on the key of B	weighs	695 pounds.
7th, on the key of C	weighs	614 pounds.
8th, on the key of C sharp	weighs	547 pounds.
9th, on the key of D	weighs	477 pounds.
10th, on the key of D sharp	weighs	387 pounds.
11th, on the key of E	weighs	287 pounds.
12th, on the key of F sharp	weighs	235 pounds.
13th, on the key of G	weighs	200 pounds.

The bells have been accurately tuned under the direction of Mr. Henry P. Munroe, of Cambridge, a gentleman who has devoted much time to the study of acoustics, and whose discrimination in musical tone is very acute. Eight of these bells, running in the scale from D to D, are hung for round ringing; the five upper ones are fitted for chiming only; and when properly handled, either in round ringing or chiming, will produce a beautiful effect.

HANGING THE BELLS.

The mode adopted for hanging is different from that of any other chime of bells—it being similar to that adopted by Hooper & Co. in 1837 for single bells, which has been thoroughly proved to be every thing to be desired, and for economy, simplicity, and durability it is believed to surpass all other styles of hanging used in Europe or this country.

COMPOSITION OF METALS.

Messrs. Hooper & Co. have been eminently successful in the combinations of the metals used in their bells, insuring that homogeneous character so essential for producing evenness of tone, freedom of vibration, and strength of cohesion. This last-named quality is fully demonstrated by the fact that the breakage of church-bells cast by them for the last thirty years has been but four one hundredths of one per cent—a degree of durability hardly supposable considering the severe ordeal to which bells are subjected. The funds for purchasing the Cambridge chime have been raised chiefly by Henry M. Parker, Esq., who has devoted much time to this matter.

The following inscriptions were furnished by Mr. Parker, and are cast upon the bells:

Campanology, or bell-ringing as an art, has received great attention in England, many treatises having been published explanatory of the peals rung, and many persons have become eminent as "discoursers of this majestic music." The ringing of bells commends itself to the athlete as a pleasant exercise; for while it produces pleasurable sounds it develops and strengthens the muscles, and, owing to the erect position maintained by those who are skilled in round ringing, it tends to impart grace and dignity to the figure more than any other exercise. We trust that this is but the commencement of the establishment of correct musical chimes in the country; for we can conceive of no better mode to usher in the Sabbath morn than the pealing of sweet-toned church-bells.

PART II.

HARTRIGHT'S NARRATIVE.

I.

I OPEN a new page. I advance my narrative by one week.

The history of the interval which I thus pass over must remain unrecorded. My heart turns faint, my mind sinks in darkness and confusion when I think of it. This must not be, if I who write am to guide, as I ought, you who read. This must not be, if the clew that leads through the windings of the Story is to remain, from end to end, untangled in my hands.

A life suddenly changed—its whole purpose created afresh; its hopes and fears, its struggles, its interests, and its sacrifices, all turned at once and forever into a new direction—this is the prospect which now opens before me, like the burst of view from a mountain's top. I left my narrative in the quiet shadow of Limmeridge church: I resume it, one week later, in the stir and turmoil of a London street.

The street is in a populous and a poor neighborhood. The ground-floor of one of the houses in it is occupied by a small newsvendor's shop; and the first floor and the second are let as furnished lodgings of the humblest kind.

I have taken those two floors in an assumed name. On the upper floor I live, with a room to work in, a room to sleep in. On the lower floor, under the same assumed name, two women live, who are described as my sisters. I get my bread by drawing and engraving on wood for the cheap periodicals. My sisters are supposed to help me by taking in a little needle-work. Our poor place of abode, our humble calling, our assumed relationship, and our assumed name, are all used alike as a means of hiding us in the house-forest of London. We are numbered no longer with the people whose lives are open and known. I am an obscure, unnoticed man, without patron or friend to help me. Marian Halcombe is nothing but my eldest sister, who provides for our household wants by the toil of her own hands. We two are at once the dupes and the agents of a daring imposture. We are the accomplices of mad Anne Catherick, who claims the name, the place, and the living personality of dead Laura Glyde.

That is our situation. That is the changed aspect in which we three must appear, hereforth, in this narrative, for many and many a page to come.

In the eye of reason and of law, in the estimation of relatives and friends, according to every received formality of civilized society, Laura, Lady Glyde, "lay buried in her mother in Limmeridge church-yard. Torn in her own lifetime from the list of the living, the daughter of Philip Fairlie and the wife of Percival Glyde might still exist for her sister, might still exist for me, but to all the world besides she was dead. Dead by the law, who had renounced her; dead to the servants of the house, who had failed to recognise her; dead to the persons in authority, who had committed her fortune to her husband and her aunt; dead to my mother and my sister, who believed me to be the dupe of an adventuress who had forged a fraud; socially, morally, legally—dead.

And yet alive! Alive in poverty and in hiding. Alive, with the poor drawing-master to fight her battle, and to win the way back for her to her place in the world of living beings.

Did no suspicion, existing by my own knowledge of Anne Catherick's resemblance to her, cross my mind when I read that month's news to me? No. The shadow of a suspicion, from the moment when she lifted her veil by the side of the inn-yard, was present to me always.

Before the sun of that day had set, before the last glimpse of the home which was closed against her had passed from my eyes, the farewell words I spoke when we parted at Limmeridge House had been recalled by both of us, repeated by me, recognised by her. "If ever the time comes when the devotion of my whole heart and soul and strength will give you a moment's happiness, or even a moment's sorrow, will you try to remember the poor drawing-master who has taught you?" She, who never remembered so little, remembered now, and the terror of a later time, remembered those words, and laid her poor head innocently and tearingly on the bosom of the man who had spoken them. In that moment, when she called me by my name, when she said, "They have tried to make me forget every thing, Walter, but I remember Marian, and I remember you"—in that moment I, who had long since given her my love, gave her my life, and thanked God that it was mine to bestow on her. Yes, the time had come. From thousands on thousands of miles away—through forest and wilderness, where companion or stranger than I had fallen by my side; through perils of death thrice renewed and thrice escaped, the Hand that leads men on the dark road to the future had led me to meet that time. Forlorn and disowned, sorely tried and sadly changed; her beauty faded, her mind clouded; robbed of her station in the world, of her place among living creatures, the devotion of my whole heart and soul and strength might be laid blamelessly now at those dear feet. In the right of her calamity, in the right of her friendlessness, she was mine at last! Mine to support, to protect, to cherish, to restore. Mine to love and honor as father and brother both. Mine to vindicate through all risks and all sacrifices—through the hopeless struggle against Rank and Power—through the long fight with armed Deceit and fortified Success—through the waste of my reputation—through the loss of my friends—through the hazard of my life.

II.

My position is defined; my motives are acknowledged. The story of Marian and the story of Laura must come next.

I shall relate both narratives, not in the words (often imperfectly and inevitably confused) of the speakers themselves, but in the words of the brief, plain, studiously simple abstract which I committed to writing for my own guidance, and for the guidance of my legal adviser. So the tangled web will be most speedily and most intelligibly unfolded.

The story of Marian begins where the narrative of the housekeeper at Blackwater Park left off.

On Lady Glyde's departure from her husband's house, the fact of that departure, and the necessary statement of the circumstances under which it had taken place, were communicated to Miss Halcombe by the housekeeper. It was not till some days afterward (how many days exactly Mrs. Michelson, in the absence of any written memorandum on the subject, could not undertake to say) that a letter arrived from Madame Fosco announcing Lady Glyde's sudden death in Count Fosco's house. The letter avoided mentioning dates, and left it to Mrs. Michelson's discretion to break the news at once to Miss Halcombe, or to defer doing so until that lady's health should be more firmly established.

Having consulted Mr. Dawson (who had been himself delayed, by ill health, in resuming his attendance at Blackwater Park), Mrs. Michelson, by the Doctor's advice and in the Doctor's presence, communicated the news, either on the day when the letter was received or on the day after. It is not necessary to dwell here upon the effect which the intelligence of Lady Glyde's sudden death produced on her sister. It is only useful to the present purpose to say that she was not able to travel for more than three weeks afterward, on the journey of that time she proceeded to London, accompanied by the housekeeper. They parted there; Mrs. Michelson previously informing Miss Halcombe of her address, in case they might wish to communicate at a future period.

On parting with the housekeeper Miss Halcombe went at once to the office of Messrs. Gilmore and Kyle to ascertain the latter gentleman in Mr. Gilmore's absence. She mentioned to Mr. Kyle what she had thought it desirable to conceal through the latter gentleman (Mrs. Michelson included)—her suspicion of the circumstances under which Lady Glyde was said to have met her death. Mr. Kyle, who had previously given friendly proof of his anxiety to serve Miss Halcombe, at once undertook to make such inquiries as the private and dangerous nature of the investigation proposed to him would permit.

To facilitate this part of the subject before going farther, it may be here mentioned that Count Fosco offered ever facility to Mr. Kyle on that gentleman's stating that he was sent by Miss Halcombe to collect such particulars as had not yet reached her of Lady Glyde's decease. The Count, being in communication with the medical man, Mr. Goodricke, and with the two servants. In the absence of any means of ascertaining the exact date of Lady Glyde's departure from Blackwater Park, the result of the Doctor's and the servants' evidence, and of the volunteered statements of Count Fosco and his wife, was conclusive to the mind of Mr. Kyle. He could easily assume that the intensity of Miss Halcombe's suffering under the loss of her sister had misled her judgment in a most deplorable manner, and he wrote her word that the shocking suspicion to which she had alluded in his presence, was, in its opinion, destitute of the smallest fragment of foundation in truth. Thus the investigation by Mr. Gilmore's partner began and ended.

Meanwhile, Miss Halcombe had returned to Limmeridge House, and had there collected all the additional information which she was able to obtain.

Mr. Fairlie had received his first intimation of his niece's death from his sister, Madame Fosco; this letter was not containing any exact reference to dates. He had sanctioned his sister's proposal that the deceased lady should be laid in her mother's grave in Limmeridge church-yard. Count Fosco had accompanied the remains to Cumberland, and had attended the funeral at Limmeridge, which took place on the 2d of August. It was followed, as a mark of respect, by all the inhabitants of the village and the neighborhood. On the next day the inscription (originally drawn out, it was said, by the aunt of the deceased lady, and submitted for approval to her brother, Mr. Fairlie) was engraved on one side of the monument over the tomb.

On the day of the funeral, and for one day after it, Count Fosco had been received as a guest at Limmeridge House; but no interview had taken place between Mr. Fairlie and himself by the former gentleman's desire. They had communicated by writing; and through this medium Count Fosco had made Mr. Fairlie acquainted with the details of his niece's last illness and death. The letter presenting this information added no new facts to the facts already known; but one very remarkable paragraph was contained in the postscript. It referred to the woman Anne Catherick.

The substance of the paragraph in question was as follows:

It first informed Mr. Fairlie that Anne Catherick (of whom he might hear full particulars from Miss Halcombe when she reached Limmeridge) had been traced and recovered in the neighborhood of Blackwater Park, and had been, for the second time, placed under the charge of the medical man from whose custody she had once escaped.

This was the first part of the postscript. The second part warned Mr. Fairlie that Anne Catherick's mental malady had been aggravated by her long freedom from control, and that the inhuman hatred and distrust of Sir Percival Glyde, which had been one of her most marked delusions in former times, still existed, under a newly-acquired form. The unfortunate woman's one idea in connection with Sir Percival was the idea of annoying and distressing him, and of elevating herself, as she supposed, in the estimation of the patients and nurses, by assuming the character of his deceased wife; the scheme of this personation having evidently occurred to her after a sudden interview which she had succeeded in obtaining with Lady Glyde, and at which she had observed the extraordinary resemblance which existed between the deceased lady and herself. It was to the last degree improbable that she would succeed a second time in escaping from the Asylum; but it was just possible she might find some means of annoying the late Lady Glyde's relatives with letters; and, in that case, Mr. Fairlie was warned beforehand how to receive them.

The postscript, expressed in these terms, was shown to Miss Halcombe when she arrived at Limmeridge. There were also placed in her possession the clothes Lady Glyde had worn, and the other effects she had brought with her to her aunt's house. They had been carefully collected and sent to Cumberland by Madame Fosco.

Such was the posture of affairs when Miss Halcombe reached Limmeridge in the early part of September. Shortly afterward she was confined to her room by a relapse, her weakened physical energies giving way under the severe mental affliction from which she was now suffering. On getting stronger again, in a month's time, her examination of the circumstances described as attending her sister's death still remained unshaken. She had heard nothing in the interim of Sir Percival Glyde. Letters had reached her from Madame Fosco, making the most affectionate inquiries on the part of her husband and herself. Instead of answering these letters, Miss Halcombe caused the house in St. John's Wood, and the proceedings of its inmates, to be privately watched. Nothing doubtful was discovered. The same result attended the next investigations, which were accordingly instituted on the subject of Mrs. Rubelle. She had arrived in London, about six months before, with her husband. They had come from Leyons, and they had taken a house in the neighborhood of Leicester Square, to be fitted up as a boarding-house for foreigners, who were expected to visit England in large numbers to see the Exhibition of 1851. Nothing was known against husband or wife in the neighborhood. They were quiet people, and they had paid their way honestly up to the present time. The final enquiries related to Sir Percival Glyde. He was settled in Paris, and living there quietly in a small circle of English and French friends.

Foiled at all points, but still not able to rest, Miss Halcombe next determined to visit the Asylum in which Anne Catherick was for the second time confined. She had felt a strong curiosity about the woman in former days, and she was now doubly interested—first, in ascertaining whether the report of Anne Catherick's attempted personation of Lady Glyde was true; and, secondly (if it proved to be true), in discovering for herself what the poor creature's real motives were for attempting the deceit.

Although Count Fosco's letter to Mr. Fairlie did not mention the address of the Asylum, the important omission cast no difficulties in Miss Halcombe's way. When Mr. Hartright had met Anne Catherick at Limmeridge, she had informed him of the locality in which the house was situated, and Miss Halcombe had noted down the direction in her diary, with all the other particulars of the interview, exactly as she heard them from Mr. Hartright's own lips. Accordingly she found no lack of the entry, and extracted the address; furnished herself with the Count's letter to Mr. Fairlie, as a species of credential which might be useful to her; and started by herself for the Asylum on the eleventh of October.

She passed the night of the eleventh in London. It had been her intention to sleep at the house inhabited by Lady Glyde's old governess, but Mrs. Vesey's situation at the sight of her lost pupil's nearest and dearest friend was so distressing that Miss Halcombe considerately refrained from remaining in her presence, and removed to a respectable boarding-house in the neighborhood, recommended by Mrs. Vesey's married sister. The next day she proceeded to the Asylum, which was situated not far from London, on the northern side of the metropolis.

She was immediately admitted to see the proprietor. At first he appeared to be decidedly unwilling to allow communication with his patient. But on her showing him the postscript to Count Fosco's letter—on her reminding him that she was the "Miss Halcombe" there referred to—that she was a near relative of the deceased Lady Glyde; and that she was therefore naturally interested, for many reasons, in observing for herself the extent of Anne Catherick's delusion in relation to her late sister—the tone and manner of the owner of the Asylum altered, and he withdrew his objections. He probably felt that a continued refusal, under those circumstances, would not only be an act of discourtesy in itself, but would also imply that the proceedings in his establishment were of a nature to bear investigation by respectable strangers.

Miss Halcombe's own impression was that the owner of the Asylum had not been received into the confidence of Sir Percival and the Count. His consenting at all to let her visit his patient seemed to afford good proof of this. And his readiness in making admissions which could scarcely have escaped the lips of an accomplice, certainly appeared to favor such a conclusion.

For example, in the course of the introductory conversation which took place, he informed Miss Halcombe that Anne Catherick had been brought back to him by Count Fosco on the thirtieth of July; the Count producing a letter of explanations and authorities, signed by Sir Percival Glyde. On receiving his inmate again, he (the proprietor of the Asylum) acknowledged that he had observed various personal changes in her. Such changes, no doubt, were not without precedent in his experience of persons of unsettled affected. They were most often at one time, outwardly as well as inwardly, unlike what they were at another. The change from better to worse, or from worse to better, in the madness, having a necessary tendency to produce alterations of appearance externally. He observed in these; and he allowed also for the modification in the form of Anne Catherick's delusion, which was reflected, as usual, in her manner and expression. But he was still perplexed, at times, by certain differences between his patient before she had escaped and his patient since she had been brought back. Those differences were too minute to be described. He could not say, of course, that she was absolutely changed in height or shape or complexion, or in the color of her hair and eyes, or in the general form of her face: the change was something that he felt more than something that he saw. In short, the case had been a puzzle from the first, and one more puzzle was added to it now.

It can not be said that this conversation led to the result of materially preparing Miss Halcombe's mind for what was to come. But it produced, nevertheless, a certain effect upon her. She was thus completely unnerved by it, that some little time elapsed before she could summon composure enough to follow the proprietor of the Asylum to that part of the house in which the inmates were confined.

On inquiry, it turned out that Anne Catherick was then taking exercise in the grounds attached to the establishment. One of the nurses volunteered to conduct Miss Halcombe to the place; the proprietor of the Asylum remaining in the house for a few minutes to attend to a case which required his services, and then engaging to join his visitor in the grounds.

The nurse led Miss Halcombe to a distant part of the property which was partially laid out and after looking about her a little turned into a turf walk shaded by a shrubbery on either side. At the half-way down this walk two women were slowly approaching. The nurse pointed to them, and said, "There is Anne Catherick now, with the only patient who waits on her. The attendants will answer any questions you wish to put." With those words the nurse left her to return to the duties of the house.

Miss Halcombe advanced on her side and the women advanced on theirs. When they were within a dozen paces of each other, one of the women stopped for an instant, looked eagerly at the stranger lady, shook off the nurse's grasp on her, and, the next moment, rushed into Miss Halcombe's arms. In that moment Miss Halcombe recognized her sister—recognized the dead-alive.

Fortunately for the success of the measures taken subsequently, no one witnessed this recognition but the nurse. She was a young woman; and one was not startled by what she saw at first some incapable of interfering. When she was able to do so, her whole services were required by Miss Halcombe, who had let the momentary sunk altogether in the effort to keep her own senses under the shock of the discovery. After waiting a few minutes in the fresh air and the cool shade, her natural energy and courage helped her a little, and she became sufficiently mistress of herself to feel the necessity of recalling her presence of mind for her unfortunate sister's sake.

She obtained permission to speak alone with the patient on condition that they both remained in sight (which could be easily done from a neighboring summer-house), and that the nurse should be told she had in her pocket (three several copies) in the nurse's hands, and asked when and where she could speak to her alone.

The woman was at first surprised and distrustful. But on Miss Halcombe's showing her Count Fosco's letter, to put some questions which she was too much agitated to ask at that moment, and that she had only to refer to the proprietor of the house in any dereliction of duty, the woman took the money, and proposed three o'clock on the next day as the time for the interview. She might then slip out for half an hour after the patients had dined; and she would meet the lady in a summer-house on the side of the north wall which screened the grounds of the house. Miss Halcombe had only time to assent, and to make her sister comprehend, by a look and tone from her on the next day, when the proprietor of the Asylum joined them. He noticed his visitor's agitation, but attributed it to the excitement produced by saying that her interview with Anne Catherick had a little startled her at first. She took her cue at once from these words—that is to say, as soon as she could summon courage to force herself from the presence of her unfortunate sister.

A very little reflection, when the capacity to reflect returned, convinced her that any attempt to identify Anne Lady and so rescue her by legal means, would, even if successful, involve a delay that might be fatal to her sister's intellect, which was already shaken already by the horror of the situation to which she had been consigned. By the time Miss Halcombe had left for London she had determined to effect Lady Glyde's escape privately by means of the nurse.

She went directly to Limmeridge House, and sold out of the funds all the little property she possessed, amounting to rather less than seven hundred pounds. Returning to the Asylum, she put the price of her sister's liberty with every farthing she had in the world, she repaired the next day, by the nurse's assistance, to her, in bank-notes, to her appointment outside the Asylum wall.

The nurse was there. Miss Halcombe approached the subject cautiously by many preliminary questions. She discovered, among other particulars, that the woman had, at former times, attended on the true Anne Catherick, had been held responsible (although she was not to blame for it) for the patient's escape, and had lost her place in consequence. The same penalty, it was added, would attach to the person then speaking to her, if Anne Catherick's identity were missed a second time; and, moreover, the nurse, in that event, had no expectation of ever obtaining her place. She was engaged to be married; and she and her future husband were waiting till they had saved two hundred pounds to start in a certain three hundred pounds to start in business. The nurse's wages were good; and in this single circumstance lay the motive in contributing her small share toward the sum required in two years' time.

On this hint Miss Halcombe spoke. She declared that the supposed Anne Catherick was nearly related to her; that she had been placed in the Asylum under a false name, and that the nurse would be doing a good and a Christian action in being the means of restoring them to one another. As a proof of the truth of her story, a single objection Miss Halcombe took four bank-notes, of a hundred pounds each, from her pocket-book, and offered them to the woman as a compensation for the risk she was to run, and for the loss of her place.

The nurse hesitated, through sheer incredibility and surprise. Miss Halcombe pressed the point on her at once.

"You will be doing a good action," she repeated; "you will be helping the most injured and unhappy woman alive. Here is your marriage-portion for a reward. Bring her safely to me here, and I will put these four bank-notes into your hand before I claim her."

"Will you give me a letter saying those words, which I can show to my sweet-heart, when he asks how I got the money?" inquired the woman.

"I will bring the letter with me, ready written and signed," answered Miss Halcombe.

"Then I'll risk it," said the nurse.

"When?"

"To-morrow."

It was hastily agreed between them that Miss Halcombe should return at the same appointed time for the appearance, caution requiring that she should wait and be guided by circumstances. On that understanding they separated.

Miss Halcombe was at her place with the promised letter and the promised bank-notes before the appointed hour. She waited more than an hour and a half. At the end of that time the nurse came quickly around the corner of the wall, holding Lady Glyde by the arm. The moment they met Miss Halcombe put the bank-notes and the letter into her hand, and the sisters were united again.

The nurse had dressed Lady Glyde, with excellent forethought, in a bonnet, veil, and shawl of her own. Miss Halcombe only detained her to suggest a means of turning the pursuit in a false direction, after the escape was discovered at the Asylum. She was to go back to the house; to mention in the hearing of the other nurses that the strangers had been inquiring, latterly, about the distance from London to Hampshire; to wait till the last moment before discovery was inevitable, and then to give the alarm that Anne was missing. The supposed inquiries about Hampshire, when communicated to the owner of the Asylum, would lead him to imagine that his patient had returned to Blackwater Park, under the protection of Sir Percival, which was the last person in asserting herself to be Lady Glyde; and the first pursuit would, in all probability, be directed to that residence.

The nurse consented to follow these suggestions—the more readily, as they offered her the means of obtaining relief against any worse consequences than the loss of her place, by remaining in the Asylum, and so maintaining the appearance of having acted in good faith. She returned to the house, and Miss Halcombe lost no time in taking her sister back with her to London. Arriving in the afternoon train to Carlisle the same afternoon, and arrived at Limmeridge, without accident or difficulty of any kind, that night.

During the latter part of their journey they were alone in the carriage, and Miss Halcombe was able to draw from the remembrances of the past as her sister's confused and weakened memories was able to recall. The terrible story of the conspiracy was thus revealed in fragments, sadly incoherent in themselves, and widely detached from each other. Imperfect as the revelation was, it must nevertheless be recorded here before this explanatory narrative closes with the events of the next day at Limmeridge House.

The following particulars comprise all that Miss Halcombe was able to discover.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, May 14, both Houses adjourned, on account of the Democratic National Convention at Charleston.

On Tuesday, May 15, in the Senate, Senator Douglas commenced his speech in defence of popular sovereignty. The Senate adjourned before he ended.—In the House, Mr. Howard was presented a gold-headed cane from Michigan.

On Wednesday, May 16, Senator Douglas concluded his speech, and Senator Davis commenced his reply.—In the House, an inquiry into the Post-Office deficiation was moved and adopted. One or two minor matters were disposed of, and the House adjourned.

On Thursday, May 17, in the Senate, Senator Davis concluded his speech. Mason succeeded Senator Douglas.—In the House, a correspondent of the New York Herald, named Simonton, was expelled for receiving money from parties interested in measures before the House. An inquiry into the Post-Office Department Bill. After acting on the Senate's amendments to the Diplomatic and Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation bill, the House proceeded to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government.

On Friday, May 18, the Senate ordered to be printed a bill carrying into effect treaties with Japan, Siam, China, and Persia. A resolution was adopted giving notice to the Mount de Meadows massacre. A bill was introduced providing for the examination and payment of claims of the citizens of Texas for Indian spoliations committed since annexation. A bill to organize and sell slavery in the Territories were taken up, and Senator Seward, of New York, made a speech on the subject. Senator Tomms obtained the floor, but postponed his remarks.—In the House, Public Lands were examined session, adjourned.—The House passed the bill providing for the Pacific Railroad, and the bound steam vessels. A bill abolishing the Court of Claims, and providing for the adjudication of claims by the Secretary of the Treasury, failed.—The Nebraska contested election case was decided by the casting of Mr. Estabrooke, and the institution of Mr. Dawes as delegate.

THE REPUBLICAN CONVENTION.

The Republican National Convention organized at Chicago on the 16th, selecting George Ashmun, of Massachusetts, for permanent President, and a long list of Vice-Presidents and Secretaries. Committees on Credentials and Platform were appointed, when a recess was taken for a long and tedious session. The Platform declares, with a Protective Tariff plank, and in defence of the Territories, and the maintenance inviolate of the Principles of the Declaration of Independence, declaring that slavery can not exist in the Territories, that the Administration with extravagance and misgovernment, and that the people have a right to determine their own institutions. The platform was adopted amidst great applause. It contains 14 resolutions.

THE PLATFORM.

Resolved, That we, the delegated representatives of the Republican Electors of the United States, in Convention assembled, in the city of Chicago, for the purpose of presenting candidates and our country, unite in the following declarations:

First, That the history of the nation during the last four years has fully established the propriety and necessity of the organization and perpetuation of the Republican party, and that the causes which called it into existence are permanent in their nature, and now more than ever before demand its energetic and complete support. That we solemnly reassert the self-evident truth, declared in the preamble to the Constitution, that the public institutions reflect, among which are those of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, which are equally secured among men to secure the enjoyment of these rights.

Second, That the maintenance of the principles promulgated in the Declaration of Independence, and embodied in the Federal Constitution, is essential to the preservation of our Republican institutions, and that the Federal Constitution, the rights of the States, and the Union of the States must and shall be preserved.

Third, That to the Union of the States this nation owes its unprecedented increase in population; its surprising development of material resources; its rapid augmentation of wealth; its happiness at home and its honor abroad; and we hold in abhorrence all schemes for dissolving this Union, from whatever source they may; and we congratulate the country that no Republican member of Congress has uttered or countenanced a threat of disunion, so often made by Democratic members of Congress without rebuke and with applause from their political associates; and we denounce those threats of disunion, in case of a popular election, as denying to every American citizen the right of peaceful discussion, as an avowal of contemplated treason, which it is the imperative duty of an indignant people strongly and speedily to rebuke and forever silence.

Fourth, That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions, according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depends, and we denounce the lawless invasion by armed force of any State or Territory, no matter under what pretext, as among the gravest of crimes.

Fifth, That the present Democratic Administration has far exceeded our worst apprehensions in its unnecessary and unwarrantable expenditure of the public moneys, as is especially evident in its desperate exertions to force upon Kansas a Constitution framed by a fraudulent minority, and in its base subserviency to the unjust demands of the slave power. That the recent startling developments and corruption at the Federal metropolis show that an entire change of administration is imperatively demanded.

Sixth, That the new dogma that the Constitution of its own force carries Slavery into any or all the Territories of the United States, is a dangerous political heresy, at variance with the explicit provisions of that instrument itself, with contemporaneous exposition and with legislative and judicial precedent, is revolutionary in its tendency and subversive of the peace and harmony of the country.

Seventh, That the present condition of affairs in the United States is that of Freedom; that as our republican fathers, when they abolished Slavery in all our national territory, ordained that no person should be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, that it becomes our duty, by legislation whenever such legislation is necessary, to maintain this provision of the Constitution against all attempts to violate it, as we deem it our duty to maintain, by legislation whenever such legislation is necessary, or of any individual, to give legal expression to that great principle of right as enunciated in the Declaration of Independence.

Ninth, That we brand the recent reopening of the African slave trade, the revival of the dead and barbarous piracy, aided by perversions of judicial power, as a crime unparalleled in the dark history of this country and age, and we demand the instant and effectual execution of the severest penalties for the total and final suppression of that execrable traffic.

Tenth, That in the recent vetoes by their Federal Governors of the acts of the Legislatures of Kansas and Nebraska, prohibiting slavery in those Territories, we find a practical illustration of the boasted Democratic principle of non-intervention and Popular Sovereignty, established by the Democratic party, and we find in the denunciation of the deception and fraud involved therein.

Eleventh, That Kansas should at the earliest period admitted as a State, under the Constitution recently formed and adopted by her people, and accepted by the House of Representatives.

Twelfth, That while providing revenue for the support of the General Government by duties upon imports, sound policy requires so discriminating a duty as the imposts as to encourage the development of the industrial interests of the whole country; and we commend that policy of national exchanges which secures to the working man liberal wages, to agriculture remunerative prices, to mechanics and manufacturers an adequate reward for their skill, labor, and enterprise, and to the whole country general prosperity and independence.

Thirteenth, That we favor such a grant as will secure the speedy construction of the Pacific Railroad, by any State legislature by which the rights of citizenship hitherto accorded to immigration or change of domicile shall be abridged or impaired; and in favor of giving a full and efficient protection to the rights of all classes of citizens, whether native or naturalized, both at home or abroad.

Fifteenth, That appropriations by Congress for River and Harbor improvements of a national character, required for the accommodation and security of an existing commerce, are authorized by the Constitution, and justified by an obligation of the Government to protect the lives and property of its citizens.

Sixteenth, That a railroad to the Pacific Ocean is imperatively demanded by the interests of our growing country; that the Federal Government ought to render immediate and efficient aid in its construction, and that no preliminary thereto a daily overland mail should be promptly established.

Seventeenth, Finally, having thus set forth our distinctive principles and views, we invite the co-operation of all citizens, however differing on other questions, who substantially agree with us in their affirmance and support.

SUICIDE OF THE MURDERER MACDONALD.

About noon on Monday, the murderer MacDonald of the City Prison was called on the condition of Robert C. Ludlow, Esq., to visit him in a cell on the second corridor, on an indictment for the murder of Virginia Stewart, in Broadway, in August last, and for which he was shortly to be tried in the Court of Oyer and Terminer. When invited by the physician he was perfectly insensible, having taken a large quantity of Mann's Elixir, as quick four times as strong as laudanum. The stomach-pump was freely used, and he was plentifully showered with water, but his death occurred at 5 o'clock P.M. He was only 29 years of age. A jury was summoned on the following day at the Coroner's office, and an opinion that his death had resulted from the effects of criminal preparations of opium, which he had taken to procure suicide. The body was handed who pursue heavy infantry, and, in accordance with the last request of the deceased, conveyed to Kentucky for interment.

THE DEFALCATION OF MR. FOWLER.

The community was startled on 15th inst. by rumors, which subsequent events verify, that Mr. Isaac V. Fowler, late Postmaster of this city, who has occupied a delicate to the Government for seven years, had left a large amount. He has, it is said, absconded to Europe. The sum of $170,000 is charged, and is supposed to be the amount of Government funds received from the collection of the Government. This defalcation has been accumulating for some time, and the various statements regarding the disposition which Mr. Fowler has made of the money. The general opinion is that it has been advanced in the shape of loans to individuals. The brokerage of Mr. Fowler is of loans to individuals. The brokerage of Mr. Fowler is of long standing. George Law and G. A. Conover. The former is worth, it is said, between seven and $15,000,000, and the latter has very much the same property. It is said that they can not be held liable even to this extent, as they have given a satisfactory endorsement, and that they were not responsible for his conduct. Mr. Conover, it appears, is not known as such, but as his hotel at two o'clock Saturday afternoon, and the officials who were sent yesterday to track him since he failed to apprehend him. Hon. John A. Dix has been appointed his successor.

CAPTURE OF A SLAVER.

Letters from Key West give particulars of the capture of the slave bark Wildfire by the United States steamer Mohawk, Lieutenant Craven. The slaver had 520 slaves on board, recently taken off on the trip from Africa. The Wildfire is a neat clipper of 357 tons, and was formerly a packet employed between this port and New Orleans, and was owned by Hargous Brothers. The last trip she made to that port was in August last.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

The Reform Bill and passed its second reading in the House of Lords on 14th inst. Lord John Russell had stated the same branch of Parliament that the English proposition for the settlement of the Savoy and Nice difficulty had been rejected by the American Government, and that future action depends upon Secretary Cass's reply to the last English dispatch.

FRANCE.

A SAD STORY.

A sad event, unfortunately not unique in the annals of science, has just occurred at Paris. Some time ago a lady, of respectable appearance in private life, presented herself to her care a little Russian boy, born deaf and dumb. The child was of gentle temper and most endearing manners, and the poor governess bent the whole of her intelligence to the possibility of instructing him and keep pace with her other pupils. Soon, at sight of his quick comprehension of the various methods she invented for his instruction, she began to grow more ambitious still, and to be devoured with the desire to endow with the faculty which Nature herself had denied. For this purpose it appears that Mademoiselle Clerot passed whole nights in study, and lavished her slender means in experiments. At length the light broke in upon her. She remained perfectly convinced that in sulphuric ether must reside the wonderful powerful energy that was to lead to a sense of hearing. She began by pouring into the ear a few drops of the fluid, gradually increasing as the quantity until it reached ten drops. The cure was complete. The child heard and understood in a short time. The artification was still imperfect for a little while longer, but it seems has since perfected by surgical treatment. The fame of the cure spread far and wide. Letters of praise were tried upon numberless individuals in all stages of deafness, and in every case successful. A vacancy was found to pronounce upon the discovery made by Mademoiselle Clerot. The decision was made entirely in favor; the Montyon prize was awarded to the fortunate lady, and various testimonials of favor were conferred on her, both from public bodies and private individuals. But the end of this sacrifice and devotion in the cause of humanity is not yet. The poor Mademoiselle Clerot, unable to resist the change from a position of dependence and privation to one of fame and comparative opulence, has sunk beneath the weight of the unwonted honors that overwhelmed her. Her mind, worn out with study and anxiety, exhausted with labor and with watching, has given way, and she has just been conveyed a hopeless maniac to a maison de santé at Montmartre.

ITALY.

PROGRESS OF EVENTS.

The King of Sardinia was at Bologna, and had received an enthusiastic reception. The Syndicate had a protracted him with five million francs, as a voluntary contribution from the people. There were rumors of renewed insurrections in the interior of Sicily, but nothing authentic. Arrests continued at Naples. Naples was tranquil. Garibaldi has not gone to Sicily, Cavour having dissuaded him therefrom.

SPAIN.

A GENERAL AMNESTY.

A general amnesty is granted in Spain, the only conditions being that the recipients take the oath of allegiance. Count Montemolin, and his brother would be included as princes of the royal family.

THE JAPANESE AT WASHINGTON.

We devote most of our illustrated pages this week to illustrations of the Japanese embassy at Washington. The reader will find pictures of the Arrival Landing at the Washington Navy Yard, of the Reception by President Buchanan, of the Presentation of Autographs to the Japanese at Willard's, of the Japanese at dinner, and of the singular operation of head-dressing which the Embassadors and their suite undergo at regular intervals. We now proceed to give—from the daily papers—some description of these various incidents:

THE LANDING AT WASHINGTON.

The Herald correspondent writes:

"Up to twenty-five minutes past eleven, at which time a signal gun announced the approach of the yard, and the tug of the Philadelphia was to be seen turning Buzzard's Point, immediately below the navy-yard, there was a large crowd gathered with the yard did not include a thousand spectators, a very large number added since the morning. As the steamer approached, the American and Japanese flags floating gayly from the stern, gave a fitting character to her appearance, and as she came up to the wharf, to which she had been skilfully and in small sloop referred to, that had been drawn into the stream for the purpose, she presented a very pretty and highly effective appearance. As she turned in near the old ship-house the Marine Band, whose gay uniform had been discerned on the bow, struck up the 'Star Spangled Banner,' which was immediately followed by the inspiring strains of 'Hail Columbia.' At twenty minutes to twelve she was made fast to the wharf. All of the Japanese were at this time standing on

"Although the boat was at the wharf at twenty minutes to twelve, no declaration took place till a quarter past twelve, by which time several detachments of the marines and the Washington corps of cadets had been arranged in a long line to the east of the walk, and the Marine Band had taken its position on the opposite side. The latter then, accompanied by Captain Dupont and several other officers of the navy-yard, and the marines, proceeded on foot to the gangway of the steamer, where they were received by Commodore Tattnall, the ambassadors and their two chief counselors. The Mayor then, in a few appropriate remarks, welcomed the Japanese to the national metropolis of a nation of which they had heard so much. Commodore Tattnall replied, through the chief interpreter, in the words, 'We thank you, Mr. Mayor, for your kind welcome, and we receive it.'

"After this the salute of seventeen guns was fired from the Dahlgren battery, when the first embassador, Kim-moto-no-Kami-Gonnokami, with his associates, and marched forward between the lines of citizens and soldiers, behind the head of the yard and walk, whose carriages were ordered to be in waiting to receive them. They had not proceeded far when Commodore Tattnall and Commodore Buchanan stepped forward and uttered a few words of welcome to the Japanese from the lips of the President of the United States and the people. He said that he participated in the general feeling expressed by the Japanese Government when the treaty was made by Commodore Perry, and he felt pleased that the present visit was inspiring as the present one, of being the medium of a reception and welcome as kindly as the friendly relations of America now extended to them.

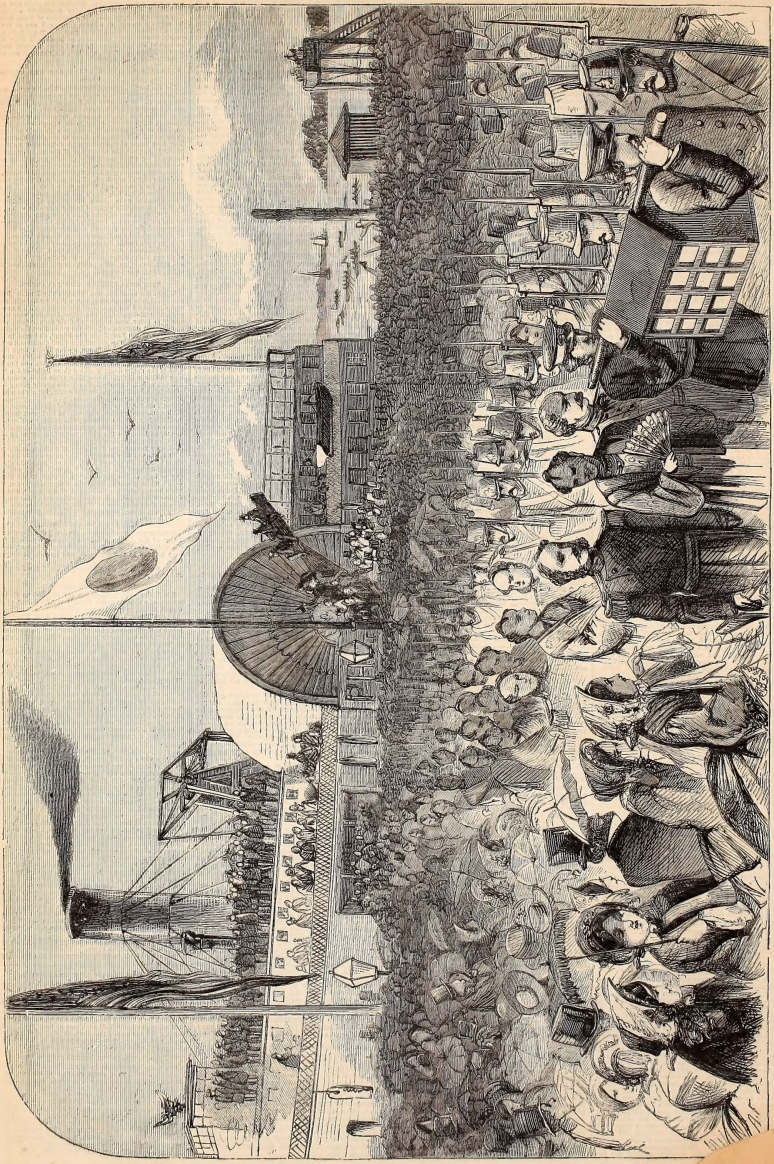
"After the chief interpreter had communicated these remarks to them, the embassadors bowed their acknowledgments, and the interpreter replied, in effect, Sir,

"After this the procession moved on without interruption to the east of the walk, the chief commissioner being with his right arm linked in that of Captain Dupont and he on his left in front of some other officer. The second embassador was similarly escorted by Lieutenant Commanding Craven, and the third by Captain Ells, and beside them walked other naval officers.

"The first carriage contained Kim and the Nestorians, a black lacquered frame, square in shape, and in size and of very pretty workmanship. The interior, in which was fixed the trusty-box, hidden from the public eye by a knee curved red silk cloth, gathered in the front embroidered in the line of procession, and was carried by two of the Japanese. The next in line was the state coach in which was reached it was placed on the ground, to await suitable transit to the Capitol.

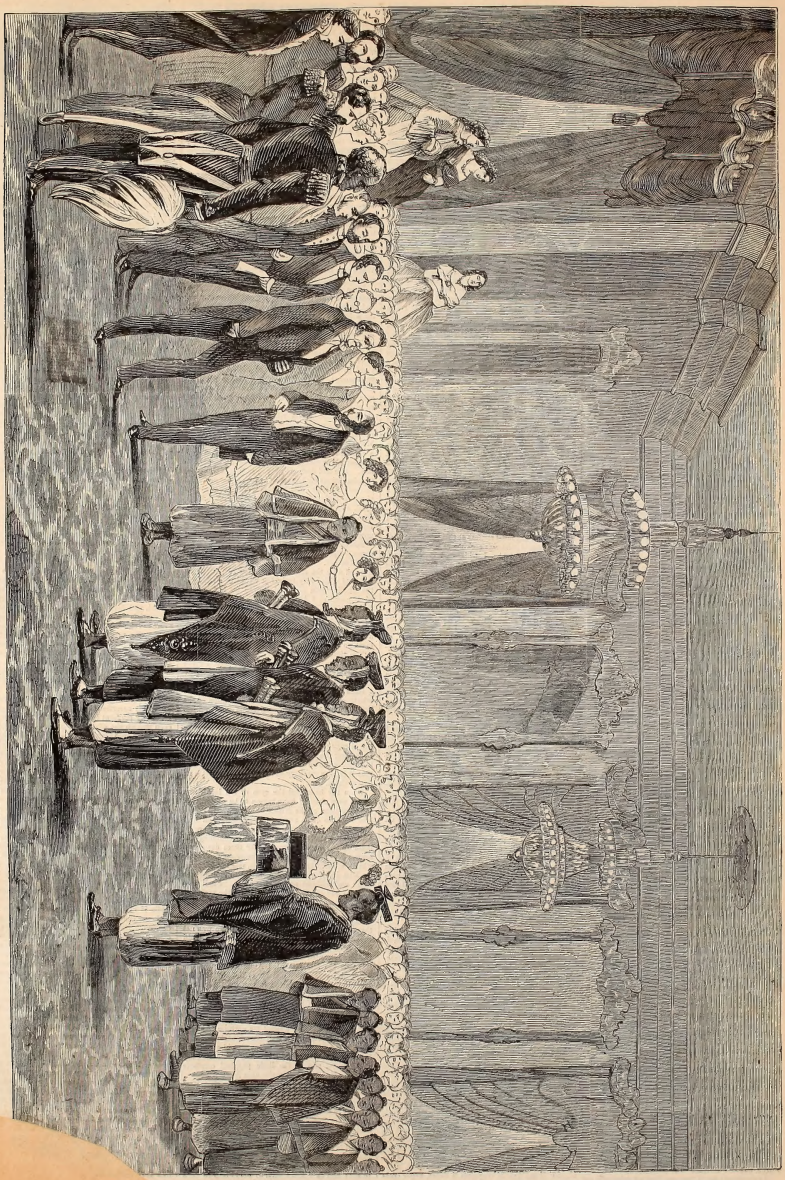
THE PERSONNEL OF THE EMBASSY.

It is worth while to present for once, at least, whatever orthography may be the correct, the names of the Japanese as they are uttered by their owners:



1. Sim-ni [illegible] Kawji-no-Kami.
2. Moriyaki Awaji-no-Kami.
3. Ogoori Bungo-no-Kami.
4. Muragaki.
5. Naruoka Genkiro.
6. Matsuzaki Kogoro.
7. Hitiken Kembiro.
8. Oshima Shuzo Hidenari.
9. Matsuoka Sadajiro.
10. Yosida Sayeomon, also to be Treasurer of-
11. Nimoura Gohajiro.
12. Hori Matsuzo Hidetsune.
13. Soejoe Yosegiro.
14. Yosida Toshiharu Shinano.
15. Somakwa Sojiro.
16. Mosaki.
17. Moryima.
18. Tatsuno Takujeiro.
19. Tatsioi Owaj-uro.
20. Fukuchi.

The order of the above is strictly according to the order of rank. No. 1 is the Chief Commissioner and Embassador; No. 3 is the Censor or Adviser; No. 4 is the Officer of the Seal; No. 5 is the Secretary of Foreign Affairs; No. 6 is slightly subordinate to the preceding; No. 6 is the Chief Officer of the Ceremonies of high position; Nos. 7, 8, 14, and 19 are attendants, or aids, to the Admiral; No. 9 and No. 10 are officers belonging to the first and second Embassadors; No. 11 is the Imperial Interpreter; No. 12 is also to be Treasurer of-; No. 13 is Officer of the Seal; No. 15 and No. 16 are Doctors; Nos. 18 and 20 are Secretaries; No. 17 is Officer of the Guard to the first name. The family name in Japan always precedes, and No. 10, Yosida Sayeomon, is the Governor of No. 13.



The princes, Shimii, of Bizejen, Mootegaki, of Awajsi, and Ogoori, of Bungo, are of the highest rank, and have been deputed upon this mission. They are the equals in dignity of the princes who visited the United States with Commodore Perry, and the subsequent treaties. The Chief Commissioner is Governor of Nagasaki, the Lyceum, or temporal superior, having no power to sign the intended treaties. The Vice-Governor, Kawji-no-Kolongo, or have belonged, however, to the Lyceum's Foreign Board of Six. Their duties are of considerable significance, since they have no share in the government of the place, whose name signifies Long Promontory, as Kami is not the governing prince of that province in Kinsiu—Kagoshima has never been in the hands of the Dutch. Possibly they hold the titles by reason of family connexion. The Chief Commissioner is also the Japanese official master, a Dutch copy of which has been translated by Mr. Harris, authorized, as well as by the Dutch, to act for Mr. Harris, and to arrange all affairs so as to insure perpetual peace and friendship between the United States and Japan.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE OF VISITORS.

Few Americans before visit the Japan will be especially in love with the principal members of this Embassy in consequence of the striking peculiarity of their facial faces. The first Embassador is a man of small frame, with a face the antithesis of manly. He is probably five feet in height, and thirty-five in years. He has a long and straight, but small nose, and a full and sensual mouth feature. It is true this to be called Jewish, and too even to be called Roman. It is a face, in short, of no character, not unlike the beak of a parrot. But perhaps I am exaggerating. The Japanese look forward rather than upon than the first, and is decidedly worse looking. He has the least mark of beauty in his countenance of any I have seen since I left Europe. But perhaps I am exaggerating. The Japanese look forward rather than backward

RECEPTION OF THE JAPANESE EMBASSADORS BY THE PRESIDENT AT THE WHITE HOUSE, MAY 17, 1860.

THE THREE MISSES WAPSCOTT.

I AM a widower—a widower of a year's standing; it having been my misfortune to lose the late Anna Maria Potts, née Scrawlens, after a short but happy union of two years, four months, and thirteen days. Having no pledges of our affection, it would perhaps be supposed by the unthinking that I would, as a consequence, go back upon my bachelor days, and, relinquishing my household gods, once more taste the sweets of freedom and bonding-house. I was spared this heavy infliction by the promptness of the widowed mother of my late Anna Maria, who instantly upon the decease of her daughter announced her intention of continuing her domicile beneath my roof and ministering to my domestic ease. To this I made no objection; for whatever may be the little shortcomings of Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens, she certainly understands the mysteries of the kitchen, and, I have no hesitation in declaring, is the most capable woman I ever did see on an Irish stew.

If in the course of this narrative I should, therefore, indulge in any strictures upon this amiable woman, let them be taken only as called forth by special circumstances, not by the entirety of her conduct. During the lifetime of my late lamented Anna Maria, Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens always exercised so much supervision over my personality as kept my mind alive to the fact of her deep interest in every thing having even the most remote bearing on her beloved daughter; but of late I am forced to confess that this supervision has been extended, until I am utterly at a loss to account for her abiding and never-failing constancy to the memory of the late lamented and lost Anna Maria. That I myself am the better understood, it will be necessary that I should go into some little explanation of my domestic position.

Should there be any who would enter upon the very grounds of the matter, they can be satisfied, by spanning a few minutes at the Hall of Records, that I am the sole owner of the house and lot No. 1157 Twenty-second Avenue, and that that valuable property is now in the most flourishing upon said house and lot there is no encumbrance. That property was once the belonging of my aunt, Jane Potts—a lady every way worthy of it, and with whom, from the tender age of six, when I was bereaved by my father, I was a dweller, and to whom I acted as sole heir and executor.

Previous to my aunt's death she received a most forcibly the necessity of providing something nung, as she said, for my début in the world; and to this end that excellent woman practiced the most touching economy; and among the many things growing out of this resolve, she let the upper floors of her mansion, No. 1157 Twenty-second Avenue. It was to this fact that I was indebted for my wife, the late lamented and lost Anna Maria Potts, née Scrawlens. After this preliminary it will hardly be necessary for me to say that Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens, who had been the school-fellow of my wife, and her daughter, Anna Maria, were the first tenants of the upper floors of my aunt's house.

I am inclined to the belief that the interest of Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens, and consequently of her daughter, Anna Maria, was not awakened in my behalf during the lifetime of my aunt. If it was, it certainly was concealed with great art; for no show of it was ever made before that estimable lady, who, being of the maiden persuasion, many a time and oft raised her voice forcibly against the institution of matrimony, and more than once, in the presence of Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens and the late Anna Maria, said, with tears in her eyes, that she hoped that I would never bring on gray hairs sorrow on her, during her lifetime, so to wed; and I am happy to say that I never did.

There was a little effort on the part of Mrs. Jabez to render the late Anna Maria very much of a myth to me. In other words, I saw but little of the young lady, and never by any chance alone. I could not help noticing that when Mrs. Jabez and Anna Maria came to drink tea with my aunt, when I was always present at tea, and when my aunt went to drink tea with them, and I was always counted out, that Anna Maria never got up curls or dress, and herself and her daughter wore things which I knew she could do, for I had seen her three several times, when she was showing that great, tall, hulking fellow, Seventy, on a Sunday afternoon. I disliked Seventy excessively, and do dislike him to the present day, even though he is married, and with the most delicate mind in the possession of Anna Maria, and declared himself a broken man from that time forth, on which point I am constrained to believe him, from the fact that he has extracted from my sympathies since several small sums, which he has invariably failed to return. As I say, I was sensibly aware of this insensibility to my presence.

Previously orderly stomach all things, which brings me down to that sad day when my much beloved aunt, Miss Jane Potts, departed this life, aged forty-one, on the previous 24th of September. On this ground I have nothing to blame myself for. If assiduous attendance and wakefulness during the last illness of the late Miss Potts could in any unction to lay to my breast, I flatter myself that I have that medicament. That my unfailing interest was amply rewarded by the position I am apparent in the fact that, on the reading of my aunt's will, I was found to be sole heir to the house 1157 Twenty-second Avenue, and the following consisting of certain Manhattan Bank stock, United States six per cent, and other things.

From this moment it was that the soul of Mrs. Scrawlens came out to meet me. When she, as she beautifully expressed it, without meaning any disrespect to the late Miss Potts, saw that I stood untrammeled, but still lonely, her heart arose in rebellion against her-former unsociality, and died for my unprotected state. The first demonstration to this awakening was the coming of Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens with a week of my aunt's decease, to take the avowed purpose of setting things to rights. At that early day I may say that my mind was not prepared to have things set to rights; but still I urged no objection, and Mrs. S. and the late Anna Maria took possession of my rooms, and consumed a series of cleanings and fixings that I may truly say have never since ceased. It was at my own fireside that Mrs. S. first made that Irish stew which has since become part and parcel of my existence. It was there that Anna Maria first showed her ability on a batter pudding, and stuffed and roasted a goose as it never was stuffed and roasted before. A young woman of genius, with long blue eyes and real auburn ringlets. For the interest manifested in my loneliness by Mrs. J. Scrawlens and her daughter I could not but be grateful, and, as a consequence, show it in such small ways as was in my power. Many a time have I borrowed from Mrs. Scrawlens of Jones's way the choicest of the sugared dainties; many a time did a bottle of choice sherry—Mrs. S. is so fond of sherry—find its way to their rooms after my compliments. As the weeks flew over, and those delicate attentions toward me were undiminished, I reciprocated, to the best of my power, by occasional excursions to the country, by rides, and by such other little items as are naturally agreeable to the sex, but can only be enjoyed without the attendance of the lords of creation. On all these Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens was one of the party. In fact, from the very first week before any action of my own had called forth an expression of opinion, declared to me that she never could, never, never be induced by either of her sex to go any where unattended by her mother; for, as she truly expressed herself, what has a girl to do with her reputation? Mrs. S. always carried out this principle, even when the marriage-bond had made the legal protector of Anna M. M. The devotion to her daughter was so great that nothing could prevent her attendance even at the theatres and at balls, however late the hour or uncertain the weather.

What could all this lead to when the friendship already predisposed and established was discharged?

One summer evening it was, when we all, meaning the late lamented A. M., Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens, and myself, sat in the front room of my own rooms. The evening was balmy, the windows open, the moonlight streamed into the room; the late A. M. was sitting behind the sofa, where we were rather in the shadow, while Mrs. Jabez sat in the large rocking-chair, from which position it was so great that she must have fallen away into slumber so sound, that, with every few seconds of time, came a signal or distinguished sign of her presence. It was from this summer evening, with the rather marmonatic accompaniment of Mrs. Jabez, that I first took to Mrs. Jabez. The only bid her head, ringlets and all—I forget to mention that since the death of Miss Jane Potts, Anna Maria wore ringlets constantly—on my shoulder, and softly murmured consent, coupled with the reservation that I should ask her ma, Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens, who was in the adjoining room, pri orously.

Oh, the calm of that summer evening, when I sat holding the innocent head of the late lamented Anna Maria, and felt the curls blown gently by the summer breeze across my face! When I held the tiny little hand within my own, and kissed the lips which I knew to be rosy red, although at that moment I could not see them distinctly! The last time I ever drew away swiftly, or the nap of Mrs. Jabez came to a sudden termination, for scare but the first warm kisses of love were upon the lips of her that lay awoke, and the late A. M. flew toward her, and buried her head in the maternal bosom. Something, perhaps an unconscious pressure to that bosom, this action was a communication of the events of the last few moments. Acting upon this prompting, I flew toward the door, at the full speed of thought, and threw myself on my knees before both these estimable ladies. Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens had fainted away, and the late lamented Anna Maria, declared herself in the possession of Anna Maria, and declared him-self a broken man from that time forth, on which point I am constrained to believe him, from the fact that he has extracted from my sympathies since several small sums, which he has invariably failed to return. As I say, I was sensibly aware of this insensibility to my presence.

Previously orderly stomach all things, which brings me down to that sad day when my much beloved aunt, Miss Jane Potts, departed this life, aged forty-one, on the previous 24th of September. On this ground I have nothing to blame myself for. If assiduous attendance and wakefulness during the last illness of the late Miss Potts could in any unction to lay to my breast, I flatter myself that I have that medicament. That my unfailing interest was amply rewarded by the position I am apparent in the fact that, on the reading of my aunt's will, I was found to be sole heir to the house 1157 Twenty-second Avenue, and the following consisting of certain Manhattan Bank stock, United States six per cent, and other things.

Oh, the calm of that summer evening, when I sat holding the innocent head of the late lamented Anna Maria, and felt the curls blown gently by the summer breeze across my face! When I held the tiny little hand within my own, and kissed the lips which I knew to be rosy red, although at that moment I could not see them distinctly! The last time I ever drew away swiftly, or the nap of Mrs. Jabez came to a sudden termination, for scare but the first warm kisses of love were upon the lips of her that lay awoke, and the late A. M. flew toward her, and buried her head in the maternal bosom. Something, perhaps an unconscious pressure to that bosom, this action was a communication of the events of the last few moments. Acting upon this prompting, I flew toward the door, at the full speed of thought, and threw myself on my knees before both these estimable ladies. Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens had fainted away, and the late lamented Anna Maria, declared in that it of the late Anna Maria Scrawlens, sobbing forth the two words, "Take her!" and then she fell upon my neck.

That day two weeks we were married—rather sooner than I had intended, but I entirely acquiesced in Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens's proposition, as she hated long engagements, and so we were married; Mrs. Jabez entering with spirit into all household preparations, and the happiest woman that the house was once more as one family, that by my having assigned as the wedding chamber the south parlor, she constituted herself upon my floor, omitting, in the excitement and the hurry of changing, to mind me the least in the world about dust, and which circumstance has, to all appearances, never since recurred to her memory. Her household goods removed quickly and well with my own, and Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens took entire charge—a charge in which she remains to the present day.

Thus far in my relation carries me to the time which brought about the events that have made me my own historian. At the end of our first matrimonial year it was resolved, in solemn council, that the house was too large for our uses, and that once more a tenant should be found who would occupy the upper floor, where once dwelt Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens and daughter. To me was assigned the task of finding a tenant, and, in a very few weeks he was found, in the person of my old friend, Wapscott, of the firm of Wapscott & Jones, sugar commission. Wapscott was a widower with one child quite pale and sickly little girl, who suddenly inflicted the sympathies of the late Anna Maria. On taking the house, Wapscott responded to the inquiries of Mrs. Jabez, as to his intentions in regard of domestic matters, by saying that he should receive aid from his three sisters, the Misses Wapscott, who would do their best for them and his little girl. I fancied at this moment that a cloud passed over the brow of Mrs. S.; but it was too late, the rooms and the papers were signed, and the next day Wapscott was to take possession. That evening Mrs. Jabez took occasion to make several remarks about some people never doing anything in the way of business correctly; some people not inquiring into things, and getting giddy, and plunging head into their house; all of which remarks I felt were intended for myself, but to which I made not one word of answer.

The next day Wapscott moved in. That evening I head all the news. Mrs. Jabez had proffered her services, and, as a consequence, was all three of the Misses Wapscott. Of the personal appearance of either of these young ladies I could take no intelligent account. Mrs. S. I learned that the youngest Miss Wapscott was a "fly-away," "a giddy pate," and "a harum-scarum." That the second Miss Wapscott was "a slinky," "a slouchy," and "a slommicks." Of the eldest Miss Wapscott, the fat went forth that she was "a dragon," a dreadful one, "a shocking one."

Time passed on, and the heart of Mrs. Jabez became reconciled to the Misses Wapscott. I had paid ample compliments to them, though, for a long period I was doubtful whether either of those young ladies saw me, from the fact that, whenever I encountered them in the halls of their society, they had a way of looking at me vacantly, as though nothing stood in the spot where I was, or of looking through me, at objects behind, a loud, giving me the unpleasant feeling that I was transparent. Added to this, the Misses Wapscott never wanted the loveliness of their countenance; even going so far, if I must confess the fact, as to turn up their noses at me. This was after the late Anna Maria when I made attempts to join in the general conversation. All this did not prevent my proposing to Mrs. Jabez that the three Misses Wapscott were rather good-looking girls, and such a finished artist in her own line, Miss Helen Wapscott, with her dark eyes, and luxuriant ringlets. She had deep-set gray eyes that plainly told of calculations for housekeeping expenses and rigid economies. Miss Wapscott, the fat, was a perfect verse of both her sisters. She was middle-sized, dark, with liquid eyes, and raven hair. Miss Julia never spoke to me, but I was told by Mrs. Jabez of the Italian style, and gave way to the dolce far niente until it amounted to stagnation. Miss Georgina never spoke to me, but I caught her at a confirmed romp. She romped with her sisters whether they would or not. She romped with her brother. She romped with the servants in the cut, with herself, and with every body but with me. Once, in the exhilaration of mind caused by her gayety and objection, I made the timid overture, and constitutional bashfulness of my manner, and made an indigent offer of a romp with Miss Georgina, which was instantly crushed out with a "Pshaw!" and Miss Georgy was quiet for almost an hour afterward.

The time passed on, and my friend Wapscott had been my tenant, with perfect satisfaction, for the period of sixteen months, when, in the course of events, the late Anna Maria Potts was called away.

I have always struggled to reconcile myself to whatever is pre-ordained, and when I think of the little parties that we made, Anna Maria, Mrs. Jabez, and myself, in the buck sitting-room, with hot sherry cobblers and cool sherry cobblers in the summer, I feel that it is very hard. Mrs. Jabez has always dong her best to realize those moments by having the little sitting-room evening, and mixing with her own hands the beverages; but I feel that it is all a mockery and a show, the spirit is no longer there.

From the hour that the eyes of the late Anna Maria were closed I have reason to be grateful for the attentions of Mrs. Jabez to Wapscott. Even the languid Miss Julia awakened sufficiently, on that sad occasion, to become useful, and Miss Georgina proved the same by coming home during her noise to her own apartments for three days, and crying heartily at the right moment—an example which Miss Wapscott, the fat, says "was not followed by Miss Julia, who cried at the most inopportune times and without proper discretion. Shall I be justified in saying that Mrs. Jabez has received at this occurrence, and have seen no reason since to alter my mind, that Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens did not receive these attentions to Wapscott as Wapscott as they should have been received? There was not that full responsiveness of spirit which I should have been gratified to have seen in the mother of the late lamented Anna Maria.

While the late Miss Anna Maria was living, I may repeat that neither of the Misses Wapscott thought it consistent to pay me those little attentions which, bereaved as I bereaved man, sprang up out of the very overflow of the heart. When they looked upon the late A. M. as entitled to his privileges according to them, and naturally supposed that I wanted for nothing. When she was called away, what more natural than that they, through Mrs. Jabez, should offer me those little acts that their ability could carry them—to relieve my sadness and ode to the little physical comforts which, alas! I had been used to as a lifetime?

It was unquestionably in this view that Miss Helen sent down several dishes of really superb-looking jelly. I speak only of its look: the flavor I failed in satisfying myself of, from the fact that Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens, during my absence, as she declared, consigned three of them to the slop-pail and the fourth to the closet, from whence I do not believe it ever came forth, though I cannot positively assert that I saw it go in. Mrs. Jabez declared them to be trash, and horribly made—quite unfit to eat; and as I know Mrs. J. Scrawlens to be a woman of unimpeachable taste in jellies, I do not doubt that they were not open up to the mark. In speaking upon this matter, I say nothing of a preachpie and some turtle-soup, of which I tasted only through the medium of Mrs. Scrawlens, who assured me that they were totally unsuitable, and that they had met the fate of the jellies. In this little matter Mrs. Jabez elicited my warmest commendations, for the politeness that led her to so far sacrifice her conscientious scruples as to declare in my hearing, to Miss Helen Wapscott, that I had eaten and enjoyed these viands amazingly.

Miss Helen was not alone given to these kind sympathies; but many times, through the day and evening she would drop in and hold familiar consultations on family matters, imparting valuable intelligence as to where an article could get excellent butter could be had; or directing the attention of Mrs. Jabez to a nice little set of pottery at an cost a pound cheaper than those which that lady had just bought. There were, no doubt, many times when Mrs. Jabez felt naturally troubled at the thought that she had mistaken economies; but I never could see why she should allow any, immediately after the departure of Miss Helen, give way to an exhibition of irritation, which would induce her to strip off her apron and go through the performance of dusting the furniture until the perspiration rolled from her face.

To Miss Julia Wapscott, also, I was indebted for many moments of guiding reflection. Miss Julia came only at evening, when she preferred the room—as she artistically expressed it—in a half-tone, which would be produced by partially putting out the gas, and trusting to the moonlight or the reflection of the street lamps; and in winter by removing the lids to the kitchen stove and keeping the doors half shut. At such moments Miss Julia would seat herself beside me upon the sofa, and expand the fan in her hand in accordance with the Asia Maria. Of this subject she never seemed to tire. She could recount with singular correctness the exact costume of every ball that she had ever been, and intersperse it with notes of her own that showed how deeply she had studied the subject. Many a time, sitting there in the dim light, have I felt a warm tear drop upon my hand, and watched the beautiful child as she bent her head down to hide it from her eyes. Many a time have I listened, charmed even to ecstasy by the soft hum of her voice. Many a time have I seen her head bowed by weeping down her guitar, and singing over those ballads which were so admired by the late A. M. That Miss Julia was a treasure to me, I have had a chief other evidence than my own. Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens never failed, when that young lady sat beside me upon the sofa, to keep her hand on the gas-cock, that no word of her conversation should be lost. Why Miss Julia should have shown visible annoyance at this precaution on the part of Mrs. Jabez to me, but was an unquestionable fact that such was the truth.

I think I have remarked, in some previous part of this narrative, that Miss Georgina Wapscott slightly objected to a romp, when it was to be forced upon her. The same may be said of Miss Helen removed, and Miss Georgina Wapscott now sees no impropriety in entering upon numberless romps even to epileptics. My eldest child was flung head with a "Pshaw!" and Miss Georgy was quiet for almost an hour afterward.

crash awakened me from the wild, ecstatic bliss. I raised my eyes to behold before me Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens, towering like a giant, and ejaculating only the one word, "Get out!"

Is it necessary to say that Miss Julia Wapscott and myself were both upon our feet in an instant, and that the room seemed at once lit up to a supernatural brilliancy by the flashes from the eyes of that young lady and of Mrs. Jabez? Is it necessary to say this and a hundred things more to show how terribly the shock fell? Shall I confess that, under the embarrassment of the position, I was speechless, but that Miss Julia was not?

It will hardly be necessary for me to chronicle the terrors of that evening. In fact, I believe that there is a point beyond which the chronicler has no power, and that point was reached on that identical evening. There was a terrible clash of voices —of two voices. A figure swelling into gigantic proportions, with its hands rushing upon the hips, and the elbows extended, which, in the dismay of the moment, I felt looked much like Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens, and then again it did not. Then there was a figure brought stern and sharp against the moonlight, with all the dress of Miss Julia, but with a celerity of action which I felt never could have belonged to that young lady. Then there were loud words, hisses, wild mocking laughs, two or three acutely resounding the action of a person in expectoration, a rush of feet upon the stairs, the door thrown open without knocking, the dim figures of Miss Helen and Miss Georgina, the wild rushing of the latter, and the sudden fall of Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens; and then all was void and darkness, every one seeming to go away into the space, out of which came sounds in the voice of Miss Julia, much deepened, which shaped themselves into the words "Mine!" "Wretch," "stupid Fool," and "Beast," all of which I knew, even in my unconscious state, were intended for me.

When the outer world came back to me, the first sight that met my eyes, walking with hasty strides through the room, was the person of Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens—nothing else human was present. That lady fixed her eyes upon my reviving form, and in a moment gave way to the pent-up agonies of her soul. There are some, perhaps, who would not have considered that her words or manner of delivery were exactly of the kind that would have awakened remorse in the guilty soul; but to such I can only say that we are not all alike. When I thought of that faithful and devoted woman, who had given into my care the only child of her lone widowhood, who had clung to my fortunes through two years four months and thirteen days of matrimonial bliss, and one year of loneliness (except the Misses Wapscott), I could not but realize that I had acted the part of a villain. When I remembered the numberless instances of her practical affection, the delicious puddings, the incomparable pastry, the cup of coffee she made coffee, and the manner of cooking a wild duck, I felt that in suffering my heart to go out groping into the darkness after the Misses Wapscott was an act unworthy of a gentleman, and only to be atoned for by a lifetime of devotion.

I shall not repeat what Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens said that evening, or what was my response. It will be enough to say that the moon went down upon us in peace, and that it is I am now writing this history, the Misses Wapscott are moving away from No. 147 Twenty-second Avenue—a consummation which was settled by Mrs. J. S. without my intervention.

To-morrow I am to be married to the charming woman, Mrs. Jabez Scrawlens.

THE LAST CRUSADE OF THE EMPEROR FRIEDRICH BARBAROSSA.

Tuneour the misty Middle Ages, towering high above the rest, Glitters Kaiser Barbarossa, with a bright and spotless breast.

Good to camp and great in council, he rises to our view, Kingliest presence, 'mid the shadows that crowd the century through.

When the red beard of his manhood hung in ashen white and grey,
Through the hungry mountain passes Kaiser Friedrich took his way.

"The holy tomb, Jerusalem, is seized by Saladin,
And Paynim profanation takes the place of prayer and hymn.

"With one clearly pious action let our life for this world end,
And Jerusalem the glorious from this pagan rout defend!"

On the plain of Roncaglia, where his shield, seen high and far,
Shone upon his loyal soldier as a changeless radiant star,

Shone upon the battered peasants, shone o'er planned noble good,
And selfish spirits trembled, and crushed cares cried aloud

To this bravest hero Kaiser, who for rule of judgment took Nor threat of sword, nor bribe of gold, nor old Justinian's book.

"To my Master I must answer. I am Kaiser over you!
But my God has made me powerful, and I owe him service true."

[illegible]ce sat down with him in his weather-[illegible]ened heart from audience
[illegible]sacred city's [illegible]ustino.

"Oh, my son!" groaned Kaiser Friedrich; "oh, my gallant heir is dead!"

And the anguish of the Father bowed the hero's kingly head.

"Woe is me, my son has perished! Oh, my son, my son is slain!
But Christ the Lord is living! Let us on, still on, my men!

"Still his sepulchre is sacred, still his cross is put to scorn;
And to victory we must struggle for the glory of his name."

When his eager foot were planted on Calvary's mystic hill,
And gentle airs of Palestine his conquering banners fill,

As the crowning flush of triumph, as his own peculiar joy,
At the tomb of Christ the risen Friedrich found his living boy.

JOTTINGS ABOUT THE JAPANESE.

THE JAPANESE EMBASSADORS AND SUITE AT DINNER AT WILLARD'S, WASHINGTON.—[SEE PAGE 327.]

Culebra Point, just a mile or two astern of us. By the blood of Barabbas, caballeros, we were in a trap for wolves, and the hounds were in full cry! I immediately, however, luffed the schooner up and steered boldly for the frigate; and as a puff of smoke spouted out from the lee bow of the Admiral to windward, and before the boom of the gun's report reached us, I hoisted American colors. Seeing this, the brig hove in stays, and perhaps, being ordered to board me, came staggering along on the other tack across our fore foot, while the frigate went round too and held her wind toward her consorts to windward. Now this was just the disposition which I wanted of the vessels, and it could not have been done better for my plans had I been the Admiral of the squadron. In less than a quarter of an hour the brig—and no great things she was, with a contemptible battery, as I could see, of short carronades—hove aback a little on the bow of the schooner, and gave us a warning of a twenty-four pound shot across our fore foot to heave to also, at the same time hoisting the English ensign.

"So! ho!" ejaculated Captain Brand, as he twisted the point of his nose, accompanied by a malevolent scowl, "Señores, I at once hauled flat aft the foresail, dropped the main peak, and let the helm take as if to round to under the brig's stern; whereupon my man-of-war friend dropped a cutter into the water, and she had just shoved off in readiness to board me, when before you could light a paper cigar I run up the main peak, got a pull of the sheets, and the Centipede was off again like a shark with his fin, above water, heading for the narrow passage between Culebra and Crab Islands. It was at least five minutes before that stupid brig could believe his eyes, and ten more before he got hold of the boat again, when she filled away and began to pop gun after gun at me as he could bring his battery to bear! There was only one shot that slipped on board us, and that only smashed off both legs of a negro, and then hopped off through the foresail to windward. Had I not had a good dinner that day and pleasant society on board"—how peculiarly the speaker smiled—"I should perhaps have taught that brig such a lesson that he would not have cared to report it to his Admiral. But as I knew I had the heels of him, and as the rest of the squadron were now crowding all sail and keeping off in chase of me, I ordered Pedillo, just in touching my hat and saying 'Adios,' to clear away the long gun and return the brig's salute. The shot struck him just forward the night heads by the bowsprit, and by the way the splinters flew and his jib and head sails came down, I knew I had crippled him for an hour at least. At the same time, to prevent any mistakes as to our quality, and to satisfy the Admiral's curiosity, we hauled down the Yankee colors and set our swallow-tailed flag."

"Rather dark bunting! no?", edged in Don Ignacio.

"Ay, amigo, as black as that eye of thine, though not half so murderous," retorted the Pirate as he continued his narrative.

"Bueno, there came the whole of the squadron down after us, spitting out from their bristle ports mouthfuls of cold iron, which all went to the bottom of the Virgin's Passage, for not one came within a mile of the schooner; and then I led them such a dance through that intricate cluster of reefs and islets, that soon after dark they gave up the game, and I said 'Buenas noches' to them all!"

Here Captain Brand paused, made a careful selection of a beautifully tanned tobacco cigar from the box, shouted to Babette to produce some old Santa Cruz rum, sugar, lemons, and hot water—screeching hot he said—and while the Padre crossed himself, and then throwing his fine legs, encased in the lustrous silk stockings, on a chair beside him, and while Ida engaged fondly on the brilliants sparkling in the buckles of his shoes, he resumed his tale.

"When I went below again, after every thing had become quiet on deck, I found my stageeyed sweet-heart waiting to receive me. How superbly she looked, as she made a movement [illegible] cushions where she had been reclining [illegible] has happened, and what [illegible] noise of guns, and [illegible] ve?

[illegible] have been [illegible] unnately have escaped, and the cries you heard were from one of my poor crew who got slightly wounded by a shot.'

"'Ah, malditos pirentos! cursed pirates!' exclaimed the charming beauty, as she put both her hands in mine, 'and how thankful am I that you are not hurt! But, querido mio! dear one!' she went on, 'when shall we get to Porto Rico and see dear father?' We must be near, for I heard one of your sailors shout to you the name of the Island!'

"In reply, I told her that we had been near Porto Rico, but that—a—circumstances were such, on account of the dangerous pirates who infested those seas, that I felt obliged, for the safety—you understand—to run along down by Hispaniola—she not having a very clear idea of the position and geography of those parts—and that our cruise might probably be prolonged for a few days more."

"And into ruphet, perhaps," said the Doctor, with a hollow voice, and a calm, cold eye.

"Oh no, my friends, certainly nothing so bad as that. Possibly to heaven! but, quien sabe! no one can tell!

"However," pursued the Captain, "I soon succeeded in allaying her apprehensions, and then I threw myself at her feet, and implored her to risk her father's displeasure and to marry me at once; that she knew her father was cold, stern, and obdurate, and should he frown upon my suit, I should die of despair! I used these passionate appeals and many more, until at last the fond girl yielded her consent to my entreaties.

"'But the priest, querido mio!' she exclaimed, as she rose and disengaged herself from my arms. I told her that I chanced to have one on board as a passenger, who would perform the ceremony.

"And so I had," added Captain Brand, "or at least a very near approach to one, for my ugly boatswain, Pedillo, had been bred up—as in scobye—you comprehend—in the house of a rich old prelate of San Paulo Cathedral in Trinidad, to whom Pedillo, one fine morning, gave about eight inches of his cuchilo!"

"Jesus! Maria!" exclaimed Padre Ricardo, starting back with horror, and rolling his beads.

"Ay, mi Padre, Pedillo assassinated the Holy Father, and plundered his cash-box besides; and so you see Pedillo was just the man I wanted."

Don Ignacio nodded his wicked old head through a cloud of cigar smoke, as a sign of approval.

"Accordingly, Señores, the next day I made the trusty Pedillo of the old bony head about his ugly face, and had the crown of his head shaved besides—quite like that round oily spot there on top of good Ricardo's poll; and then he rigged himself out in a clerical gown, to which the trunks of my bride's old mother contributed, and, take my word for it, he was as proper and rascally a looking priest as could be found on the Island of Cuba. He performed the ceremony, too, by way of practice, on Lascar Joe and the second cook beforehand, with as much decorum and solemnity, and gave us pious a benediction, as his old Trinidad uncle the prelate ever did. Well, that evening we were married."

"How many times has the Capitano been married?" grunted out Don Ignacio.

"Why, let me reflect," as he threw his cold, icy look at the frame of miniatures on the opposite wall. "You mean, comadre, how often the ceremony has been performed. Ah! I think on eleven occasions. No; it was only ten. Madame Mathilde had two husbands living when I made love to her, and declined to take a third. But then, you know, I have an affectionate disposition, and I can not set my heart against the fascinations of the sex."

He gave vent to these moral sentiments, as if he really meant them to be believed and generally adopted by his audience.

"Well, that same evening I was married to the beautiful Señorita Lucia Lascena; though I am sorry to say that Pedillo did not perform his part of the business so well as I had expected of him, from his practice in the morning. He stammered a good deal, and when he raised the crucifix to the lips of the young girl, her innocent looks and maidenly majesty of deportment so struck my coadjutor with confusion that he let the crucifix fall to the deck at her dainty feet. This little incident caused me some displeasure; but, reflecting that the poets tell us that 'A tiger, 'tis said, will turn and flee

From a maid in the pride of her purity,'

I said myself nothing to the abashed Pedillo as I gave him back the emblem; but I favored him with a look, with my right hand in my pocket—this fashion."

Here the cold-blooded scoundrel dipped his thumb and forefinger into the flap of his waistcoat, while the commander of the Guarda Costa waved his brown digit before him, as if he knew what was there all the time.

"Ah! that reference to my new-made priest to his senses, and he then got through the ceremony entirely to my satisfaction.

"Heaven forbid," said Captain Brand, turning with lazy indifference toward Padre Ricardo, "ever after this I resolved not to take the risk of such another piece of business; and this is the reason why I first sought your services."

"Gracias a Dios! Thanks be to Heaven, my son, that you found me," said the sacrilegious wretch, as he bowed to his superior and sipped a glass of rum punch.

"At the conclusion of our nuptials, while I held my sweet Lucia to my heart and kissed her pale brow, and while tears of crystal drops, half in rapture and half in sorrow, dimmed her large, sparkling black eyes, she withdrew this royal sapphire from her slender finger, and gently placing the ring on mine—when you see it, amigos—she said:

"'My dear and only love, this is the talisman of my race. It has been for ages in my family, and it has been the guardian of our hope and honor. Receive it, friend of my heart, and be the protector of the young girl who yielded up to you her very soul!'"

The Doctor started as if he had been stung by a scorpion; but Captain Brand, heedless or inattentive to the movement, went on:

"Yes, caballeros, these were her very words; murmured, too, in her low contralto tones with a pure lisping Castilian accent, as she laid her head on my shoulder and sighed.

"Ay, those were rapturous moments; and it was in some degree—yes, I may say in truth—entirely her own fault that they did not last.

"Well, for some days—eight or ten, perhaps—with light baffling winds, we crept stealthily along the south side of St. Domingo; but the weather was delightful, and the time passed on the wings of a zephyr. In the warm, soft evenings, with the moon or stars shedding their pearly gleams over the sea, she sat beside me on the deck of the schooner, watching with girlish interest the white sails above her head, or singing to me the sweet little sequidillas of her native land. And again, starting up from my arms, she would peep over the counter, trace the foam as it flashed and bubbled in our wake, or point to the track of a dolphin as he leaped above the luminous waves and went like a bullet to leeward.

"I flatter myself, caballeros, that there have been periods in my career on the high seas or on land, and may be again, for aught I know"—continued the elegant pirate, as he crossed his legs and screw back the lappels of his velvet coat, so as to expose the magnificence of his waistcoat, and the frills on his broad, muscular chest—"when men of high birth and breeding, and lonely women too of noble lineage, have not thought it beneath them to dine with, or to receive the homage of—a—Captain Brand.

"And, por Dios!"—the narrator did not consider it unbecoming his cloth and profession to swear in a foreign language—"por Dios! Señores, I have known the time, too, when I have played whist with a French prince of the blood and two knights of the Golden Fleece.

"Yes," the Captain went on, "I have every reason to know that I won the hearts, and purses too sometimes, of some of the first people I met in refined society. But yet there have been occasions when the game has gone against me."

Don Ignacio's tenacious memory came into play, and he looked back to the time when he himself had cleaned his profuse friend out of all his gains at the card-table, even to the buttons of his coat, but he gave no sign of remembrance of those days, and only blew a dense cloud of smoke from his thin yellow nostrils as the Captain spoke.

"Though those occasions have not been of frequent recurrence.

"So passed the days, Caballeros; and when one morning the high mountains back of Port Guantamano were reported me, I felt a presentiment that my dream of bliss was drawing to a close. Indeed I might probably have remained at sea a week or two longer, but the men were getting a little impatient, and I thought it better to sacrifice my own pleasure to theirs. That day we caught a cracking breeze out of the windward passage, and toward midnight we came up with this little sandy island here.

"The preparations for going into port excited the anxiety of my bride, for, poor thing! she believed we were bound into Porto Rico, and I had some trouble in inducing her to go below before we crossed the reef. Bueno! the coast was clear, the signals were all right, and in how minutes the schooner had her anchor down and sails furled pretty much in the spot where she now lies moored.

"While, however, we were sweeping up the inlet I sent a boat ahead, with directions for my tidy old housekeeper, Babette, to have every thing prepared to receive her new mistress. Just then one of those terrible thunder-storms came up; heavy masses of clouds obscured the sky, followed by such double-barrel shocks and intensely vivid lightning as is only beheld in the tropics preceding the equinox. The rain was cast along in horizontal sheets driven by a squall which burst in fury over the island, and it seemed to me that all the devils from hell were howling and shrieking in the air.

"Shielded from the storm by a large boat cloak, I carried my beautiful bride, with her face nestling on my breast, to the shore, and then I bore her into this fine saloon.

"I shall never forget the sweet words she whispered, and the loving caresses she gave me on that little journey, even while the tempest almost dashed me to the ground, and the sharp flashes of lightning nearly blinded me. They were the last she ever lavished upon me!"

No sigh escaped the lips of this cold-blooded monster as he uttered these words; no sign of feeling for the ruin of a gentle girl whom he had betrayed to his piratical life of infamy and crime; whose dream of life was destroyed like a crushed rose leaf, and all her hope gone from that moment.

Do you Shave?

We have a private word for our unfortunate masculine brethren; excluding the gentler sex merely because nature has granted them an immunity from the razor, we enfolled on us—shaving. For several years we performed the naututual cutting and slashing operation, facetiously termed shaving, ignorant of aught to ameliorate the rasped condition in which we invariably found our human face divine. One little year since, after reading in every conceivable journal, published in every conceivable place, a succession of cunningly worded advertisements of Eureka's Kalliston, we decided to try the preparation—Harnett's inventor of this balm of Gilead, if we had our way a monument of purest marble should rise to your honor, to be paid for by a tax on barbers' shops! We now rejoice in a smooth skin, and would assume part with our new patent leather boots, than our bottle of Kalliston.—Boston Saturday Express.

A Friend in Need. Try it.

Sweet's Infallible Liniment is prepared from the recipe of Dr. Stephen Sweet, of Connecticut, the great bone setter, and has been used in his practice for the last twenty years with the most astonishing success. As an external remedy it is without a rival, and will alleviate pain more speedily than any other preparation. For all Rheumatic and Nervous Disorders it is truly invaluable, and as a curative for Sores, Wounds, Sprains, Bruises, &c., its soothing, healing and powerful strengthening properties, excite the just wonder and astonishment of all who have ever given it a trial. Over four hundred certificates of remarkable cures, performed by it within the last two years, can be seen at this Rockbridge Alum Springs, Va.

The reputation of these Springs is established throughout Virginia and the South, and is rapidly extending over the whole Union.

The many remarkable cures performed by them in DYSPEPSIA, CHRONIC DIARRHŒA AND DYSENTERY, SCROFULA AND ALL GLANDULAR AND SKIN DISEASES, CHRONIC NERVOUS COMPLAINTS, BRONCHITIS, PILES, &c., have attracted the attention of the most eminent medical men in every section of the country.

Dr. Cartwright, of New Orleans, says: "In truth, I know of no water in Europe or America so rich in medical substances as that of Rockbridge Alum Springs."

Dr. Moorman, resident physician at the White Sulphur: "It is a matter of no little importance that the public should be fully apprised of the remarkable efficacy of the Rockbridge waters, in strumous diseases especially. They have long stood a reproach to our profession, and never, but in these waters, has a remedy been found that deserves the name of a specific for their cure."

Dr. Carter, of Virginia, certifies "that the water is a powerful alterative, acts on the glandular system generally, and possesses great tonic properties."

Rev. Dr. Ruffner: "I have repeatedly used it, and believe the greatest benefit to my general health, I found it peculiarly efficacious in dispelling CUTANEOUS ERUPTIONS, and promoting a healthy action of the skin. No mineral waters that I have ever used had so remarkable virtue in this respect."

Dr. J. A. Minnis, of Greensboro', N. C., says: "I am pleased to state that both the waters are unequaled by any in the world for ulcers, and especially those of a scrofulous nature."

The late Rev. James W. Alexander, D.D., in a letter to the New York Observer, July, 1853, says: "Startling instances of the cure of dyspepsia and chronic diarrhœa are occurring every year. These waters are not a nostrum; everybody sees and knows all about them. They are not a quack medicine; the regular Faculty exhibit them under due guards and cautions. We have felt it to be a duty to increase, so far as we could, the public knowledge of these fountains."

An invalid, writing from Ohio, says: "My dyspepsia, with all its train of horrible nervous symptoms, has been relieved, and effectually and permanently cured."

Another, from North Carolina, writes that, "after exhausting the best medical skill in a case of chronic diarrhœa, it has yielded to the curative powers of the Rockbridge Alum Water."

Our pamphlet is filled with letters of the most eminent physicians, clergymen, lawyers, and all classes of our fellow-citizens, who certify their personal knowledge and experience of the virtues of this water.

The establishment, much enlarged and improved in all its appointments and appliances, is now open to visitors.

It is about ten or twelve hours distant from Washington City, the cars of the Virginia Central Railroad passing within five miles of it. Passengers from the North take the Alexandria boat at Washington City, and from Alexandria by cars to Gordonsville, and thence by the Central Cars to Millboro' Depot, five miles distant; from which point comfortable coaches convey them to the Springs.

Passengers from the South by the seaboard route come to Richmond, and thence by Central cars to Millboro'. Those coming over the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad come to Lynchburg, thence by the new road to Charlottesville, joining at full view of Monticello and the University of Virginia, thence to Millboro'.

The Rockbridge Alum being the first in order of the Virginia Springs reached by the traveller en route for the celebrated White Sulphur, Sweet Springs, &c., &c., is a convenient resting point. We shall try and make it a comfortable one. The Natural Bridge is in this county, thirty miles distant.

Pamphlets sent promptly on application.

A Medicinal Whisky.

As it is almost impossible to get pure Bourbon Whisky, and as it is prescribed so much by physicians, for numerous complaints, we have secured the agency for the Proprietor's bottling of the Kentucky Salt River Bourbon Whisky Distilleries, which are the oldest and most extensive in the State. It is put up by the distiller himself, with his name on each bottle, and comes direct to us from the distillery. We can guarantee to the public to buy this brand of whisky that they are not buying spirits of drugs, labeled Pure Old Bourbon, &c. When you purchase be sure to look for Mr. S. T. SUITS, the distiller's name.

Sold by every druggist in this and the surrounding cities.

IRON IN THE BLOOD.

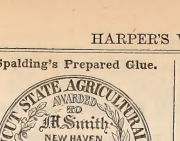
DYSPEPSIA, SCROFULA, GENERAL DEBILITY.

Affections of the Skin.

Headache.

Why is Iron beneficial in disease?
Why is it efficacious in many diseases apparently opposite in their nature?
Why is "PERUVIAN SYRUP," or Protected Solution of Protoxide of Iron combined, better than any other medicinal preparation of Iron?

Since the remarkable cures effected through the Agency of the "PERUVIAN SYRUP" have been made public, the above questions are frequently asked respecting it. They are fully answered in a pamphlet on the "Importance of Iron in the Blood," which can be had on application. The pamphlet contains also numerous certificates of remarkable cures from the following well-known physicians, clergymen and others:



Rev. A. Clark, Rev. John W. Olmsted,
Rev. Warren Burton, Lewis Johnson, M.D.,
Rev. Arthur B. Fuller, Roswell Kinney, M.D.,
Rev. Aug. R. Pope, S. H. Kendall, M.D.,

A Brilliant Oriental Novel.

This Day Published!

EL FUREIDIS.

AN ORIENTAL ROMANCE.

By the Author of

"The Lamplighter."

One volume, neatly bound in Muslin. Price $1.

The unexampled success which attended the publication of "The Lamplighter" and "Mabel Vaughan" will be well remembered. The former of these novels has reached a sale unparalleled by any American novel except one, nearly ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND COPIES having been sold, and universal voice in the United States and in Great Britain has proclaimed these novels among the most brilliant achievements of the day in fiction. The present is a peculiar novel as well in the fascinating Orient; and its power and beauty are such that it will add greatly to the reputation of the author.

NEW YORK.

The valuable advantage derived from these Spectacles is, that vision becoming impaired, is preserved and strengthened; very aged persons are enabled to employ their sight at the most minute occupation, can see with these lenses of a much less magnifying power, and they do not require the frequent changes, to the dangerous effect of further powerful assistance.

Thousands of the most scientific gentlemen of this country and Europe have unanimously pronounced these glasses the best ever made, and we need only to affix the names of some well known in this community to give ample satisfaction. Among the many we have received certificates from, are,

THE JAPANESE EMBASSADORS.

WE publish herewith portraits of the two Japanese ambassadors, Sim'mi Boojsen no-Kami, and Mooragaki Awajsi no-Kami. They are the chiefs of the embassy now at Washington, and have just concluded the ratification of our treaty with Japan.

We are, of course, unable to give a biographical sketch of these distinguished persons. They are both members of the Council of Six, who are understood to administer the Government of Japan, and to hold a rank corresponding to that of Prince in Europe. We glean from the daily papers some gossip about their movements at Washington.

Speaking of the ball at General Cass's, at which they were present, the Tribune correspondent writes:

AT A BALL.

The party visiting the Secretary of State was composed of three Princes, and the five officers next in rank, and the two interpreters. For nearly an hour these ten gentlemen sustained unflinchingly the unaverted gaze of as many scores of people as could draw near to them. Their self-possession then, as it always is, was marvelous. The haughtiest stare, with intensest eye-glass concentration, could neither move them to embarrassment nor zeuss them to the least defiant glance in return. Directly personal remarks—not always uttered, I am afraid, in the best taste, and sometimes unworthy the fair lips whence they proceeded—were listened to by those who perfectly understood them with no sign of discomposure, except perhaps a slight compression of the mouth, showing that insensibility was no cause of their immovable calmness. Toward 11 o'clock the embassadors rose, and were again led through the apartments, pausing before a refection table, the details of which no interpreter was needed to explain to them. The number of guests had now greatly increased. There were present the members of the Cabinet, the Vice-President and Speaker Pennington, a few members of Congress, many officers of the army and navy, and a very full representation of foreign legations. The number of ladies seemed greater than of gentlemen. The least unwary step inguifed one in surging waves of muslin, silk, and those other kindred dangers which evade precise designation. Mrs. Dougbat, Miss Lane, Mrs. Gwin, and Mrs. Slidell were the various central orbs, alluring to themselves countless satellites, seeking from them reflections of fashionable warmth and social light. On their way along the drawing-rooms the Japanese caught sight of Commodore Tatnall, who brought them in the Powhatan from Japan to Panama, and whom they instantly surrounded with every grateful expression of welcome. For the few minutes that Commodore Tatnall was near, all objects beyond offering their recognition of him were abandoned. A [illegible] the embassadors stepped into the dancing-[illegible]ny gravely inspected the agile gyrations [illegible] brave men with an air of curious in[illegible]o concern, as if anxious as to [illegible]rocess so much at variance [illegible]ame subject. After a few more introductions the embassadors, at 11½ o'clock, took leave and returned home.

THEIR COSTUME.

Our picture represents the Japanese in the costume in which they appeared at the official audience. The same writer thus describes it:

The dresses of the Japanese were much more gorgeous than any they had previously appeared in. The first embassador wore robes of blue and purple crape, with richly-embroidered trowsers of silk. The garments of the second and third were of different shades of green, crape and silk, all very curiously wrought. The secondary officers and interpreters were more simply attired. All had, by means of some artificial contrivance, an unusual expanse of shoulder, which gave them an air of patunality they do not at ordinary times possess. The highest dignitaries had peculiar head-dresses, shaped like hollow boxes, and set upon the top of the head, where they were confined by long cords reaching down the sides of the face, and passing under the chin. These head-dresses were black, about five inches high and six long. They were not cubical, but were broad at the front, tapering to a point behind. They appeared to exactly cover the spot left bald upon the head by shaving. The officers next in rank were similar, though smaller, marks of rank.

THE PRESIDENT'S OPINION OF THEM.

The President had a conversation with a letter-writer about them:

Alluding to the Japanese, he said, "They never speak to me without calling me Emperor and his Majesty, and are the most particular people about what they should do. Every thing was written down for them, stating the course they were to take, the number of days they were to make, and all that, before they left Japan. They can't understand me at all. You know they were here in front to hear the band on Saturday. Well, I went down the steps to speak to some of my friends that I saw, and they couldn't understand that at all. To think that I—Emperor of the United States—should go down among and shake hands with the people, astonished them wonderfully. Oh! no, they couldn't understand that at all, so unlike any thing in their country." "How long, Sir, do you think they'll remain in this country?" "Well, I couldn't tell you; they are the queerest people to deal with possible: there's no getting any thing out of them, they're so close about every thing. Maybe they'll remain the hundred days, or perhaps only the sixty. At any rate, they'll have to wait till the Niagara reaches Panama, and she has to go round the Cape this worst season of the year, so that it will take her three months. Ah, there Japanese," he continued, "they're the most curious people I ever saw. They take a note of every thing. They've got down a long description of how I looked when they had the reception, and every thing they've seen—nothing escapes them. They're always sketching and taking notes of things. They're very proud, too, I can see: they bow very low, but they won't do more than is prescribed for them in their instructions."

THEIR GALLANTRY.

A correspondent of the Herald writes:

I omitted to mention in my last letter referring to the visit of the embassadors and suite to the President's grounds on Saturday, that Miss Lane, the President's niece, on that occasion was evidently curious to examine the blade of O'goori Bungo-no-Kami's sword.—For the information of those who may not recognize this gentleman by name, I will state his office to be that of censor or special supervisor to the embassy, and the third highest in rank. O'goori Bungo-no-Kami no sooner comprehended the desire of the lady to unsheath his estamas—such is the name of the larger weapon of the two—than he smiled most graciously, and said in Japanese, "Take it, my lady," at the same time handing it to her most gracefully. She, upon this, drew the glittering blade from its sheath (buff wood, hair leather, with an inlaying of silver), and eyed it woman-like and closely, and then returning it to its sheath, handed it back to its owner, who took it with evident pleasure that the thing of his honor and defence should have excited interest on the part of one so fair.

THEIR RESERVE.

The Times correspondent says:

A good story is told of the peculiar reserve of the Japanese, as illustrated during the recent passage. Up to the time of their arrival at Norfolk, the officers who had them in their charge—the "armory and knavery men," as Mrs. Partington styles them—had been unable to determine their precise rank. It was impossible to determine from their papers whether they were Envoys or Ministers. This vexed question remained unsettled until the arrival of Mr. Lelyard, the agent of the Secretary of State, when, lo! the ambassador astounded every body by producing a beautifully-written English copy of the letter from the Emperor giving them full powers as embassadors.

SIM'MI BOOJSEN NO-KAMI, FIRST EMBASSADOR. MOORAGAKI AWAJSI NO-KAMI, SECOND EMBASSADOR.

THE JAPANESE EMBASSADORS IN THEIR STATE COSTUME.

THE PRESENTS.

The Japanese Embassy has brought several presents of a valuable character to the President of the United States. These were brought to Washington fifteen large boxes, all well filled. Among the presents is the most magnificent and costly fan ever made. It is of Japan ware, and delicately inlaid with pearls and fine gold. It cost $3000. The other presents are said to be superior silk goods, and other articles for which the country is famous. All the articles are unequaled for beauty, cost, and exquisite workmanship.

THE OLDEST PAUPER ON THE TOWN.

And so old Betsey Green is dead!
The oldest pauper on the town;
She who has eaten public bread—
Bread of the most unchanging brown—
For six-and-thirty years.

Old Betsey Green is under sod,
Mixed in with loads of human clay;
No surplced priest appealed to God,
And challenged in the light of day
A waiting crowd to fears.

They wrapped her lifeless, withered form
In the scant sheet wherein she lay;
And while her limbs were lithe and warm
They bore poor Betsey Green away,
Lest she recover breath.

They nailed the county coffin down,
With many jokes on her who died;
And one old pauper on the town,
And only one old pauper cried,
From selfish fear of death.

A gravel-wagon bore the load,
Unwashed, unsuped from mud and mire
The driver jogged o'er the road,
Lest for the pittance of his hire
He gave it too much ride.

And then the three-foot pauper grave—
Unwilling digged by pauper hands—
Where one—half idiot, half knave—
With whined halt, in waiting stands
For Betsey Green who died.

He shovels in the frozen clods,
He chuckles as they rattle down,
And to himself he laughs and nods—
This oldest pauper on the town,
Since Betsey Green is dead.

"I can remember well," he croaks,
"That she was fair as any queen;
And well to do were all the folks
Who were of kin with Betsey Green
The day that she was wed.

"For all the maids in miles about Had set their caps at Robert Green—
The comeliest lad, without a doubt,
The country side had ever seen—
And she the greatest catch.

"And Betsey, she had babes as fair
As though she'd chosen gifts for each;
They had their mother's eyes and hair,
And Robert's wheedling, treacherous speech:
The selfish, greedy wretch!

"He spent the gold her father gave;
He mortgaged all her broad farm lands;
She toiled and watched, to earn and save;
He reaped but his dainty hands,
Or browned his handsome face.

"'Twas well for her, the neighbors said,
When, on one cold, December day,
They found him, in a snow-wreathed bed,
Upon the ice-bound public way,
Fast locked in Death's embrace.

"For Robert loved the liquor can Too well to save his face or life:
The bloated semblance of a man
Was all they brought the stricken wife
From where he late had lain.

"Year after year, by day and night,
Her hands and head were never still.
Her boys were fair, her boys were bright—
Not one of all the six did ill,
In wedding or in gain.

"Still Betsey could not keep away
The spectre who will never wait;
And so, one stern and bitter day,
She stood before the work-house gate,
To beg for pauper fare.

"Time flies! time flies! and Betsey's dead!
And then, next comes my turn to die.
A hundred years were on her head—
Ten years the elder she than I—
How soon shall I be there?"

Again he stamped the frozen ground,
With feeble step and vacant stare;
Cast one long, idle look around,
And left old Betsey lying there,
To wait her God and crown.

Ah, well! poor Betsey's pauper blood
Runs proudly through some purple veins;
No base suspicion taints its flood,
Of this, the worst of earthly stains—
A pauper on the town!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 2, 1860.

THE NOMINATION OF LINCOLN.

THE action of the Republican Convention at Chicago, in preferring WILLIAM H. SEWARD and choosing Mr. Lincoln as its standard-bearer for the ensuing campaign, is the subject of much comment and some controversy in the papers. On one side we hear that Mr. Seward was dropped because he could not carry Pennsylvania. Again, we are told that Mr. Seward was killed by Mr. Horace Greeley, who had conceived a bitter hostility to his former chief on account of certain alleged slights, and notably because Mr. Seward declined to further certain alleged ambitious projects of Mr. Greeley. A third authority affirms that Mr. Seward was passed over on account of the corruptions of the last Legislature of New York, which was controlled by parties who, it was believed, would likewise control Mr. Seward's administration in the event of his election. A fourth opinion is, that the rules and dictatorial manner of many of the Seward managers at Chicago disgusted the Western delegates, who were not prepared to be ordered about by their colleagues; and that when open threats of withdrawing the supplies in the event of Seward's rejection were uttered in the Convention, the pride of the West could not brook the insult, and Mr. Seward's fate was sealed. Finally, many persons seem to think that the Convention could not resist the outside pressure in favor of the claims of Illinois; on the very day the platform was adopted the strength of the rival competitors was tested by a trial of lungs, and the Lincoln men (being backed by the spectators and outsiders) shouted so much longer and louder than the Seward men that the weak members at once discovered that Lincoln was the favorite, and made haste to rally to his support.

Among these reasons for the rejection of the natural head of the Republican party, two will at once strike the reader as being plausible. There seems to be no doubt that the influence of Mr. Greeley was, from first to last, actively employed against Mr. Seward. That such an opponent, with such power, prestige, and skill, must, in such a Convention, have been extremely formidable, can not be questioned. The New York Tribune has been the creator of the Republican party, and is still its great central organ and censor. In respect to actual influence over the political opinions of the members of the Republican party, Mr. Greeley's power is, doubtless, even greater than Mr. Seward's. When that influence was brought to bear earnestly and systematically, against the man who has been considered Mr. Greeley's best friend and patron, it must have been almost irresistible, above all locally and to the very deepest for the cause of Mr. Seward's rejection. How Mr. Greeley came to turn upon his old friend is a matter which is now not publicly to be widely ventilated, and the public will probably know the whole truth before long. Hitherto Mr. Greeley has been generally considered by his friends as actuated by conscientious men, who rose above petty considerations of personal spite and personal aggrandizement; the true story of his desertion of Seward, if truly told, will confirm this impression, and will show that in his action at Chicago he rather played the part of Brutus than that of Judas.

The recent corrupt legislation at Albany must have had great weight with the Chicago Convention. That votes were openly bought and sold last winter at the State capital; that enormous sums were pocketed by a set of money-freely paid to members or their best friends, while other measures were defeated by the same corrupt means, is notorious. It is true that among the corrupt members there were Democrats as well as Republicans; but the latter held the majority in both Houses, and are therefore responsible for their acts. Had the Republicans been honest, no corruption on the part of Democrats could have done mischief. Furthermore, it is in accordance that the most active agents of last winter's corruption at Albany were also the most active friends of Mr. Seward at Chicago, and would presumably have been his most influential friends at Washington, in the event of his election. This consideration must have prevented many from giving him their support.

These two causes appear to be primarily responsible for Mr. Seward's rejection. We may now mention a third. Among the candidates for the nomination Mr. Seward occupied indisputably the highest place. He towered a head and shoulders above all competitors—in experience, in statesmanship, in authority, in influence, in every quality which can fit a man for the Presidency. His rivals were fairly balanced among themselves; he stood alone. None of the minor candidates appeared formidable enough to alarm the others; but all were against Seward. Their obscurity protected them from hostile combinations; his eminence provoked them. It is the old story—our American ostracism—which killed Webster, and has now deprived Seward of the nomination.

THE ITALIAN QUESTION.

GARIBALDI, the soap-boiler of Staten Island, is evidently going to be the Washington of Italian independence. Monarchical policy has prevented our knowing exactly what part was his in the emancipation of Lombardy, Modena, Parma, Tuscany, and the Romagna; we may rest assured that his iron will and noble disinterestedness had not a little to do with the unanimity and lofty patriotism which have induced the citizens of those various Italian States to unite under one Government—and that a monarchy. And now we hear of him where the last battle must be fought—in the dominions of the King of the Two Sicilies. He left Genoa with 2200 men, in three steamers, on 5th May; touched at a friendly port in Tuscany; and before these lines are read our readers will probably be acquainted with the circumstances of his landing in Sicily.

There are now in Italy only two powers which resist the progressive tendency of the age and the cause of Italian unity—these are Rome and Naples. The Pope continues to claim sovereignty over the civil subjects in the northern States of the Church; to assert his divine right to trample and tyrannize the unhappy people who were given over to him by the treaties of 1815; to fulminate excommunications against each and every Christian who does not see the justice of Papal despotism, or the righteousness of the massacre at Perugia. Happily for the cause of humanity, the Pope's disease will bring about its own cure. The people of the Romagna have asserted and will maintain their independence. By-and-by Napoleon will withdraw his troops from Rome, and then the Pope will have to choose between another abdication and submission to the spirit of the age as will satisfy his people. He has neither the means nor the men to resist the impending popular outbreak. The broken-down pinlerry, Lamoricière, who has lately assumed command of his forces, will soon throw up the fruitless task in despair, and retire to his obvious comfortable sinecure. Without foreign interference, the cause of Italy and independence will take care of itself in the States of the Church.

In Naples the case is different. There the King has a large and disciplined army, an adequate exchequer, a navy not to be despised, the prestige of a long reign, and an enormous auxiliary force of lazzaroni and banditti, who are opposed to any improvements in the existing feeble government. In 1849 Naples restored the Pope. In 1850 Naples crushed out liberalism. In 1851, and afterward, Naples filled its dungeons with its best and noblest citizens. Naples—we speak of the kingdom of that name—is the native country of wrongs of all kinds; of highway robbers, mutinous mobs, starving peasantry, dissolute monks, gaping dungeons, bad governors, a spiritless lazzaronisme, a debauched aristocracy, a socialist proletariat, a military despotism, one-sided laws, and a corrupt officials, a universal prostration of all that is noble, and a general upheaval of all that is base in humanity. Still Naples is, alone, nearly free of Italy; and if Italy is to be united independent, Naples must admit the necessity of freedom and independence. Hence Naples is now the natural scene of the decisive conflict. How Naples it must be fought out. Hence it is that we hear of the great champion of Italian liberty setting sail for Sicily.

Time will reveal the result of his expedition; but no one can follow its progress without heartfelt prayers for its success. The defeat of Garibaldi at the present moment would be a blow to the cause of popular liberty throughout Europe. May Providence befriend him!

THE FLOATING DEBT OF THE UNITED STATES.

MR. SHERMAN, of Ohio, and Mr. Morrill, of Vermont, who appear to be the ruling spirits of the House of Representatives in Washington, have framed a new tariff bill, increasing the duties in a protective direction, and providing that the present Treasury Notes shall be funded by the issue of a new Federal stock having twenty years to run. It is not likely that the bill will become a law. Before the Republicans incorporated the protective plank in their platform at Chicago the prospect of the protectionists at Washington was slender enough; since the Lincoln men made that bid for the support of Pennsylvania the fate of the bill in the Senate has been certain. It will not pass. The tariff of 1857 will last, at all events, until the next Congress meets. The question remains—What is to be done with the outstanding Treasury Notes?

Some parties want to have them funded. If they will, recent experience proves that the United States would not get over a premium of one to two per cent. for five per cents.; and should business and railroad building again become active they would not get as much as this. If, afterward, the progress of the country proved as rapid as it was before the crisis, the tariff of 1857 would, in 1863 and 1864, provide a surplus of several millions beyond the wants of Government; and, as was the case under Mr. Pierce, the Treasury Department would be witnessed buying in its bonds before their maturity, at 15 @ 20 per cent. premium.

If, on the other hand, the Treasury Notes be simply extended—as has been the case for a couple of years—in the event of an increase of income from duties they might be retired, without any loan of any kind, in the shape of premiums. We are inclined to think that when the Senate rejects the House tariff bill this alternative will be adopted as the most satisfactory under the circumstances.

THE STEAMSHIP "ADRIATIC."

Now that the summer begins to Europe has commenced, we take pleasure in drawing attention to the magnificent steamship Adriatic, which is plying between New York and Liverpool. She is, as most of our readers will remember, the last of the Collins line, and must have cost over a million dollars. As to size, she is the largest passenger steamer afloat; and thus, notwithstanding her popularity, her passengers are not likely to be crowded together as they are in some inferior vessels. Her speed is proved by the last passage she made; though she was delayed several hours by a gale, she made the run from the Needles to Sandy Hook at Sandy Hook in 9 days and 17 minutes. Her comforts are unsurpassed; she is one of the quickest ships afloat. Her commander, Captain Comstock, is deservedly popular. A passenger on her last voyage writes concerning her performance in that conduct:

"On leaving Southampton we encountered strong headwinds most of the time, and all of the time high sea. Notwithstanding this we reached Cape Race, since which time we have had but about thirty-four hours good weather. The weather was so exceedingly unfavorable that the passengers from the first relinquished all hope of even a decently short passage. But after three or four days' most severe trial, when hope was quite suppressed, by common consent of several old travelers, much the fastest ship that they had ever seen in bad weather. I am satisfied that, to there acquainted with the subject, and also with the difficulties she has encountered, she has presented by her run evidence of the highest power, speed, and triumph over the roughest seas yet known in ocean navigation. Such is the high way honored herself more than if also had made an eight day run in fair weather.

"I have no particular favorites among steamers or ships, but will state that the Persia made her passage in ten days and a fraction on fifty-five tons of coal per day—when the Vanderbilt, about 800 tons less than the Adriatic, burnt 100 tons per day with the whole engineering skill and capital of England into the bargain, trip by trip. She was not considered a fast steamer. Her first trip, before her engines are smooth or her boxes rubbed down, was seventeen days, making a boisterous passage in nine days and seventeen and a half hours, or, as she did yesterday, with twenty-two pounds of steam and fifteen revolutions, 260 miles on 80 tons of coal. I feel proud of the triumphs of my countrymen over haughty Britannia, and of the prospect of this new ship beating the Persia twenty or twenty-four hours before the summer is over."

We have a magnificent engraving of the Adriatic in No. 39 of this Weekly, published September 26, 1857.

THE LOUNGER.

THE PEOPLE POWER.

EVEN a Lounger can not but observe the universal agitation. Everybody is excited in the same intensity every four years, and often enough makes wise and timid men shake their heads and wonder if our institutions can bear such a strain. But such men forget that the appeal to the people is the secret of our security, or else we are all wrong. It is the balsamy of permanent irresponsible governments which inspires our whole system; and as Antæus constantly strengthened himself by touching the earth, so our government must purify itself by a periodical appeal to the people.

Every thing depends upon the character and instincts of the people to whom the appeal is made, the plausible falsehoods of politicians. For the instincts of great masses of people are generally just and generous. They need to speak for themselves, but has found that, in addressing an unprejudiced audience, their sympathy is quite sure to be upon the right side. It is only when they have been caught by representations of interest or selfishness that they cry down the right. Most wise generally be, if not always, incited by intelligent but unscrupulous men, who use the crowd as tools to do what they themselves would not dare to do. And even as often if a speaker, who is both sincere and eloquent, can only gain the ear of a mob he can unquestionably lead them, by a direct appeal to sense of justice. The leaders know this, and their first effort, therefore, is to overwhelm the speaker's voice with a general uproar.

The suspicion against politicians is therefore well founded. The demagogue is the most dangerous man in the world; because he knows the power of popular prejudice, and does not hesitate to appeal to it. Even in what are called governments of the people it is always a few who really govern, and the mass merely follow. For intellectual force and the sway of genius are irresistible; and when a philosopher says that the many are wiser than the few, he can only mean that, as the instincts of men are generally just, the judgment of many is less likely to be warped by special selfish interest than is that the many, as a body, have a peculiar wisdom, is not true. For upon any possible point of positive human knowledge the few are always wiser than the crowd.

Thus it happens that the more we appeal to the people the more surely the exclusive control of the government is taken out of the hands of professional politicians. It has a chance of inoculation of a fresh energy. If it have been wisely administered—that is, for the utmost general benefit—the general voice will confirm it, and the continuation will have a stable force from the fact of that appeal. If the true interest of the many have been disregarded, and they perceive it, they will effect a change. But it is possible for the adroit politician to conceal or obscure this fact, or so to inflame passion that it is overlooked; then the government, whatever it may be, will continue. But no people, instructed as we are, and with no margin to be wrung for party for its expenses, can be always blinded; so that, however hot the debate may be, we may confidently repose upon the popular verdict.

We are evidently to have a lively summer—much music, and of many kinds. But no man who has a grain of sound conviction of the justice and general wisdom of our system will be seriously troubled. There is but one thing that ought to create apprehension, wherever it exists, and that is, the conviction that the people are generally corruptible or corrupted. Whoever believes that deeply trembles, for that is the end of our political life and mission.

PICKING PUBLIC FLOWERS.

DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—As you seem to be a kind of general censor and critic, and as many things which are said to you are here heard by all, they are among the most without any risk of betraying who it is that says them, I want to call your attention to a matter which ought to be corrected, and refer to picking the flowers in the Central Park.

Last Sunday there were several arrests made for the offence, and a great many offenders were unwhipped. I saw one party, in which were two or three children, who plucked as many flowers as they could, and when their parents were reminded of the law and of the fine, "it's only the children!" they said, as if that made any difference. What rights have the children of that woman in the frightful green bonnet with yellow bows and red roses to pick the flowers that belong to every body and not to any one person? It is the most miserably selfish of all acts to destroy, for your personal and momentary gratification, a beauty which is intended for all. There is what I growled about to my cousin Boumby, with whom I was walking, as we passed the ridiculous green bonnet. "Poor children," I said, "and what are the next children who come along to do? And how long are flowers supposed to last when every child that comes by is to pick them?

I hope, Mr. Lounger, that you will talk very plainly about this business, and let every body who derides the Park see how he walks in the Park with or without the "poor children," he is narrowly watched by plenty of people who understand civil rights and mean to maintain them. Last summer it was a matter of general congratulation that the visitors behaved well. They seemed to appreciate the fact that the Park was an enjoyment for all. Keep this before them. Make them remember it all the time, and I have no doubt we shall all behave as we ought.

Perhaps I spoke just now rather hastily of the green bonnet. I did think it was frightful then, although, if it had been a thoughtful, gentle, considerate person who wore it, it might have seemed to me tasteful. For I sometimes think that the beauty of a person's dress depends upon that of the mind.

However, I see that I am growing sentimental; I believe that is what papa calls me whenever I am not saying that twice two make four. So good-by. But please tell me to keep their hands off the flowers in the Central Park. They are for every body—not for any body.

YOURS, in full faith, MARY DOBLEY.

A MODEST QUESTION.

THE fight between Heenan and Sayers was as notorious before it took place as the British war between France and Austria last summer. The Government knew it—all the police knew it—the whole kingdom of red tape was aware of it, and the circumlocution office was unquestionably willing. The fight entered, and had no precise wish at all except that Mr. Sayers's arm was disabled, and Mr. Heenan's eyes were closed. Those gentlemen with a little another turn at it, and satisfy themselves and the world which of the twain is the more enduring and skillful in the high debate. What reason can there possibly be that they should not fight now which was not valid against their fighting at all? Such a reason has been discovered, and all lovers of public decency would gladly rally like to know what it is. The Government has informed Mr. Somebody, who was the referee at the first encounter, that there must not be another. Now the Lounger submits, upon the part of people who can see no profound difference between a birthday in the month of April and the same brutality in the month of June, that a Government, which was as fully aware of the intention in the first month as it can be in the last, consented itself by every reason that it alleges for preventing another meeting between these distinguished gentlemen.

TAKING THINGS AS THEY ARE.

THERE is certainly no more common advice than that we should take men and things as they are. If a man is impressed with the urgent necessity of reformation in public or private affairs

"I swell and his heart throb with some humane hope—dull old fellow the shoulder; "Oh yes, my young friend, all very well; but you'd better take men as you find them."

Or a preacher appeals, in the spirit and words of his master, to people who profess to believe those words—he is unsympathizing, instant, vehement. "Yes, yes, my good Sir," smiles prosperous Insincerity; "but it isn't the Millennium; poor human nature is dreadfully sticky: we'd perhaps better take the world as it is."

Of course, if we take it at all we must take it as it is. And of course it is selfish, and sordid, and short-sighted; and of course it is always easy enough for us all to go to — the abode of the ill-advised.

Shall we therefore all go there? Being weak and selfish, are we to do nothing to grow strong and generosity? Are we to serve the world as we find it? If a man would be, and ought to be, ashamed of himself, if he were to build a house in which grew only burdock and Canada thistles, and lived there for ten years, and then left it growing only burdock and Canada thistles, we ought a man to feel who is born into the splendors, and opportunities, and powers of the world and humanity, and leaves them when he last without the sign of a single effort of his toward any thing nobler than his own ease? What is that terrible parable of the one talent in the napkin but an illustration of this very thing? Who is that wicked and unprosperous servant who wraps his talent in his napkin? Is he a lazy, selfish soul? He is all; he is the most active of men. He is up early and late. He sneers at repose; he pricks himself, and spurs himself, and his workmen. He and the roar of his machinery jars the air. Day and night ships sail for him; and his name is familiar in the remotest isles of the sea. He is at all the schemes, intrigues, and conquests. Who is he? He is dull old Inability and prosperous Insincerity. He is the man who says that all benevolent activity that shakes the world? He is putting his talent in a napkin.

The world, after all, is the Sphinx; and if you do not guess her riddle she will kill you. The streets are full of people who have answered Yes and no. The mark of the fatal claw is on them all. Yet she only asked, "Does your interest lie in being generous, magnanimous, public-spirited, loyal to love, to duty, to conscience, doing as you would be done by—or in selfishness?" It was a very simple question. Of course the man is a hard that few of us could solve. It was a selfishness, we said, but enlightened self-interest? and then we turned to and wrapped up our talent in a napkin.

"Let the world take care of itself; 'tis its own affair. Every man for himself, and the devil take you find them; and remember men are not angels," quoth dull old Inability; and an echo followed his words: "Am I my brother's keeper?"

IMPARTIALITY.

WHAT the Lounger lately said about Irving and Paulding reminds him that there is a very common and very false impression of the word impartiality, to the effect that it is the same thing as the absence of all positive opinion.

Now the word merely describes the state of mind in which only can we form an opinion which may reasonably be guessed to be true. A man faithfully says, "Oh! there's a great deal to be said upon both sides," he hears feels very sure either that the speaker is ignorant of the whole truth, or that he doesn't want to make it up. Moreover, in the case of the most important questions there is not a great deal to be said upon both sides. There is much to be said in favor of selfishness in whatever form it may present itself? The object of an impartial mind is to discover the truth and pronounce it to be selfishness. Then impartiality has done its duty. Then to hesitate and dally upon the plea of impartiality is to be a traitor to it. Then to betray principle in the most cowardly manner.

People who dodge through the world endeavoring to be friendly with all sides, and to avoid that which expresses a strong conviction lest somebody else of an opposite conviction should be troubled; people who slip and slide quietly over all rough places are either those who have an honest, instinctive shrinking from all those differences, or those who glide along, as rascals do, with baskets of rivers, in the slime. Neither class is impartial—one has no opinion from sympathy or cowardice, the other has none from the lowest fear and selfishness. But the Judge who, having heard all sides, declares that the prisoner is guilty, has ceased to be done though the heavens fall," he is impartial.

Hence in every country where public question are decided by public opinion, the duty of impartiality is often called an impartial one. In every important debate there can be, of course, but two sides; and one who is perfectly interested in the subject of difference will inevitably range themselves upon one side or the other. And this is the simplest reason why we will be fair to the other hinder the movement. To say that both sides are indifferent and foolish—that they do not deserve the best thing in the world, which is sincerity to complain that the cars in the train are not as perfect as you could wish. If the cars are going where you wish to go, you are only ridiculous if you remain behind for no better reason than that. Individuals are not always responsible for every action of the mass with which they move. Doubtless there was a great deal of questionable conduct in the Kansas struggle, both in the North and South, and many blunders among the officers; but all who wanted American Independence fought with that army for all that. In this case we deal with men; and we must always consider the necessary limitations and natures of the instruments we work with before we sneer at them and throw them aside as incompetent.

So it is with impartiality. A man who tries to be impartial by not taking a side, is like one who vainly endeavors to stand firmly by balancing now upon one foot, and now upon the other. He stands nowhere, he is foolishly unsteady; and when he cries self-complacently, "This is firmness!" the whole world of earnest workers merely laughs.

THE FINE ART OF ADVERTISING.

THE art of advertising has been almost exhausted. When Coleridge delivered his Shakespeare lectures in London, what kind of audience could have been assembled if he had been announced as the English Plato? "Go and hear the English Plato on Shakespeare! Go and hear the English Plato on Shakespeare! The English Plato speaks to-night on Shakespeare, sir!" Who would have come? Who would not have echoed the first two words of the exhortation, and have given it a distinct refusal?

The question naturally presents itself, why a scholar and orator, gravely discoursing upon some serious subject, should be advertised like a quack nostrum for corns, or a newly-found negro idiot called "What is it?" The people who wish to see both, as an exhibition, have no desire to hear scholars discourse. They would not be entertained.

The Reverend Dr. Scudder delivered some lectures upon India in the early part of the season. The Doctor said his lectures were advertised like a circus and menagerie. It was disagreeable to think of the lecturer's emotions when he saw the manner in which his discourses were announced. People did not believe that they were good because some purveyor or manager said so with a great theatrical flourish, but because they had heard them and told their neighbors. And although, of course, they heard of them, in the first place, from the advertisements, they would be misled by the puffiest rhetoric. Murray could not have puffed Livingstone's travels into the enormous sale they have had if they had not liked them. But he might have hired every column in the London Times, and called the work, in the largest letters, the greatest book of the age, and even written. He would have had his expense for his pains.

Advertising is, of course, the first necessary of a prosperous trade. The people must know that you have something to sell, or they will not come to buy. But the thing is to remember that those people do not buy what you say but what you offer is the finest that ever was or could be. Of course the calicoes of every man who has them to sell are fine calicoes. Of course the horse you are bargaining for is the none-such of the jockey who is selling him. Of course the shoes over the way are not and never were seen resting upon this side of the sole. Of course this novel is the greatest bit of the age. So the publisher paid enormously for the privilege of saying so.

There are certain subjects and men entitled to decent treatment in advertising. Some day we may represent a clown grinning and standing on his head. But you have no right to treat a scholar in that way.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

Did the man who plowed the sea, and afterward planted his feet on his native soil, ever harvest the crops?

An Irish judge said, when addressing a prisoner, "You are to be hanged, and I hope it will prove a warning to you."

Seedsbeggius thinks that instead of giving credit to those who ask it, cash should be given to be paid.

In the window of a shop in an obscure part of London is this announcement: "Goods removed, messages taken, carpets beaten, and other employment on any subject."

"My dear doctor," said a lady, "I suffer a great deal with my eyes."

"Do they hurt, madam," he replied, "you would probably suffer a great deal more without them.

CHARLES. "Chris, did poor little Carlo have a pitch supper?" CHRIS. "No, Charles, he took his bit."

CLARA. "Yes, yes, the little dear. Have you seen Ida lately?"

CHARLES. "No, not exactly; but here's a piece of pink ribbon in the parlor."

The Duke de Duras, observing Descartes seated one day at a luxurious table, cried out,

"What! do philosophers indulge in dainties?"

"Why not?" replied Descartes; "do you think that human genius grows on cod-fish and cabbage?"

Johnson pressed upon old Judge Boswell, father of the illustrious Jamesy, the question what good Cromwell had ever done for the nation. "Why, sir," said Boswell, unmanned by the doctor he spoke out at last: "Fore God, doctor, he made things safe for a man to put in their necks."

THE Rev. P.'s ears one evening recently reeling down to the House of Commons discussing politics as well as theology, and meeting Sydney Smith, he exclaimed, passionately,

"Europe's true balance must not be overthrown!"

to which the other replied,

"Confound Europe's balance—try to keep your own."

An unfortunate married man was very ill used by his Landlord—the rent was due, and nothing was coming in. His friends rallied him upon this, and at last carried him off to dinner, where he could not be called to be master. One day, not long after, his better half saw no better way than himself accompanied to seek shelter under the table. Just at this moment the voices of the friends of the husband were heard. "Come, come out!" cried the wife, fearful of all exposure. "No, no!" cried the husband, in reply, "Come out, sir, dead—not I. I'll allow for once that I am master!"

Some years ago a party of Cambridge philosophers undertook, for a certain object, to ascertain into the very depths of a Cornish mine. Professor Faraday, who was one of the party, was lowered with a candle, amidst the following startling incident of his visit. On his ascent in the mine-shaft, however, by means of the ore, and with a miner for a fellow-passenger, he perceived, as he thought, certain unmistakable symptoms of frailty in the rope. "How often do you change your ropes, my good man?" he inquired, when about half-way from the bottom of the awful abyss. "We change them every three months, Sir," replied the man in the bucket: "and we shall change this one to-morrow, if we get up safe."

WHICH IS JOHN?—"What's that a picture of?" said a countryman the other day to an itinerant print-seller, who was turning over some engravings. "That, Sir," who was turning over some engravings. "That, Sir," said the Seller, "is Jo-hua commanding the sun to stand still." "Well, which is Josh, and which is his son?" said the countryman.

Wigs may dale in England from King Stephen's time; and it was probably at this period that polite ears were first fastened to the head of a spectator. I have no doubt people made no scruple about owning that they wore them very readily, as a small fee was required of a hitched, which, to please the antiquarians, we may find room to quote:

"Alle aroundе my pedre ic bear a brotune bigge O!

A GRACE FOR HUNGRY FOLKS.—Breakfastus Benedicat.

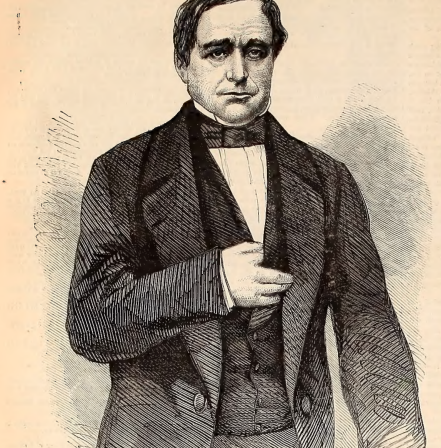
Two dandies were, some time ago, taken before a Dublin magistrate charged with "swindling to the tune of £5." The justice, who was a shrewd and waggish man, had many similar cases to try, the really guilty parties of either of the professed belligerents; so he dismissed them upon a promise "not to carry the swindle further." but added, "Gentlemen, I let you off this time; but, upon my conscience, I don't know which of you is the worst, for I don't know yet which of you has been the greatest fool."

Old Bachelor Sneer would like to know what kind of a broom the young woman in the last new novel used when she swept down the cobwebs from the parlor ceiling.

THE CEREMONY OF OUR HATS.—Truefitt, the West-end hair-dresser, upon being asked what hair was the richest, replied, quite in an off-hand manner, "Why, golden, Sir; in every sense, Sir, there's none so rich as the plain golden." A gentleman overheard another, and said, "I see hops you're right, Truefitt. It stands to reason, you know, that what shines like gold must be rich; and what any hair which is simply plated." Truefitt acquiesced, but was annoyed by the liberty which had been taken of his proposition. He retired into his studio to ponder over it.

A young lady having asked a gentleman the size of his neck, he sent the following:

"The size of my neck I don't remarkably strange,
And admits of a very significant range;
A neck-lace of pearls, a sore throat, a halter,
And others—enough to make a man falter.
You know what shirts I like, and what not,
The length of your arm will just go round my neck."
It is needless to say he got the shirts.



As exchange has the following, as an excellent system of gardening for ladies: Make up your beds early in the morning; sow buttons on your husband's shirts; water your flowers with perseverance; prune the young and tender branches of your family; plant a smile of good temper in your face; carefully root out all angry feelings, and expect a good crop of happiness.

FASHIONABLE CHARITY.

YOUNG LADY (to Sister of Charity). "Sister Agnes, Mrs Gaunt is below, and would like the money for the last charity-concert. Can you pay her now?" "I know it, Sir," replied the droll, and gravely proceeded—"To-morrow will be the anniversary of the parish church, St. Andrew's Holborn, a charity sermon, for the benefit of a number of poor boys, will be preached, and a collection for the orphans will take place at the close." "Exactly, Sister," replied the young lady, "I'll be sure to remember." "I don't know," responded a wag, "but, judging from the effect he produces, I should suppose him a nonsuch her of the Press."

A word of kindness is seldom spoken in vain. It is a seed which, even when dropped by chance, springs up a source of joy.

A very fat man having taken a seat in an omnibus, already crowded to the great annoyance of the passengers, several, with partial breathing and muttering figs, inquired who such a lump of flesh as the new-comer could be. "I don't know," responded a wag, "but, judging from the effect he produces, I should suppose him a nonsuch her of the Press."

JAPANESE WHITTLINGS.

Ten Major Jack Downing, Downingville, Downing County, State ov Maine, in care of Mister Harper; who'll print it.

WASHUSTEN, May 22, 1860.

I TOLD yeou last weak, dear Uncle Jack, that I'd let yeou awl kno about the Jappyknees, the President having got me tew be his rite-hand man in point ubeout with 'em. And as Mistur Harper's had his artists hear, a sketchin' and a drawin' awl that's ben dun, why yeou'll know jist as much abeout it tew Downingvill as if yeou was hear, without eony bills tew pay. P'raps, as it's a long storry, the printurs will sort ov cut it up with little signs, saw that yeou can pick eout the part yeou like best furst. Hear goes:

THE PRESENTATION.

A Thursday the sun roze brite and yearly, and new did ev tew the White House, for the Jappyknees wos a comin' in grate stait. Ev'ry thing wos in apple-pi ordur, and the Cabbynit wos awl reddy, and the membars of Kongress begun tew cum. They brot thair wives tew, and 'twos esy tew see that repulsin' that air hill agin pollyglammy in this Desstrect has maid it a Salt Lake. Why, ev'ry membur had at leste three wives on an average—sum on 'em hornely as thunder, and sum nice eend tew eat. Then cum the offisurs, headed bye Ginneral Scott and ended by a West Pintur, and shew the navy officurs, a-gilded on thair cuffs and trowsurs saw that the memburs ov Congress thort they hadn't ought tew have enny more pay.

Jist then Mischief cum and told me that the reporturs wos eout in the cold, and I met John Cochran, and he sed the same, and in wo went tew the President, who wos a tyin' a not in a white cravat. I tell yeou, the way that air Nu Yorker lade deown the law warn't slow, and the President sed I "let 'em cum." This wos rite. The people pay the bills of this sho, and they warnt tew kno jist wot is a goin' on, and Mister Harper sketchur is the wun tew shu them hrow 'is dan.

If yeou'd a seen the processhun in which they cum, a 'scorted bye the marcens, with their grate band in red flannel a tootin' away like fun! The sogers marched in tew rows, kind ov spraddled eout, and between them was the Jappyknees, in open-backs, wun in a hack with an naval offisur. Each side on 'em marched their staff-offisurs, I s'pose, for each wun kerry'd a staff, jist like the wardens in St. Jubulo's Loge ov Freemasons tew a deddercashun. On wun staff was a flag, on another a bowy-knife, on another an ax, and sew on.

Wen they got tew the White House, and in the entry, these fellers formed in tew lines, inward fare, opin ranks, and wen the dipplermats walk'd threw they nealed deown and presentel arms—I mene staffs. Between yeou and eye, Uncle Jack, wot wou'd Ginneral Jackson hav sed tew hav had human beins a nealing deown in the White House?

Awl this tyme the east room was a gittin' packed like figs with membars of Kongress and memburs' wives. The army and the navy offisurs had jist as much as they could hew tew keep a place oppen in frunt ov the dore. The wives of the memburs stud up on chares, and wun or tew got clean up on the mantel-peaces, a displayin' dimunity orphuilly.

THE INTERVIEW.

In cum the President, with his cabbynet, and stud facin' the dore—offisurs on each side ov him—behind them lots and cords of memburs of Kongress and a grate menny more of thair wives. Ginneral Cass went eout, and in he cum with the Jappyknees. How I wish yeou could hav seen 'em.

They looked for awl the wurld like little old lady's dressed up tew kill, with queer littel things tide on there heds, and tew sords stuck in every feller's belt, which raxed up when they bowed deown like the tale fethers ov a cockerill. They cum a salein' in, dancin'-scule fashun, forrard tew —bow—forrard tew—bow—forrard tew—bow! And each time they bow'd Mr. Buckennan he bowed, and awl looked sereus as meetin'-time, only wun gurl up on a chare back saw a fellur lookin' at her pantwiletts, and sed, sez she, "Shu!" and av'ry boddy, and the gurl look'd ashamed, and the fellur didn't look tuther weigh.

Then a little Jappyknee or interpreate habits—a Prince ov Boozy they calls him —takes a papur box, and keeps a opinin' boxes eout on it, and takes eout of the innermost box a tresty, and giv it tew the President. He giv it tew Ginneral Cass, and then the led Jappyknee begun tew wunbul eout wot he had tew say. This wos translerated by the medium of Dutch, wich ain't equal tew spirit-rapin'. The grate mas of spectaturs, not bein' abel tew see, got impashent.

When the President had herd it awl, and wos a clerin' his throte tew reply, eat they saled, stars forst, a bowin'—a retretin' tew steps—a bowin'—and sew eout. We wunder'd wot in king was the mattur, and the navy offisurs sed sumthin' abeout eatsupet, when in thay cum, a-kitein'. The Dutch 'turpreter sed thay warnted tyme tew let the President recover from the 'fect ov wot they had sed; but he didn't seam tew mind it a pin, and I thort he looked as tho' he wished 'twos over.

Wa'al, in they sayled agin, and then the President he had his say, wich wos strayned thru tew 'turpeturs afore they understud a wurd. Folks thort 'twos orphul sollum, but I slipped eout, and went down stares, whair the kitchin cabernet wos a entertainin' the millertery wile the President's cabbernet wos a bein' interdooced tew the Jappyknees, and the sho wos bein' hapserly concluded. The reglur trupes, that's fed on bones and a little mete, thort a good dele more ov the eatables deown stares than the peopul did up stares that cudn't see nor here a thing. But it wos a grate event, the Count Von Videpocke, wun ov the Uropean dippelomatters, sez it wos orful tew have spectaturs thair, 'speshally the ladys. But I didn't think sew, no more did the feller who had a peap at the pantuchirk.

DINNER WITH THE JAPANESE.

A Friday I wos asked tew dine with the Jappyknees, and you'd better beleeve I went. The fore big buggs ate bay themselves, but the other sixteen ate with the offisurs, in a room Mr. Willard had fixed up apurpes. I wos disexpirited in thare weigh, for they used thare nives and forks jist like we dew. Rice seams tew be thare favrit provindur, and when fride chicken is biled in it they likes it best. Then they ates eggs—in omelets, fride, biled, pocked, or roosted. They don't say no tew champain, but sort ov keep watch on each uther, like the Suns ov Temperance. They take long drinks, tew, wen they git a chance.

After dinner I went tew the room of Squire Naurase Genisioro—wot a naim! He's a sort of Brigaid-Major tew the Prince ov Boozy and the crowd, and speker English sort ov tollerbis well. He sho'd me a little book in which a Jappynee had pictur'd eout awl the Americans thay'd seen, and 'twos funny, I tell yeou, o'enamost beatin' the picturs on the last paig of Mistur Harper's paper.

GENERAL CASS'S BALL.

That nite Genneral Cass grin a ball, and we awl went, dressed aweigh up, only the ladys' wos dressed aweigh down. Yeou couldn't move a step without a trollin' on sumbuddy's silk gourn, and nary geown wa'nt up on the neck and shoulders—orphul scrawny sum wos tew. Yeou'd ort tew hav seen the Jappyknees look; and wen thay begun tew wawlz thay look'd as tho' sum of the gals mite fly—wa'l tew peeces, and that'd liks tew scar 'em. Then wen party gals cum and smyi'd, and sed tew the 'terpeturs, "Ask him tew danse with me?" an' look'd lesseshis' like till 'twas told. 'Twos orphul tantyhain', I tell yeou, and sum ov 'em look'd as tho' they'd like tew take off thare baggy trowsurs (puttin' on others, ov coarse), and chainge thare clumsy shuse fur Congress butes, and take wun ov the party gals who stud thare like lamnuns tew go in and be squeez'd. Littel Count Videpocke worn't know where, and he sed, seys he, "Sare, I sink se Japonais be von gra-n-d-and boombug!" I thort tew myself, but didn't say so, "You're a little humbug, and eclipse, yung forrynur," But wen he got tew the chicken sallad and the champain he got better natur'd, and wen the Jappynees went hum "early tew bed," he shose agin. I left hym in the Germus bollibun, abeout tew o'clock, a whirlin' areound like plum.

OPEN-AIR CONCERT AT THE PRESIDENT'S GROUNDS.

So far, the Jappyknees had seed me, and the President, and other dignitaries; but a Saterdy they seed the peopul. The President had the Maseen band cum tew his frunt yard behind the White House, and they and the feaming plaid tew hours putty steddy—the founting not spouting much water, and the band a tooting eout music mastavly slim. The Jappyknees wos on the porch, and I and the President, Guv'nur Toucey, Kurnul Hardee, and others, wos thare, with Miss Lane, who looked purty enuff tew eet, and wos dressed up nice as a nu pin, with a vale on top ov her hed.

P.S.—We're a tryin' tew straten up things for Baltermore, but it's hard tew get the train that switched off the Demmercratic track tew Charleston fur Richmund, with Yancey fur conductur, tew kick on agin, and cum inter Baltermore with the rest. But General Cushin' ses he'll have a leadur a horseback, and that the "Gutlris Greys" will fall inter line with the "Giasl Grenadiers," the "Hunter Horse Guards," and the "Fire-eating Fusileers." TOMMY.

We give below a portrait of the Japanese Tommy, who is such a favorite just now at Washington. Tommy is one of the attendants upon the Embassadors—a sharp, active, intelligent little fellow, he has already picked up a good many English words. Tommy was at first a great pet of the ladies; but some one having persuaded him that hoops and their superstructure were "solid," he made an attempt to verify the matter the other day, and since then the ladies are rather shy of him.

THE TORNADO AT CINCINNATI—THE ROOF OF THE OFFICE OF THE "CINCINNATI COMMERCIAL" BLOWN OFF.—[FROM A SKETCH BY GEORGE M. FINCH, ESQ.]

THE TORNADO AT CINCINNATI.

We engrave herewith, from a drawing by Mr. Finch, of Cincinnati, a picture of the unroofing of the Commercial building at Cincinnati by the gale of 21st ult. The Gazette of Cincinnati says:

"One of the most terrific tornadoes ever known visited our city yesterday afternoon between three and four o'clock, which resulted in the complete demolition of a large number of buildings, the partial destruction of churches and hundreds of dwelling-houses, the death of four men in the city and of two by drowning in the river, injury of several women and children, and unprecedentedness destruction generally.

"The new Commercial Office Building, at the northeast corner of Race and Fourth streets, was one among the thousands which suffered. The cornice of the building was zinc, and the roof sheet-iron; but, like a piece of paper, they were ripped from their places, and scattered for a distance of one square. The compositors of the office were at work at the time, and the first intimation they had of the fury of the gale was the absence of the roof and the clattering of bricks and mortar about their heads.

"A large quantity of bricks and timbers, displaced from the Commercial Building, fell upon the skylight of the building adjoining, and passed through each story into the cellar, occasioning in its transit a large amount of damage. This building was occupied by Misses Baleds, milliners, Mrs. W. J. Johnston as an ice-cream saloon, and Ball & Thomas as a Daguerrean gallery. A lady of the name of Vesey, who had entered the refreshment department of Mrs. J., was quite severely injured by some of the falling rubbish. Several of the stewards were also badly injured; they were taken to the Commercial Hospital, and an examination of their wounds showed that one of them was in a critical situation."

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

LADY GLYDE'S recollection of the events which followed her departure from Blackwater Park began with her arrival at the London terminus of the Southwestern railway. She had omitted to make a memorandum beforehand of the day on which she took the journey. All hope of fixing that important date by any evidence of hers or of Mrs. Michelson's must be given up for lost.

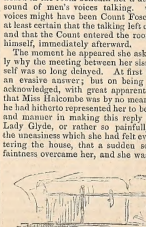
On the arrival of the train at the platform Lady Glyde found Count Fosco waiting for her. He was at the carriage door as soon as the porter could open it. The train was unusually crowded, and there was great confusion in getting the luggage. Some person whom Count Fosco brought with him procured the luggage which belonged to Lady Glyde. It was marked with her name. She drove away alone with the Count, in a vehicle which she did not particularly notice at the time.

Her first question on leaving the terminus referred to Miss Halcombe. The Count informed her that Miss Halcombe had not yet gone to Cumberland, after-consideration having caused him to doubt the prudence of her taking so long a journey without some days' previous rest.

Lady Glyde next inquired whether her sister was then staying in the Count's house. Her question of the answer was confused, her distinct impression in relation to it being [illegible] ...ered he was then taking her ... Lady Glyde's experience ...limited that she could ... what streets they left the station, and they never passed any gardens or trees. When the carriage stopped it stopped in a small street behind a spacious square, in which there were shops and public buildings and many people. From these recollections (of which Lady Glyde was certain) it seems quite clear that Count Fosco did not take her to his own residence in the suburb of St. John's Wood.

They entered the house and went up stairs to a back room, either on the first or second floor. The luggage was carefully brought in. A female servant opened the door, and a man with a beard, apparently a foreigner, met them in the hall, and with great politeness showed them the way up stairs. In answer to Lady Glyde's inquiries the Count assured her that Miss Halcombe was in the house, and that she should be immediately informed of her sister's arrival. He and the foreigner then went away and left her by herself in the room. It was poorly furnished as a sitting-room, and it looked out on the backs of houses.

She was left here alone for a considerable time—for so long that she began to feel very uneasy. The house was remarkably quiet; no footsteps went up or down the stairs—she only heard in the room beneath her a dull, rumbling sound of men's voices talking. One of the voices might have been Count Fosco's. It was at least certain that the talking left off suddenly, and that the Count entered the room again, by himself, immediately afterward.



The moment he appeared she asked anxiously why the meeting between her sister and herself was so long delayed. At first he returned an evasive answer; but on being pressed he acknowledged, with great apparent reluctance, that Miss Halcombe was by no means so well as he had hitherto represented her to be. His tone and manner in making this reply so alarmed Lady Glyde, or rather so painfully increased the uneasiness which she had felt ever since entering the house, that a sudden sensation of faintness overcame her, and she was obliged to ask for a glass of water. The Count called from the door for water and for a bottle of smelling-salts. Both were brought in by the man with the beard. The water, when Lady Glyde attempted to drink it, had so strange a taste that it increased her faintness, and she hastily took the bottle of salts from Count Fosco and smelled at it. Her head became giddy on the instant. The Count caught the bottle as it dropped out of her hand, and the last impression of which she was conscious was that he held it to her nostrils again.

From this point her recollections were found to be confused, fragmentary, and difficult to reconcile with any reasonable probability.

Her own impression was that she recovered her senses later in the evening; that she then left the house; that she went (as she had previously arranged to go at Blackwater Park) to Mrs. Vesey's; that she drank tea there; and that she passed the night under Mrs. Vesey's roof. She was totally unable to say how, or when, or in what company she left the house to which Count Fosco had brought her. But she persisted in asserting that she had been to Mrs. Vesey's; and, still more extraordinary, that she had been helped to undress and get to bed by Mrs. Rubelle! She could not remember what the conversation was at Mrs. Vesey's, or whom she saw there besides that lady, or why Mrs. Rubelle should have been present in the house to help her.

Her recollection of what happened the next morning was still more vague and unreliable. She had some dim idea of driving out (at what hour she could not say) with Count Fosco, and with Mrs. Rubelle again for a female attendant. But when and why she left Mrs. Vesey she could not tell; neither did she know what direction the carriage drove in, or where it set her down, or whether the Count and Mrs. Rubelle did or did not remain with her all the time she was out. At this point in her sad story there was a total blank. She had no impressions of the faintest kind to communicate—no idea whether one day or more than one day had passed—until suddenly in a strange place, surrounded by women who were all unknown to her.

This was the Asylum. Here she first heard herself called by Anne Catherick's name; and there, as a last remarkable circumstance in the story of the conspiracy, her own eyes informed her that she had left Anne Catherick's clothes on. The dress, on the first night in the Asylum, had shown her the marks on certain folds of her underclothing as it was taken off, and had said, not at all irritably or unkindly, "Look at your own dress on your own clothes, and don't worry us all any more about being Lady Glyde. She's dead and buried, and you're alive and hearty. Do look at your clothes now! There it is, in good marking-ink; and there you will find it in all your old things which we have kept in the house—Anne Catherick, as plain as print!" And there it was, when Miss Halcombe examined the linen her sister wore, on the night of their arrival at Limmeridge House.

"MR. FAIRLIE DECLARED, IN THE MOST POSITIVE TERMS, THAT HE DID NOT RECOGNIZE THE WOMAN," ETC.

Such, reduced to plain terms, was the narrative obtained from Lady Glyde, by careful questioning, on the journey to Cumberland. Miss Halcombe abstained from pressing her with any inquiries relating to the horrors of the Asylum, her mind being but too evidently unfit to bear the trial of reverting to them. It was known, by the voluntary admission of the inmate of the mad-house, that she was received there on the thirtieth of July. From that date until the fifteenth of October (the day of her escape) she had been under restraint, her identity with Anne Catherick systematically asserted, and her sanity, from first to last, scientifically denied. Facilities less delicately balanced, constitutions less tenderly organized, must have suffered under such an ordeal as that. No mind could have gone through it and come out of it unchanged.

Arriving at Limmeridge late on the evening of the fifteenth, Miss Halcombe wisely resolved not to attempt the assertion of Lady Glyde's identity until the next day.

The first thing in the morning she went to Mr. Fairlie's room, and, using all possible precautions and preparations to forestall a shock, told him in so many words that his niece had returned to the house. He declared, in the most positive terms, that he did not recognize the woman, and would not see her. Miss Halcombe left the room, and sent the servant to say that Lady Glyde was waiting to see her uncle. Mr. Fairlie, in a state of the most violent irritation, declared that he would not see Lady Glyde, that she was in Cumberland, and that he would write to Mr. Gilmore, the family solicitor, to say so of removing her at once from the place of all others that was now most dangerous to her—the neighborhood of her own home.

An immediate return to London was the first and wisest measure of security which suggested itself. In the great city all traces of them might be most speedily and most surely effaced. There were no preparations to make—no farewell words of kindness to exchange with any one. On the afternoon of that memorable day of the sixteenth Miss Halcombe rowed her sister to a last exertion of courage; and, without a living soul to wish them well at parting, the two took their way into the world alone, and turned their backs forever on Limmeridge House.

They had passed the hill above the churchyard, when Lady Glyde insisted on turning back to look her last at her mother's grave. Miss Halcombe tried to shake her resolution; but in this one instance tried in vain. She was immovable. Her dim eyes lit with a sudden fire, and flushed through the veil that hung over them; her wasted fingers strengthened, moment by moment, round the friendly arm by which they had held so listlessly till this time. I believe in my soul that the Hand of God was pointing their way back to them, and that the most innocent and the most afflicted of His creatures was chosen, in that dread moment, to see it.

They retraced their steps to the burial-ground, and by that act sealed the future of more than lives.

III.

This was the story of the past—the story so far as we knew it then.

Two obvious conclusions presented themselves to my mind after hearing it. In the first place, I saw darkly what the nature of the conspiracy had been; how chances had been watched, and how circumstances had been moulded to insure impunity to a daring and an intricate crime. While all details were still a mystery to me, the vile manner in which the personal resemblance between the Woman in White and Lady Glyde had been turned to account was clear beyond a doubt. It was plain that Anne Catherick had been introduced into Count Fosco's house as Lady Glyde; it was plain that Lady Glyde had taken the dead woman's place in the Asylum—the substitution having been so managed as to make innocent people (the doctor and the two servants certainly, and the owner of the mad-house in all probability) accomplices in the crime.

The second conclusion came as the necessary consequence of the first. We three had no mercy to expect from Count Fosco and Sir Percival Glyde. The success of the conspiracy had brought with it a clear gain to those two men of thirty thousand pounds—twenty thousand to one, to the thousand to the other, through his wife. They had that interest, as well as other interests, in insuring their impunity from exposure; and they would leave no stone unturned, no sacrifice unattempted, no treachery untried, to discover the place in which their victim was concealed, and to part her from the only friends she had in the world—Marian Halcombe and myself.

The sense of this serious peril—a peril which every day and every hour might bring nearer and nearer to us—was the one influence that guided me in fixing the place of our retreat. I chose it in ` far East of London, where there were f `le people to lounge and look about ` streets. I chose it in a poor ne `hborhood—because the hard ` `ence among the men a` `s the chance of th` `pains to not` `them. T` `; never touched our little fund except in Laura's interests and for Laura's sake.

The house-work, which, if we had dared trust a stranger near us, would have been done by a servant, was taken on the first day, taken as her own right, by Marian Halcombe. "What a woman's hands are for," she said, "early and late these hands of mine shall do." They trembled as she held them out. The wasted arms told their sad story of the pain she burned up in the sleeves of the poor plain dress that she wore for safety's sake; but the unquenchable spirit of the woman burned bright in her eyes yet. I saw the big tears rise thick in her eyes and fall slowly over her cheeks as she looked at me. She dashed them away with a touch of her old energy, and smiled with a faint reflection of her old good spirits. "Don't doubt my courage, Walter," she pleaded; "it's my weakness that cries, not me. The house-work shall conquer it, if I can't." And she kept her word—she victory was won when the day was ended, and she sat down to rest. Her large steady black eyes looked at me with a flash of their bright firmness of by-gone days. "I am not quite broken down yet," she said; "I am worth trusting with my share of the work." Before I could answer, she added in a whisper, "And worth trusting with my share in the risk and the danger too. Remember that, if the time comes!"

I did remember it when the time came.

As early as the end of October the daily course of our lives had assumed its settled direction, and we three were as completely isolated in our place of concealment as if the house we lived in had been a desert island, and the great net-work of streets and the thousands of our fellow-creatures all round us the waters of an illimitable sea. I could now reckon on some leisure-time for considering what my future plan of action should be, and how I might arm myself most securely at the outset for the coming struggle with Sir Percival and the Count.

I gave up all hope of appealing to my recognition of Laura, or to Marian's recognition of her, in proof of her identity. If we had loved her less dearly, if the instinct implanted in us by that love had not been far more certain than any exercise of reasoning, far keener than any process of discussion, even we might have hesitated on first seeing her. The outward changes wrought by the suffering and the sorrow of the past had fearfully, almost hopelessly, strengthened the fatal resemblance between Anne Catherick and herself. The altered mind—of events at the time of my residence at Limmeridge House I have recorded, from my own observation of the two, how the likeness, striking as it was when viewed generally, failed in many important points of similarity when tested in detail. In those former days, if they had both been seen together, side by side, no person could for a moment have mistaken them one for the other—as has happened often in the instances of twins. I could not say this now. The sorrow and suffering which I had once blamed myself for associating, even in passing thought with the future of Laura Fairlie, had set their profaning marks on the youth and beauty of her face; and the fatal resemblance which I had once seen and shuddered at seeing, in idea only, was now a real and living resemblance which asserted itself before my own eyes. Strangers, acquaintances, friends even, who could not look at her as we looked, if she had been shown to them in the first days of her rescue from the Asylum, might have doubted if she were the Laura Fairlie they had once known, and doubted without blame.

The one remaining chance, which I had at first thought might be trusted to serve us—the chance of appealing to her recollection of persons and events with which no impostor could be familiar, was proved, by the sad test of our later experience, to be hopeless. Every little caution ` `at Marian and I practiced toward her; every ` remedy we tried to strengthen and steady ` `e weakened, shaken faculties, was a ` `t in itself against the risk of turning ` `k on the troubled and the terrible ` `former days which we ven- ` `to recall, were the lit- ` `that happy time at ` `ere and taught ` `t those re- ` `of the ` `the ` `enough in the morning for ` `er walk as usual, and ` `at her drawing after- ` `th a new anxiety ` `oom, and her ` `old way. ` ` drawing, Walter, when you are not here to help me."

"I shall soon be back, my dear darling—soon be back to see how you are getting on."

My voice faltered a little in spite of me. I forced myself from the room. It was no time then for parting with her self-control which might yet serve me in my need before the day was out.

As I opened the door I beckoned to Marian to follow me to the stairs. It was necessary to prepare her for a result which I felt might sooner or later follow my absenting myself openly in the streets.

"I think, in all probability, be back in a few hours," I said; "and you will not be sorry, as usual, to let no one inside the doors in my absence. But if my return be happy——"

"What can happen?" she interposed, quickly. "Tell me plainly, Walter, if there is any danger, and I shall know how to meet it."

"The only danger," I replied, "is that Sir Percival Glyde may have been recalled to London by the news of Laura's escape. He is not aware that he had me watched before I left England; and that he probably knows me by sight, although I do not know him."

She laid her hand on my shoulder and looked at me in anxious silence. I saw she understood the serious risk that threatened us.

"It is not likely," I said, "that I shall be seen in London again so soon, either by Sir Percival himself or by the persons in his employ. But it is barely possible that an accident may happen. In that case, you will not be alarmed if I fail to return punctually to you will satisfy any inquiries of Laura's with the best excuse that you can suggest. If I find the least reason to suspect that I am watched, I will take good care that no spy follows me back to this house. Don't doubt my return, Marian, however it may be delayed, and fear nothing."

"Nothing!" she answered, firmly. "You shall not regret, Walter, that you have only a woman to help you. She paused, and detained me for a moment longer. "Take care!" she said, pressing my hand anxiously—"take care!"

I left her and set forth to pave the way for discovery—the dark and doubtful way, which began at the lawyer's door.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, May 21, in the Senate, Senator Cameron presented a petition from citizens of Pennsylvania in relation to the Japan Treaty, praying that he should seize an early occasion to press the subject. The bill for the more effectual suppression of the slave-trade having been called up, Senator Wilson explained its provisions. The Davis resolutions were then taken up, which were reported by Senator Toombs.——In the House, the message from the President relative to the Japan Treaty was received. Mr. Montgomery moved a resolution that the House adjourn sine die on the 28th inst. Mr. Sherman moved as an amendment the substitution of June 18, which prevailed, the resolution was adopted. The Senate Homestead bill was then taken up, and the substitution of the original bill of the House was carried by a vote of 104 to 39, and the bill returned to the Senate. The bill to increase the pay of officers of the Navy was passed.

On Tuesday, May 22, in the Senate, a Committee of Conference was appointed on the Consular and Diplomatic bill. Senator Hale resumed his remarks upon the Davis resolutions. Senator Davis. Senator Bingham replied to Senator Douglas. Senator Pugh followed in reply to Senator Benjamin, defending the Illinois Senator.——The House Committee on Elections reported in regard to the Missouri contested seat, declaring in favor of Mr. F. P. Blair. A message was received from the President announcing the arrival of the Resolute at Key West with more rescued Africans, making an average of 1000 settled in that state, and invoking the instant action of Congress with regard to the disposition to be made of them. In Committee of the Whole upon the Appropriation bill, Mr. Pryor moved, unsuccessfully, to terminate the operation of the Gag Rule for reporting matters of amendment limiting the reports to speeches on order, and excluding those not delivered. Debate followed.

On Wednesday, May 23, the President transmitted to the Senate a message relative to the capture of more negroes by the United States steamer Wyandotte, off the Isle of Pines. The Republican papers received a bill relative to the treatment of the slaves which have been landed at Key West, and ask for its immediate consideration. Senator Brown objected, and it was laid over under the rule. A resolution was adopted, calling upon the Secretary of War for information regarding the sale of the Fort Snelling Reservation. The amendments of the House to the Navy Pay Bill were concurred in. Then Senator Davis' resolutions came up. Senators Wigfall and Doolittle spoke on them, and the Senate adjourned.

In the House, Mr. Forney's bill was discussed. In the House without action. In Committee of the Whole the Appropriation Bill was debated, and amended so as to omit appropriation for the auxiliary guard. When the Committee had reported, a call of the House was made, and an adjournment followed.

On Thursday, May 24, in the Senate, the bill providing for the return to Africa of the negroes rescued from the slavers Williams and Wildfire was passed. Senator Davis's resolutions having been called up, Senators Bigler, Clingman, and Brown spoke, and the Senate passed the first three.——The House passed the Pacific Telegraph bill, with an amendment throwing the contract open to competition. The Pacific Railroad bill was discussed by Mr. Curtis.

On Friday, May 25, in the Senate, the House Post-office Deficiency Bill was reported, with various amendments. The Overland Mail Bill, after remarks by Senator Gwin, was laid aside, in company with the private calendar, to make way for the debate upon the Davis resolutions, which were all adopted, after an animated debate, in which Senators Crittenden, Brown, Hale, Colla- ` `, Clingman, Toombs, and Mason took part.——An ` `e bring up, in the House, the bill for the adjust- ` `reclusionary claims failing, the House consid- ` `calendar, when a score of bills were ` `ed to relative to the reorganized Afri- ` `referred to the Judiciary Com- ` `

HR. SEWARD ON THE NOMINATION OF LINCOLN.

The Central Republican Committee has received the following letter from Hon. William H. Seward, in reply to an invitation to attend a meeting to ratify the nomination of Messrs. Lincoln and Hamlin:

AUBURN, May 21, 1860.

"GENTLEMEN,—I will not affect to conceal the sensibility with which I have received the letter to which you, and so many other respected friends, have tendered to me congratulations of renewed and increased confidence. These letters will remain with me as assurances, in future years, that, although I was not unwilling to be chosen for another age, the vindication of my political principles, which they did, nevertheless afforded me a generous support of many good, wise, and patriotic men of my own State.

"Such assurances, however made, under the circumstances now existing, derive their greatest value largely from the fact that they elect upon me through the channel of private confidence and sincere, and altogether true to the world. You will at once perceive that such expressions would be somewhat puerile to me, and justly offensive to the community, if they should be allowed to take on any public or personal form of manifestation. For this reason, if it were respectful and consistent with your own high purposes, I would most gladly avail myself to you until I could have had an opportunity of making it convenient next week, on my way to Washington, after completing the arrangements for the repairs upon my dwelling there, rendered necessary by a recent fire.

"The same reason determines me also to decline your kind invitation to attend the meeting in which you propose some demonstration of respect to myself, by expressly considering the nomination which have been made by the recent National Convention at Chicago. At the same time it is your right to have a frank and candid expression of my own opinions and sentiments on that important subject.

"My friends know very well that, while they have always generously made my promotion to public trusts their own spontaneous act, mine had never been chosen them faithfully, so as to be able, at the close of their appointments, to look back into the hands of the people without forfeiture of the public confidence. The circumstances which cause to be the Chicago platform are these their act, not mine. The disappointment, therefore, in their nomination, is not mine. It is theirs. I accepted them unprepared. On the other hand, I have no sentiment either of disappointment or of mortification in which in any possible case could, without presumption, claim that a distinguished party ought to make choice for its candidate for the first office in the gift of the American people. I find in the nomination of Mr. Lincoln a platform as satisfactory to me as it is had been framed in the principles, and in the candidate I recognized by it eminent and able Republicans, with whom I have cordially co-operated in maintaining the principles embodied in that excellent creed. I cheerfully give them a sincere and earnest support.

"I trust, moreover, that those with whom I have labored so long and intimately cannot fail to take notice of the greater freedom then and myself relations of personal friendship remain unchanged. In the experience of politicians, will indulge me in a confident belief that no sense of disappointment will be allowed by them to cause delay, or in any way to embarrass, the progress of that cause to the attainment of which is demanded by the infinite regard to the safety and welfare of the country and of mankind.

"I am, sincerely and respectfully,

"Your friend and obedient servant,

"WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

THE JAPANESE AT THE NAVY YARD.

The Japanese Embassy arrived at the navy-yard about three o'clock on the 24th, in a company with the rest of the Naval Commission, and were received by Captain Buchanan, who welcomed them in a brief and courteous manner. The chief of the Embassy feelingly responded. Among the officers of the yard who were assigned as their guides were to please the distinguished guests, were Lieut. Commander William M'Intir, Lieutenant Commander L. Murray, Lieutenant Charles C. Simms, Commander John A. Dahlgren, Lieutenant H. H. Lewis, Lieutenant Somerville Nicholson, Lieutenant William Nelson, Lieutenant E. Emery, Purser R. T. M'Glassin, and Dr. Vanuxem.

Soon after the arrival of the Embassy were assembled at the Commandant's house a large number of the officers of the yard, and a sumptuous collation was served to them. Among the officers of the yard who were assembled with the Embassy were Commodore Breese, Commodore Lardner, Commodore Craven, Commodore Dornin, Commodore Ridgely, Commodore Hull, Commodore Hudson, Commodore Lavallette, Commodore Lee

THE AFRICANS OF THE SLAVE BARK "WILDFIRE."—[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE SLAVE DECK OF THE BARK "WILDFIRE," BROUGHT INTO KEY WEST ON APRIL 20, 1860.—[FROM A DAGUERREOTYPE.]

KEY WEST, FLORIDA, May 20, 1860.

On the morning of the 20th of April last, the United States steamer Mohawk, Lieutenant Craven commanding, came to anchor in the harbor of this place, having in tow a bark of the burden of about three hundred and thirty tons, supposed to be the bark Wildfire, lately owned in the city of New York. The bark had on board five hundred and ten native Africans, taken on board in the River Congo, on the west side of the continent of Africa. She had been captured a few days previously by Lieutenant Craven within sight of the northern coast of Cuba, as an American vessel employed in violating our laws against the slave-trade. She had left the Congo River thirty-six days before her capture.

Soon after the bark was anchored we repaired on board, and on passing over the side saw, on the deck of the vessel, about four hundred and fifty native Africans, in a state of entire nudity, in a sitting or squatting posture, the most of them having their knees elevated so as to form a resting-place for their heads and arms. They sat very close together, mostly on either side of the vessel, forward and aft, leaving a narrow open space along the line of the centre for the crew of the vessel to pass to and fro. About fifty of them were full-grown young men, and about four hundred were boys aged from ten to sixteen years. It is said by persons acquainted with the slave-trade and who saw them, that they were generally in a very good condition of health and flesh, as compared with other similar cargoes, owing to the fact that they had not been so much crowded together on board as is common in slave voyages, and had been better fed than usual. It is said that the bark is capable of carrying, and was prepared to carry, one thousand, but not being able without inconvenient delay to procure so many, she sailed with six hundred. Ninety and upward had died on the voyage. But this is considered as comparatively a small loss, showing that they had been better cared for than usual. Ten more have died since their arrival, and there are about forty more sick in the hospital. We saw on board about six or seven boys and men greatly emaciated, and diseased past recovery, and about a hundred that showed decided evidences of suffering from inanition, exhaustion, and disease. Dysentery was the principal disease. But notwithstanding their sufferings, we could not be otherwise than interested and amused at their strange looks, motions, and actions. The well ones looked happy and contented, and were ready at any moment to join in a song or a dance whenever they were directed to do so by "Jack"—a little fellow as black as ebony, about twelve years old, having a handsome and expressive face, an intelligent look, and a sparkling eye. The sailors on the voyage had dressed "Jack" in sailor costume, and had made him a great pet. When we were on board "Jack" carried about in his hand a short cord, not only as the emblem but also as the instrument of his brief delegated authority. He would make the men and boys stand up, sit down, sing, or dance just as he directed. When they sang "Jack" moved around among them as light as a cat, and beat the time by slapping his hands together, and if any refused to sing, or sang out of time, Jack's cord descended on their backs. Their singing was monotonous. The words we did not understand. We have rarely seen a more happy and merry-looking fellow than "Jack."

From the deck we descended into the cabin, where we saw sixty or seventy women and young girls, in Nature's dress, some sitting on the floor and others on the lockers, and some sick ones lying in the berths. Four or five of them were a good deal tattooed on the back and arms, and we noticed that three had an arm branded with the figure "7," which, we suppose, is the merchant's mark.

On the day of their arrival the sickest, about forty in all, were landed and carried to a building on the public grounds belonging to Fort Taylor, and Doctors Whitehurst and Skrine and other medical attendants. We visited t[hem] ercoon. The United States M[arshal] for all of them shirts, and [some] some benevolent ladies girls and women gowns. Six or eight were very sick; the others did not appear to be in any immediate danger of dying. We were very much amused by a young lad about fifteen years old, not much sick, who had got on, probably for the first time in his life, a whole shirt, and who seemed to be delighted with every body and every thing he saw. Its evidently thought the speech of the white man was very funny. When a few words were spoken to him he immediately repeated them with great glee. Pointing to Dr. Shriver, we said "Doctor." He said "Doctor." And then pointing to Dr. Whitehurst, we said "Doctor too." He said "Doctor too." The doctors had selected from the bark a woman about twenty-four years of age to assist the nurse in taking care of the sick. She had been dressed in a clean calico frock, and looked very respectably. About sundown they all lay down for the night upon a campbed, and were covered over with blankets. And now a scene took place which interested us very much, but which we did not understand and can not explain. The woman standing up slapped her hands together once or twice, and as soon as all were silent she commenced a sort of recitation, song, or prayer, in tone and manner much like a chanting of the Litany in Catholic churches, and every few moments the voices of ten or fifteen others were heard in the same tone, as if responding. This exercise continued about a minute. Now what could this be? It looked and sounded to us very much like Christians chanting together an evening prayer on retiring to rest. And yet we feel quite assured that none of these persons had ever heard of Christ, or had learned Christian practices, or possessed much, if any, knowledge of God as a Creator or Preserver of the world. We suspect that it was not understood by them as a religious exercise at all, but as something which they had been trained to go through at the barracoons in Africa or on board the ship.

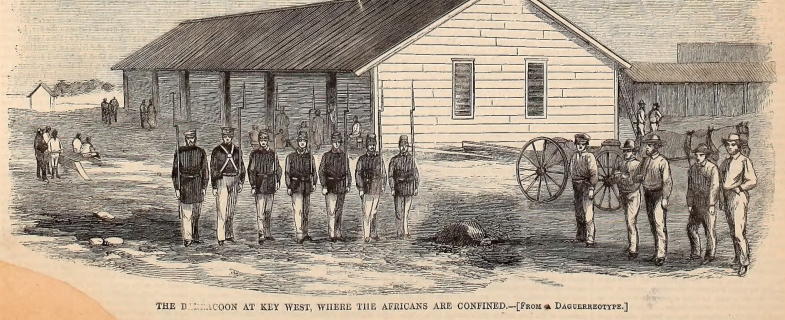
In two days after the arrival of the bark the Marshal had completed a large, airy building at Whitehead's Point, a little out of the town, for the reception and accommodation of these people; and after getting them clad as well as he could in so short a time, they were all landed on the fort wharf, and carried in carts to their quarters. On arriving there they all arranged themselves along the sides of the building, as they had been accustomed to do on the decks of the vessel, and squatted down in the same manner. It took the Marshal and his assistants some little time, and no small efforts, to give the Africans to understand that they were free to move about, to go out and come in at will. They learned this in the course of a few hours, however, and general merriment and hilarity prevailed. We visited them in the afternoon, and have done so several times since; and we confess that we have been struck, as many others have been, with the expression of intelligence displayed in their faces, the beauty of their physical conformation, and the beauty of their teeth. We have been accustomed to think that the civilized negroes of our own country were superior, in point of intelligence and physical development, to the native Africans; but judging only by the eye, we think it would be difficult to find, any where in our own country, four hundred finer and handsomer-looking boys and girls than these are. To be sure you often saw the elongated occiput, the protruded jaws, and the receding forehead; but you also often saw a head as round, with features as regular as any European's, except the universal flat noses. Little "Jack" has a head as round as an apple.

A number of these negroes—perhaps twelve or fifteen in all—have been more or less at and about Lounda, a Portuguese town on the coast, and have learned to speak a little Portuguese. Through an interpreter we learned from them that some four or five—perhaps more, but probably not many—had been baptized at the Roman Catholic missionary station at Loando. Francisco, a young man, says he was baptized by a Franciscan friar in Loando; that he was a slave in Africa, and does not wish to return there. He says he had rather be a slave to the white man in this country. Salvador, a bright-looking, smart lad, has been baptized. Constantia says she was baptized in Loando. She does not remember her father; she was stolen away when she was young, and was sold by her brother. Antonia and Amelia are both fine-looking young women, aged about twenty, and were both baptized at Loando. Madia, a pogug, unbaptized, aged about twenty, has obtained among the white people here who have visited the quarters the name of "The Princess," on account of her fine personal appearance and the deference that seemed to be paid to her by some of her companions. The persons we have here mentioned, including some eight or ten others, evidently do not belong to the same tribe that the rest do. Indeed the whole number is evidently taken from different tribes living in the interior of Africa, but the greater number are "Congos." The women we have noted have cut or shaved the hair off the back part of their head, from a point on the crown to the back part of either ear. It is the fashion of their tribe. None of the other women are thus shorn. Many of the men, women, boys, and girls have filed their front teeth—some by sharpening them to a point, and others by cutting down the two upper front teeth. The persons above named have their teeth in a natural state. Perhaps fifty in all are tattooed more or less.

AN AFRICAN.—[FROM A DAGUERREOTYPE.]



THE ONLY BABY AMONG THE AFRICANS.—[DAGUERREOTYPED.]

Travelers describe the natives of Congo as being small of stature, cheerful, good-humored, unreflecting, and possessed of little energy either of mind or body. Negro indolence is carried with them to the utmost excess. The little cultivation that exists, entirely carried on by the females, is nearly limited to the manioc root, which they are not very skilful in preparing. Their houses are put together of mats made from the fibre of the palm-tree, and their clothes and bedding consist merely of matted grass.

The President, on receiving news of the capture of the Wildfire, sent a special message to Congress on the subject, from which we give an extract below. The subsequent capture of another slave ship with more Africans will probably lead to some enactment on the subject. The President says:

"The expenditure for the Africans captured on board the Wildfire will not be less than one hundred thousand dollars, and may considerably exceed that sum. But it will not be sufficient for Congress to limit the amount appropriated to the cost of the Wildfire. It is probable, judging from the increased activity of the slave-trade and the vigilance of our cruisers, that several similar captures may be made before the end of the year. An appropriation ought, therefore, to be granted large enough to cover such contingencies. The period has arrived when it is indispensable to provide some specific legislation for the guidance of the Executive upon this subject. With this view, I would suggest that Congress might authorize the President to enter into a general agreement with the Colonization Society, binding them to receive, on the coast of Africa from our agents there, all the captured Africans which may be delivered to him, and to maintain them for a limited period, upon such terms and conditions as may combine humanity toward these unfortunates with a just economy. Bills of this character, providing for making a new bargain with every new capture, and would prevent delay and avoid expense in the disposition of the captives. The law might then provide that, in all cases where this may be practicable, the judge should survey the negroes directly to Key West; and, second, the estimate appointed by the Marshal of the Southern District of Florida to the Secretary of the Interior, the cost of surveying the necessary quarters for them will be $2500, and the aggregate expenses for the single month of May will amount to $12,500. But this is far from being the worst evil. Within a few weeks the yellow fever will most probably prevail at Key West; and before the Marshal urges their removal from there, present quarters at so early day, which must be done in any event as soon as practicable. For these reasons I strongly commend this subject to the immediate attention of Congress."

NO. IX.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

One of the pleasantest things I have lately met with, in a vagabond course of shy metropolitan neighborhood and small shops, is the fancy of an humble artist, as exemplified in two portraits representing Mr. Thomas Brassey, of Great Britain, and Mr. John Heenan, of the United States of America. These illustrious men are highly colored, in eighting trim, and fairly saleable. To suggest the pastoral and meditative nature of their peaceful calling, Mr. Heenan is represented on emerald sward, with prizemoney and other modest flowers springing up under the heels of his half-boots; while Mr. Sayers is impelled to the administration of his favorite line, the Auctioneer, by the thing eloquence of a village church. The humble homes of England, with their domestic virtues and honeysuckle garnishing, have been long to go and visit on and the lark and other singing-birds are observable in the upper air, ecstatically caroling their thanks to Heaven for it. On the whole, the representations entwined with the pugilistic art by this artist are much in the manner of Isaac Walton.

But it is with the lower animals of back streets and by-ways that my present purpose rests. For some reason we may return to such neighborhoods when leisure and inclination serve.

Nothing in shy neighborhoods perplexes my mind more than the sad company birds keep. Foreign birds are got into good society, but British birds are inseparable from low associates. There is a whole street of them in Seven Dials; and I always find them in poor and immoral neighborhoods, convenient to the public-house and the pawnbroker's. They seem to lead people into drinking, and even the man who makes their cages usually gets into a chronic state of black eye. Why is it, also, that they will do things for people in short-skirted vyetesen coats with bone buttons, or in sleeved waistcoats and fur caps, which they can not be induced by the respectable orders of society to undertake. In a dirty court in Spitalfields, one, I found a goldinch drawing his own water, and setting as much of it as if he were not a consuming fever. That goldinch lived at a birdshop, and offered in writing to barter himself against old clothes, empty bottles, or even kitchen-stuff. Surely a low thing and a depraved taste in any finch! I bought that goldfinch for sixpence. He was out of health, and hung upon a nail over against my table. He lived outside a counterfeit dwelling-house, supposed (as I argued to the shopkeeper) that he would have been impossible to account for his perch sticking out of the garret window. From the dejection of his appearance in my room, either he left off being thirsty—which was not in the bond—or he could not make up his mind to bear his little bucket drop back into the well when he let it go: a shock which in the best of times had made him tremble. He drew no water but he gazed down under the cloud of night, with an interval of futile and at length hopeless expectation, the merchant who had educated him never appealed to. The merchant was a low-legged character, with a flat and cushiony nose, like the last new strawberry. He wore a fur cap, with shorts, and was of the velveteen race, vituperative. He sent word that he would "look round." He looked round, appeared in the shop-window of a room, and slightly cocked up his evil eye at the goldinch. Instantly a raging thirst beset that bird: when it was appeased, he still could not spare unnecessary buckets of water; and finally leaped about his perch and sharpened his bill as if he had been to the meanest rascals and quit work.

Donkeys again. I know shy neighborhoods where the Donkey goes in at the street door, and appears to live up a stairs, for I have examined the back yard from over the palings, and have been unable to make him out. Gentility, nobility, royalty, would stand to that donkey in vain, for what he does for a costermonger. Feed him with oats at the highest price, put an infant prince and princess in a pair of gaiters on his back, adjust his delicate trappings to a nicety, take him to the softest slopes at Windsor, and try what pace you can get out of him. Then starve him, harness him anyhow to a truck with a flat tray on it, and see him bowl from Whitechapel to Spitalfields and back. He appears to be no particular private understanding between birds and donkeys in a shy neighborhood; but in the shy neighborhood state you shall see them always in the same bands, and always developing their very best energies for the very worst company.

I have known a donkey—by sight; we were not on speaking terms—who lived over on the Surrey side of London Bridge, on the fatherness of Jacob's Island and Dockhead. It was the habit of that animal, when his services were not in immediate requisition, to stand at livery. For a little more than, a mile from his place of residence, loitering about the streets; and the expression of his countenance at such times was most dejected. He was attached to the establishment of an elderly lady who sold periwinkles, and he used to stand on Saturday nights with a cartful of those delicacies outside a gin-shop, pricking up his ears when a customer came to the cart, and not evidently deriving satisfaction from the knowledge that they got bad measure. His mistress was sometimes overtaken by inebriety. The last time I ever saw them (almost two years ago) he was in circumstances of difficulty, caused by this failing. Having been fortified in a gin-palace against the inclemency of the weather, he proceed among his periwinkles, showed him, with his ragged hat-brim broken and his cart extensively scattered, twitching his tail, and occasionally lay hanging head, a picture of disgrace and obduracy. I have seen boys being taken to station-houses who were as like him as it is possible to be.

The dogs of shy neighborhoods I observe to avoid place, and to be conscious of poverty. They avoid work too, for, of course, that is in the nature of all animals. I have the pleasure to know a dog in a back street in Southwark, and in Yorkshire last summer, and seeing him posted in the bill of the night, I attended the performance. His first scene was eminently successful, as it is recapitulated a second in its representation (and five times in the bill), it scarcely afforded ground for a second dog-fight—and there was no more. He had merely to bark, run on, and jump through an inn window after a comic fugitive. He did it with a sort of long-cared ease, that gave a little marred in its interest by his overanxiety: forasmuch as while his master (a beloved dog) was in the ring (where on a previous night) was feelingly lamenting the absence of his faithful dog, and laying great stress on the fact that he was a dog of many years, the faithful dog was barking furiously in the prompter's box, and clearly choking himself against his collar, in his anxiety to show the public of all that his honesty got the better of him. He had to enter a dense and trackless forest on the side of the mountain, and to find the body of a murderer when he found him resting at the foot of a tree, with his victim bound ready for slaughter. It was a bad night, and the dog had to track from an altogether unexpected direction, in the sweetest temper, at a very deliberate trot, not to be excited; treated with the high disdain with his tongue out; and there sat down, panting, and amiably surveying the audience, with his left ear pricked up the longest side. Meanwhile the murderer, impatient to receive his doom, was audibly calling to him, "Lie down, sir! lie down!" the victim, struggling with his bonds, assailed him with the most injurious expressions. It happened that the dog was trained to lie down at those words, and was very licking butter off his blood-stained hands.

In a shy street behind Long-acre two honest dogs live who perform in Punch's shows. I may venture to say that I am on terms of intimacy with both, and that I never see either guilty of the falsehood of failing to look down at the man inside the show during the whole performance. The difficulty other dogs have in keeping their minds about these dogs, appears to be never overcome by time. The same dogs must encounter them over and over again, and must be aware that within five minutes behind the legs of the show and beside the drum; but all dogs seem to suspect them of frills and pastels, and to sniff at them as if they thought those articles of personal adornment an eruption—a something in the nature of mange, perhaps. From this Covent Garden window of mine I noticed a country dog, only the other day, who had come up to Covent Garden market with his cart, and had broken his cord, an end of which he still trailed along with him. He loitered about the corner of the four streets bounded by my window; and bad London dogs came up, and told him lies that he didn't believe; and worse London dogs came up, and made proposals to him to go and steal in the market, which his principles rejected; and the ways of the town confused him, and he crept aside and lay down in a deer-way. He had scarcely got a wink of sleep when up came Punch with Toby. Punch was darting to Toby for consolation and advice, when he saw the frill, and stopped in the middle of the area to consider it. The show was pitched, Toby retired behind the drapery, the audience formed, the drum and pipe struck up. My country dog remained immovable, intently staring at three strange appearances, until still Toby opened the drama by appearing on his ledge, in an entirely new Punch, who put a tobacco-pipe into Toby's mouth. At this spectacle the country dog threw up his head, gave one terrible howl, and fled down the street.

We talk of men keeping dogs, but we might often talk more expressively of dogs keeping men. I know a bull-dog in a by-way of Islington with whom keeps a man. He keeps him up a yard, and makes him go to public-houses and lay wagers on him, and obliges him to run against posts and look at him, and forces him to neglect work for him, and keeps him under rigid coercion. I once knew a fancy terrier that kept a gentleman—a gentleman who had been brought up at Oxford, too. The dog kept the gentleman entirely for his own gratification. The gentleman never talked about any thing but the terrier. This, however, was not in a shy neighborhood, and is a digression, consequently.

There are a great many dogs in shy neighborhoods who keep lots. I know a mean boy who keeps a dog. He feigns that he can drop down sparrows, and uses the dog to point at them, and he takes the boys out on sporting pretenses into all sorts of suburban fields. He has likewise made them believe that he can exercise mysterious knowledge of the art of fishing, and they consider themselves incompletely equipped for the Hampstead Ponds, Finsbury Pavement, or other accredited bottle, unless he is with them and barking tremendously. There is a dog residing in the Borough of Southwark who keeps a man. He may be seen, most days, in Oxford Street, hauling the blind man away on expeditions wholly uncontemplated by the proprietor. The blind man's wholly of the dog's conception and execution. Contrariwise, when the man has projects, the dog will sit down with him and consider them profitable. I saw him yesterday, wearing the money-tray like an easy collar instead of offering it to the public, taking the man aggressively, on the invitation of a fishsurreptitiously, apparently to visit a dog at Hammersmith, and to meet that direction. At the Queen's Head of Burlington House Gardens, between the Arcade and the Albany, offers a shy spot for appointment where a dog may always be observed. At the same time, openly disparaging the men they keep, to one another, and settling where they shall respectively take them when they begin to bark again. At a small butcher's, in a shy neighborhood (there is no reason for suppressing the name; it is Ivy-court Hill, and it goes upon the district called the Potteries), I know a shaggy black and white dog who keeps a drover. He is a boy of an age to be out of control, and frequently allows this drover to get drunk. On these occasions it is the dog's custom to sit outside the public-house, keeping an eye on a few sheep, and thinking. I have seen him with six sheep, plaintively casting-up in his mind how many he began with when he left Islington, and what places he has left the rest. I have seen him perplexed by not being able to account for himself for certain purposes. A light has gradually broken on him, he has remembered at what butcher's he left them, and, in a flash of self-reproduction, has thought off to his nose, and shown himself much relieved. If I could at any time have doubted the fact that this dog does keep the drover, and that the drover who kept him, it would have been abundantly proved by his way of talking individual sheep to the drover when he found the drover was out besmeared with red ochre and beer, and gave him wrong directions, which he calmly disregarded. He was entirely entirely into his own hands, his merely remarked, with respectful firmness, "That instruction would place them under the necessity of my further coming your attention to yourself—you will want it all!" and has driven his charge away, with an indifference of care and attention that would have broken any heart. He has left his lout of a man very, very far behind.

As the dogs of shy neighborhoods usually betray a shinking consciousness of being in poor circumstances—for the most part manifested in an over-fear of anxiety—I have sometimes, in their play, and a mingling that somebody is going to harness them to something, to pick up stones, or to the coin of any neighborhood exhibit a strong tendency to relapse into barbarism. Not only are they made selfishly ferocious by surrounding the supplies of population around them, and on the densely crowded state of all the avenues to cat's meat; but only in the most painful and dispiriting manner regardless in them, traceable to these reflections, but they evince a physical deterioration. They lose in size often, and in velocity; and in their black turns rusty, like old mourning; they wear very indifferent fur, and take to the shabbiest entire velvet, instead of silk velvet. I am not in terms of recognition with several small streets of cats, about the Obelisk in St. George's Fields, and also in the vicinity of Clerkenwell Green, and also in the book settlements of Drury Lane. In appearance they are very like the women among whom they live: they seem to turn out of their unwholesome beds into the street without any preparation. Cats, moreover, are constantly found to get about the gutters, unassisted, while they frouzily quarrel and swear and scratch and spit, at street-corners. In particular, I remark that when they are about to increase their families (an event of frequent occurrence), the resemblance is strongly expressed in a certain dusty dowdiness, down-at-heel self-neglect, and general giving up of things. I can not honestly report that I have ever seen a feline mirror of this class washing her face when in an interesting condition.

Not to produce more notes of uncommercial travel among the lower animals of shy neighborhoods, by dwelling at length upon the exasperated remonstrance of the tom-cats, and their clamorous in many respects to a man and a brother, I will come to a close with a word on the fowls of the same localities.

That any thing born of an egg and invested with wings, should have got to the pass that it must necessarily drop down a ladder into a cellar, and calls that going home, is a circumstance so amazing as to leave one nothing more in this connection to wonder at. Otherwise I might wonder at the complete-ness with which these fowls have become separated from all the birds of the air—have taken to groveling in bricks and mortar and mud—have forgotten all about live trees, and make roosting-places of dog-kennels, barrows, gate-posts, bulkheads, and door-scrapers. I wonder at nothing concerning them, and take them as they are. I accept a problem of Nature and things of course, a reduced Bantam family of my acquaintance in the Hackney Road, who are incessantly at the pawnbroker's, but will not say that they enjoy themselves, for they are of a melancholy temperament; but what enjoyment they are capable of they derive from providing together in the pawnbroker's side-entry. Here they are always to be found in a feeble flutter, as if they were newly come down in the world, and were afraid of being identified. I know a low fellow, originally of a good family from Dorking, who has his whole establishment of wives, in single file, in at the door of the Jug Department of a disorderly tavern near the Haymarket, and answers them during the evening's leaguer, emerges with them at the Bottle Entrance, and so passes his life; seldom, in the season, going to bed before two in the morning. Over at Mercer's Bridge there is a shabby old speckled couple (they belong to the wooden French-bedstead, wash-hand, and rosewood chest-of-drawers trade), who are always trying to get in at the door of a chapel. Whether the old lady, under a delusion resembling that of Mrs. Nickleby, has an idea of intrusting an egg to that particular denomination, or merely understands that she has no business in the building, and is constantly trying to enter it, I can not determine; but she is constantly endeavoring to undermine the principal door. I also know the case of a fowl who lives in a bag, walks up and down encouraging her and defying the Universe. But the family I have been best acquainted with is the one that resides in a little tiny sphere of a Chinese circle at Brentford, reside in the densest part of Bethnal Green. These abstraction from worldly subjects among which they live, or rather their conviction that those objects have all come into existence in a expressly convenient form, has so much haunted me that I have made them the subject of many journeys at divers hours.

ON BOARD A SLAVER.

BY ONE OF THE TRADE.

On a wet and cloudy morning in the month of April, 1850, I was sitting quietly in the bar of a boarding-house in New York, ruminating on what should be my future mode of life. I had returned some time before from my last voyage, which had been of the East Indies, and my funds were rapidly decreasing, and compelled me to look out for another ship. While my mind was thus employed in this train of thoughts, I became suddenly aware of voices conversing in a low tone outside my door, which on reproaching myself for my disorderly duty, and I heard a knock. On my saying "Come in," there entered the landlord of the house, accompanied by a stranger, who he introduced to me as Mr. Joseph Manwell, saying that the gentleman, if I was agreeable, had something to communicate; he then left us, leaving the stranger with me.

I begged him to be seated, and to commence what he had to say. He was a man rather above the middle height, with dark flashing eyes, and hair of the same hue, regular features, and a pale foreign-looking complexion; his appearance was prepossessing in any thing but a sailor. Having taken a chair, and drawn closer to the fire, he told me that he was in command of a ship about to proceed to the west coast of Africa on a trading voyage for palm-oil, and that he wanted some trustworthy men about him, and having been spoken to by my landlord for all, he had strongly recommended me; he had therefore paid me this visit to offer me the command of the ship about to proceed as strange and mysterious that I could plainly see there was something at the back of it, and on looking him steadily in the face, I asked him if he meant by the trading voyage "the game." He replied yes, that I was right, and the trading board was the boat that I spoke both Spanish and Portuguese fluently, he offered me a birth of trust, knowing that my knowledge of a linguist would be of great use to him. After some consideration I consented to go for my desire to make money and my love of adventure urged me to do it. We found her to be burden, had a fine ship, and cabin

I accordingly went down to the ship, and finding he had not yet arrived, I employed my time in examining the vessel, and found her to be a fine, roomy, well-built craft, and in every way suitable for the purpose for which she was intended. I had not returned to the cabin more than a few minutes when I heard a boat alongside, and on going on deck I found that Mr. Manwell had arrived, and was accompanied by a tall, powerful-looking man, whom he introduced to me as Captain Hawkins, the commander of the vessel. He was a man of about forty years of age, with a fine open countenance, and a frank and manly address, which at once prepossessed me in his favor. He was dressed in a suit of blue pilot-cloth, and wore a glazed hat. He was accompanied by a boy about fifteen years of age, who was introduced to me as his son. After the usual salutations had passed, I was invited to go below, and the captain produced a bottle of wine, and we sat down to discuss it, and to talk over the business on which we had met. The captain then told me that he had been engaged to command the vessel by a Portuguese gentleman, who resided at Lisbon, and who was the owner of the vessel, and that he had been instructed to proceed to the coast of Africa, and there to purchase a cargo of palm-oil, and to bring it to Lisbon, where he would receive his freight. He then asked me if I would like to go with him, and I replied that I would, and that I was ready to sign articles at once. He then told me that he had engaged the mate and second mate, and that he had only to engage the boatswain and carpenter, and that he would then be complete. He then asked me if I knew any one who would suit him for boatswain, and I replied that I knew a man who had been with me in the East Indies, and who I knew would suit him. He then asked me if I would go on board and look after the men, and see that they were all sober, and that they got their proper allowance of provisions, and that they were properly messed, and that I would act as steward, and keep the accounts. I replied that I would do so, and that I would go on board at once. He then told me that he would be on board in the course of the afternoon, and that he would then sign articles with the crew, and that we would sail with the first fair wind. I then left the vessel, and returned to the house where I had left my chest, and had it sent on board, and then went on board myself.

I found the mate and second mate on board, and they had engaged the boatswain and carpenter, and the crew were all on board, and the ship was in every way ready for sea. I found the mate to be a native of Portugal, and a fine, powerful man, about thirty years of age, and the second mate was a native of Spain, and a fine, active young man. The crew consisted of twenty-two men, and were a motley crew, composed of Portuguese, Spaniards, Italians, Greeks, Maltese, Sardinians, Frenchmen, Germans, Englishmen, Irishmen, Scotchmen, Americans, Swedes, Danes, Russians, Poles, Turks, Arabs, Negroes, Mulattoes, Lascars, Malays, Chinese, Japanese, Sandwich Islanders, Kanakas, Tahitians, Feejeeans, Australians, Caffres, Hottentots, Abyssinians, Mozambiques, Madagascars, Mauritians, Cingalese, Bengalese, Persians, Parsees, Hindoos, Cochin Chinese, Siamese, Burmese, Javanese, Sumatrans, Borneans, Celebesians, Manillamen, Aucklanders, Chilians, Peruvians, Mexicans, Brazilians, Patagonians, Cuban, Jamaicans, Haytians, Bahamians, Bermudians, Canadians, Esquimaux, Greenlanders, Icelanders, Laplanders, Finns, Lithuanians, Prussians, Austrians, Hungarians, Swiss, Dutch, Belgians, Irish, Scotch, Welsh, Cornishmen, Manxmen, Channel Islanders, Gibraltarians, Maltese, Ionians, Albanians are all propelled by steam, the slavers stand a bad chance, for steam has not been introduced in the slave-trade. Now that the interior of the ship was ready, we had to look after our gear aloft. We commenced by taking the wedges from between the masts and deck, so that the masts might give with the press of canvas; and then we cut the beams that go fore and aft, for the same reason—namely, that the ship might go easier. During the time that these preparations were being made the ship had sailed over many miles of the island of Ascension, and was now on the other tack, bearing up for a place in Cross Bay, the cove, about fifty miles from Port St. Paul de Loando, where we had agreed to touch for the slaves when they were ready. Ships sometimes lie as long as three months and more for the slaves, while the agents are collecting them in the interior. We were lucky, having only to wait thirty days. No reason for going so far away from land, after leaving the Congo, was this: we knew that the Triton, as soon as she found we had escaped her, would coast along the shore, thinking that we should do the same as some other ships erroneously do—namely, sail along the coast and secrete themselves, or pick up detachments of slaves as they go along; but our captain, being an old hand, knew better, for by going right out to sea they would lose our scent. After making the shore about St. Paul de Loando, we sailed with the southeast trade-wind along the coast, till we came near a place called Ambriz, where we saw them ashore throwing out private signals; we accordingly anchored near the coast at 5 P.M.

The agents came off with the slaves in lighters, containing about 200 each. They were packed together with their legs full of hide. They were passed up, and sent into the hold. There were altogether 811. As soon as they were on board, the hold was sealed, the guns were armed, and appointed into watches, as we were obliged to keep a very strict eye on them, to see that they did not rise and fight with each other—for among them there were many different tribes, all at variance with one another, so that sometimes we were not like a small hell, and the sentinel had frequently to jump down among them to separate the combatants.

The lighters came alongside at 7 P.M., and at 8 P.M. we loosened sail, and squaring the yards to the trade, let slip log and line against the run of fathoms' water. We shaped our course for Ascension, which we soon sighted, having a strong southeast trade shaft on. The next day, at noon, we then steered for 2022 miles right away to the westward. We did this to get out of the track of ships, that, on leaving the coast, would be bound to the West Indies. After that we steered to the southward, and passed to the southward and westward of Ascension, which we saw to-day in the distance, and then rounding the Isle of Pines.

Before leaving the Congo we shipped a double crew, so that we had thirty-five women before the mast; but all our services were well needed, for what with accelerating the slaves' deaths, and making alterations in her, and attending to the slaves, we all had our hands full. A certain number of slaves were told off to attend to the sick, and one of them. My department was to take charge of the women.

We kept the ship as clean as possible, for filth is the root of all evil on board a ship.

At sunrise, or not later than 5 A.M. every morning, the slaves were all mustered on deck, and their tubs were produced. A gang of them were made to keep those tubs supplied with salt-water while they were in use. This was done by dipping in (neither a novel one; it reminded me of sheep-shearing—or, at least, the washing of sheep previous to shearing—in which case with other operations a circle of fifteen or twenty were made to squat on their haunches round the tub, while one of us stood there with a bucket of water, which we, in fact, were splashing it over them. After they were all drenched, they would get up and walk forward, when others would be seated and stationed with a coarse cloth of canvas, who would rub them down after the manner of a groom rubbing down a horse.

He was also supplied with a bucket full of vinegar and salt-water, with which he washed their mouths with and rub their teeth; for if he does not keep his mouth clean a yellow substance collects on the gums which in time destroys the teeth, turns to poison. He is subject to ulcers in his mouth from this; and if he bites you—a thing which all uncommon wicked men do—it is certain to mortify. I know this to my cost; for once hitting one of them with the back of my hand, I came in contact with his mouth, and one of his teeth touched and indented my hand, whereby I lost the use of it for some days.

These alkaline-purity measures employed us till between 8 and 9 A.M., when we used to serve out to them some dry biscuit and rum and water. The rum was a mixture of one part rum to three parts of water, for they could drink it, but the slaves received it with great gusto. This would occupy us altogether till 11 o'clock, when they were said to have a hot breakfast, consisting of a kind of hodge-podge. The ingredients were biscuit broken small, beans, rice, barley, and salt pork—the whole thickened with flour and fat. This was boiled in two large caldrons in the caboose, and served out to them again into tubs and buckets ranged along the deck. We always tried to keep each tribe by itself; for at mealtimes, if by accident they got mixed, a row and end in a fight. So their meal, if not choice, was substantial and good, and plenty of it.

Of course we took every care of them, as it was our interest to do so. But in a crowded slave-ship disease is very rife; we lost only ninety-four, which we considered lucky. Closeness of the bowels and jaundice are the most frequent maladies. The first we treated with injections of vinegar, and gunpowder tobacco-smoke. Whether this is one of the treatments advice I can not say, but we found it very successful.

After their breakfast they were sent down to clean out the ship. Most of them spoke only the Congo dialect, but some of them understood Portuguese and Spanish. These we picked out as leaders and interpreters of the rest, and supplied them with a shirt or pair of trowsers as a distinguishing mark of rank, which was greatly envied by the others. They were also intrusted with a piece of rope, about a yard long, as an instrument of correction, which they very freely used. We had only to tell them men what we wanted done, and they made the others do it. We also got up various amusements for the slaves, by making them for them, and a kind of cymbal, to the tune of which they danced.

At 9 P.M. another hot meal was served to them of the same description as the first, and mustered at 8 P.M.; after which they were all packed below.

No lights were allowed at night in case of attracting attention. Even the compass or binnacle lights were well screened with canvas. After passing the Isle of Pines, and having been thirty-one days from Congo, we sighted Boca Grande, on the coast of Cuba. About the coast of Cuba are to be noticed a quantity of sharp, rising-boats and pilot-boats; these are nearly all in the pay of slave-owners there, who pay them to look out for the men-of-war, and also to mislead them. Every accordingly to any slave-ship about the coast that is waiting for a chance to land her cargo. They take it by turns to look out. One of the boats lies for about ten days, when they are relieved by another boat, and receive a fresh supply. One of these boats we found on the look-out for us. They informed us that the Bonita English man-of-war was standing to the westward of Havana. Our orders from the shore were, that we were to stretch out to sea for four days, which we did, and then returned to the coast, and so on, and so on, out again to sea. We obeyed accordingly, but nearly fell into a trap. We were standing on for a bluff in the land, when we saw a steamer in it. I thought I recognized it, for I had been frequently on the coast before surveying in a man-of-war, and this I remembered as being our lookout. As reported this to the captain, Don Pedro, as we called him. He immediately changed the course; and it was lucky for us, for we afterward found that H.M.S. Cumberland was anchored on the other side of the bluff. Here, then, was another escape. After having run out the appointed time we again returned, when we received the same orders; but our late narrow shave had rather tamed us, so we were all for the land on leaving, after we had escaped so many dangers, it was a pity to run any more. So I, being a good pilot among the many ways that promised to take her in safety to one where we could lay off; and in case of any one coming on us, we could land the slaves, so the cry for a man-of-war can do nothing to you if you have no slaves on board; so if they were sent to the watering-place for water, they, the man-of-war could do would be to liberate them. We accordingly chose Indian Cay for our watering, and anchored in Batabano waters. We afterward discovered that the boat which had been guiding us and bringing our orders out fell in with H.M.S. Dramatic, commanded by Captain Fare. He shipped on board as pilot, and promised Captain Fare to guide him to us—an engagement he performed by taking the Bonita[1] to the opposite direction.

After waiting for two days off the cay, the boats taken aback came off with the boats ready, which are all secreted in the rocks—we at last saw five boats approaching, which we rightly guessed were to be us. They came alongside, etc., for the slaves, and money for the seamen; for before one of the slaves left the ship we were all paid off.

From the cay we left New York till the landing of the slaves on the quay, only five months and fourteen days had elapsed. Each man received 5,000 for his services, and I received $100 extra for my services as interpreter. The slaves were then disembarked, and marched off to the Havana, landed 717 slaves alive. It was then nearly dusk. The pilot-boat remained alongside for the night; and early the next morning I was seventeen lires in the ship's hold, and set fire to her, and burned her to the water's edge. We all left sorry to do so, for she was really a very fine boy. Safe landed. Till then we never knew the ship's name, for the one we left New York with was a false one. But the captain, on leaving her, said: "There she burns, lads, the craft in which we have made our money—the beautiful Flying Rosario!"

Such is the history of how we went on board the pilot-boat, and were landed at the Boca Grande. This I found was a wheat, ostensibly for the purpose of landing it in Havana, and I believe it ship occasionally came there as a blind; but it was used really for landing slaves. We were afterward conveyed by boat to Havana, which we reached in nine days. It was only a little less than 200 miles; but we had frequently to make ourselves to escape detection, for dangers were not over. The inhabitants we met, knowing who we were, would have given information of water under hail a dollar. But in Havana the slave-trade is so well managed that it is rarely detected.

The next day, while perusing the papers from home, I read in the Times of the capture of the Orion slave-ship by H.M.S. Pluto. I must confess, reader, it was a bitter disappointment. I could not repress that I found that the captain who commanded the Orion was the same I had sailed with in the Flying Rosario. You may blame me for this, reader, but old companionship, old fellowship, and old times have their ties in whatever society we move in.

P.S.—Our passage from New York to Congo was 71 days. The reader may be astonished at the length of voyage; but we went along the land, beating against the southeast trade, and quite a different way to other ships, particularly men-of-war. We did not dare to return the same way, as we should pass the Marion, Triton, and others of our friends. I came home by H.M.S. Scantlet, the very ship that chased us in the Flying Rosario.

[1] After their breakfast they were sent down to BEWITCHED.

"PLEASE, Sir, there's a boy outside wants to see you."

"See me?" I asked, surprised.

"Yes, Sir; I think they want a doctor, Sir; mother told them you was one."

I hurried out, forgetting my breakfast, and found the boy standing at the door.

"What's your name?"

"Phil Wish, yer honor."

"What do you want?"

"Please, Sir, Ellen's tuk worse, and her mother don't think as how she'll live much longer, she's quite screamed, Sir."

I wondered who "Ellen" could be, and what "screamed" meant, but contented myself with signing to him to lead the way. We walked on in the bright April morning, every thing looking fair and beautiful. Presently we came to the brow of a hill, and looking down into the valley, bathed in brightest sunlight, I saw a few white cottages dotted here and there. Phil informed me that "Ellen lived in one of these," pointing out the identical one with his finger.

"What's the matter with Ellen?" I asked.

"Dunno, Sir," in a tone which, if it failed to imply he didn't care, at least proved he was not disposed to be communicative. I wondered what the mystery could be, but thinking whatever it was it would soon be solved, walked on in silence. We at last arrived at a cottage very small and very low. An old woman answered our knock, and we were admitted into a kitchen, and looking down into a dark room, a very thing scrupulously clean and clean. A little girl, apparently about three years old, was seated on the floor telling her doll, in an under-tone, "not to make a noise, because mother was ill." A working-man's hat and coat hung in one corner, with a cheap photograph of their owner (I don't know why I felt certain it was her husband) opposite them. The shutters of the latticed windows were half closed, producing a quiet subdued light. I walked toward the bed, and softly drew the curtain. The small face, half hidden in the pillow, seemed very young and pretty. The eyes closed, the lips parted and hurried. The bird was literally shrieking—I signed to the woman, and she covered the cage. All was quiet. I lifted the pale hand from the coverlet and felt for the pulse—gone.

"How long has she been so?" I asked.

"Since early, Sir."

"Ah! she can't last long."

The professional phrase escaped involuntarily. I started as I heard it, and repeated the hand. The movement roused her. The heavy eyelids unclosed: I drew back.

"Is Jack come, mother?"

"No, darling!"

"Ah! I forgot."

A moment's pause. Then, in a quick, hurried tone, as if the thought were first impressed upon her mind,

"Mother, am I dying?"

A sob was the only answer. Another pause longer than the first: then the arm was placed under the pillow for a moment, and drawn forth again.

I drew this to Jack when you see him."

She tried to move her hand along the bed, and pass its hidden contents to the woman weeping by the side; but she could do so, for I had first directed it grew weaker still, and left it idle where it lay. I unclosed the almost rigid fingers, and gave to the woman the object—a little ring—with a wedding ring, and a lock of fair hair tied with a blue ribbon.

"Ellen, Ellen! would you like to see your child?"

"Not now!—Poor Jack!—How dark it is, mother!"

I knew by that that it was very near; but the woman, in her ignorance, walked across the room, and opened the shutter a little more to window. The staring sunlight came rushing, streaming in.

"Mother—mother!"

A death-cry chased over the countenance.

"I'm here, Ellen. Child—darling—speak!"

Another pause, very, very long, never to be broken by the form lying before me, pale and still. A distant shout of harvest-home came strangely on the solemn scene. Ellen, I truly believe, heard it. Another drooping soul for the universal harvest! Another wearied heart for the world's great reaper —Death!

I turned hurriedly away. The child had fallen asleep with the doll by her side, still murmuring to her dreams about "not making a noise, 'cause mother was ill." I closed the window-shutters, thinking of the light as that which the great creator will light that will one day dawn on all—covered the pale dead face, and left the woman weeping and in prayer.

I set off the next morning for the old woman's cottage. She was standing at the door, evidently expecting me.

"Oh, Sir, is it you? do walk in!"

I entered, glancing as I did so at the bed where the dead girl was still lying. The woman saw the look, and answered my thought silently.

"Oh, Sir, my poor child!"

I spoke soothingly and calmly.

"Oh, Sir, she's not only losing her, but it's not only losing her! it's the way—the way!"

"The way?" I said, inquiringly.

"Yes, Sir, but to be sure you don't know. She was bewitched, Sir."

"Bewitched!" I exclaimed.

"Yes, Sir, this long time. She's been ailing since last year, and it's been the death of her at last."

Seeing my continued look of surprise, she "went on," as she expressed it, "to tell me all about it," still sobbing, as she did so, the dead girl's head in hers. The story, as nearly as I remember, ran as follows:

"SHE LOOKS DYING LIKE, MOTHER, AND CARES NOTHING FOR ME."

"You see, Sir, Ellen was my only child, and a good one she was. Many's the time I've told my old man she'd live to be a comfort to me; and so she truly did, nursing me and taking care of me, when he died, for many a long day." (Here she fondled the dried hand closer still.) "Well, you see, Sir, she was still quite a child, when a young chap comes to work up at the Squire's where Ellen took the milk every morning. It wasn't long after he came that I thought I saw a change in her; she wasn't so light-hearted like, as if she had some secret. So, one morning, when she comes in from the Squire's with the odd look on her face, I turned short at her and says, 'What's the matter, Ellen?'

"She reddened, but answered quite boldly, for she was always as open as the day,

"'Why, mother, I think Jack's very fond of me.'

"'Fond of you?' says I; 'and pray who's Jack?'

"'Him that works up at the Squire's; but you'll soon see him, mother; he's coming up to-night.'

"And sure enough he came. He was a handsome spoken young fellow enough. He told me he wanted Ellen, and would take great care of her. He seemed so honest and bright-looking, and Ellen so fond of him, that somehow I couldn't say 'No,' and the end of it was they went to the church, and the parson himself told me he'd never seen a prettier couple. They were just like two doves; he had plenty of work up at the Squire's—you see he was a bricklayer, Sir, and the Squire was having his place done up—and Ellen she took in needlework, and come over every day to help me. They used to live there, Sir." (She pointed to a little cottage close by, now wearing a dreary deserted look.) "They lived there nigh upon two years, Sir, till long after the baby was born. Well, Sir, my Ellen—though the best-tempered girl in the world—was a bit spirited when any thing crossed her; and one morning Jack and her had a quarrel —the first they'd ever had—it was about her coming to Tom, poor fellow, who'd been her sweet-heart before she was married—and Jack went to work without bidding her good-by. She was mighty vexed at this, and when I went over I found her crying. I thought Jack was wrong, and was just telling her so, when I heard a knock at the door, which was open, and there was the witch standing looking."

"'What witch?' I asked.

"'Why, her that lives in the hut on the hill; there's only one witch, Sir.'

Again the look of astonishment. I signified a satisfaction I was far from possessing, and she continued:

"'Well, Sir, she was standing staring, and Ellen thinking she'd heard what we'd been saying, told her sharply to go off, but she didn't move, so Ellen got up and pushed her out, but not before she had cast an evil look and muttered to herself.

"'Ellen,' I said, 'she's cast an evil eye on you.' She looked pale, but said, in her hasty way, 'I don't care if she has, mother.'

"I felt hurried like, and knew something would come of it; but didn't say any thing to any one.

"When Jack came home that night I talked to him a good deal. He didn't take much notice at first, but at last he promised to make it up with Ellen. I don't know, Sir, if it ever was made up; maybe, you see, the witch wouldn't let her bring her mind like to do it, for Jack and her were ever the same afterward, and Tom went to the cottage oftener than ever. I used to be quite frightened at Jack's look, when he'd come in and see Tom two a-talking together; but I knew poor Ellen was bewitched, and couldn't help teasing him. The neighbors knew it, too; for, you see, bewitched people have a queer look about the eyes, and grow thin and pale, like Ellen did, till they die quite away. I dreaded Jack finding it out, and it was a long time before he did; for the people didn't like to talk about it before him, and when he saw them whispering and looking at him, he'd think they were talking of Ellen and Tom, and feel jealous like, and angry. At last one night Ellen rushed in to me with her face all pale and trembling:

"'He's off, mother!' says she.

"'Who, Ellen?'

"She looked quite wild, and pointed to the cottage. I left her fainting-like in a chair, and ran over. He was standing with his white face near the door, putting his things together.

"'Jack,' says I, 'where are you off to?'

"'Going on the tramp, mother; there's no more work up at the Squire's.'

"'Jack,' says I, 'it's about Ellen—'

"He never moved or answered.

"'Jack,' says I, putting my hand on his shoulder, for I began to get fierce, thinking of Ellen and the child, 'Jack, think of the little one.'

"'Mother,' says he, in such a quiet voice that I didn't feel frightened any longer at his pale face, 'mother,' says he, 'I've heard the neighbors a-talking about what has happened to Ellen, and I know it's true. Ellen can't help it; but what's the use of my stopping here? She'll be better without me; she looks dying like, before my very eyes, and cares nothing for me, so what's the good, mother?'

"I let my hand drop from his shoulder; for you see, Sir, I knew it was all true, and I couldn't answer it, though I tried hard. At last I said, 'Jack! won't you bid her good-by?' For I thought, when it came to kissing her and the child, maybe he would go through with it. He went to the window, where he could see her lying in the chair, as I left her, pale and still. A fierce look came over his face, and he muttered something about Tom.

"'It's not his fault, Jack!' says I.

"'No,' says he, 'not his fault—not hers—it can't be helped. Good-by, mother!'

"'Jack!' I said, 'for God's sake, stop! speak to Ellen only one word.'

"He went out of the cottage. I was almost wild. 'Ellen! Ellen!' I called out; I rushed over; I shook her; I pointed to Jack in the distance going farther and farther away; but I couldn't rouse her, she was quite gone. I watched him go over the hill, without once looking back; and we've never seen him since."

"And Ellen?" I asked.

"Oh, Sir! when she came to she seemed quite mad. She said she'd go after him, and take the child with her. I couldn't quiet her at all. Then she was very ill for a long time, without any sense, talking about Jack all day and night. The doctor said it was fever, and maybe it was; but we knew who brought it on, though we didn't tell him. She got better at last, but her eyes looked sharp and strange; they often frightened me. She just got up one morning, looked about the room, took Jack's picture, hung it up there with its cap and coat, and told me never to move them till he came back.

"'Mother,' says she, 'I've been a wicked girl not to be a better wife to him, and it serves me right. I was too fond of teasing him by talking to Tom. I must tell him all when he comes back.'

"I saw she didn't know the real reason of his going. It seemed she'd forgotten all about the witch, and didn't know that if he came back she'd do just the same again. But she thought he'd surely come, and she used to sit for hours in the evening looking over the hill for him; but months passed, and he was still away. At last she took to her bed, and never rose again. That's the way they all do, Sir. She lay there, always quite quiet, and the little one nearly always with her. She sometimes said it was 'conscience,' and when I told him about the witch he shook his head. She was often asleep, but when the cough woke her—for she had a bad cough—she used to ask me directly if Jack had come. Sometimes she'd think he was sitting by her, and she'd talk to him, and tell him how sorry she was about it all, and how she never cared for Tom, and how happy they were going to be now. And then she'd think they were walking in the fields, as they used to do on Sunday evenings, and she'd say how sweet the church bells sounded, and how pretty the little one was growing, and how happy we all four were living in those two little cottages. Then, when she got sensible, she'd lie for hours never speaking at him. At last even I began to watch for him. I thought if he would only come, just to see her once before she went. I used to put the little one up at the window, and tell her to keep on looking over the hill, and p'raps she'd see her father coming, but my heart misgave me all the time—and I was right—he never came, he never came."

She stops her story, weeping; then turning to the bed:

"She looks happy enough without him now, doesn't she, Sir?"

She drew aside the covering: I gazed long upon the face, so child-like in its sweet simplicity. It wore a look of perfect rest. The slight shade of anxiety I had noticed the day before had passed away, giving place to an expression of calm content like that of a tired child asleep. Hearing no sound the little one crept up noiselessly, and getting on the bed nestled closely to her mother, the large living eyes bright with a mixed expression of pity, love, and wonder, the little hand stroking the dead face with a fond caressing movement inexpressibly touching. They looked strangely alike, and yet how fearfully different; their long hair mingling lovingly, stirred by the child's deep breath. I watched reverently, silently, till wearied with her grief, the young one fell into a light slumber. I left them lying there—both asleep—a strange solemn picture of Love and Death, full of the deepest poetry and beauty.

Two days after, poor Ellen was buried, and it was not long before I left the place. Jack had not then returned, and the little one was once more playing noisily with her doll, with no fear now of waking the child-mother at rest for ever. As I passed the cottage for the last time the bird was singing loudly, as though it had never left off. She told me it was father's bird; she fed it every morning against he came home: she wondered when that would be: and I, wondering the same—wondering when the erring heart, bursting from the trammels of ignorance and superstition, would return to find its utter desolation—passed on, and left the spot, probably for ever.

CHAPTER XVII.

DOÑA DE DOÑA LUCIA.

"THUS it ever is, caballeros, and ever will be," went on Captain Brand, in rather a reflecting strain. "There is a point to begin and stop, and an end to joy as well as grief. We should, however, take the world as it comes, and as it goes. I do, and so do you, compadre!"—pitching a cigar spar fashion at Don Ignacio to attract his attention—"and, therefore, we should never look too far ahead, and live only for the present.

"Indulging then in this train of principle, as I set down my lovely burden here, and the cloak fell from her shoulders, I was prepared for any thing which might happen. I wore a slightly different costume at the time than that she had been accustomed to see me in, as I always do when I think there might be a chance of a surprise or trap laid for us in entering the inlet. So instead of fine linen and silk I had on a red flannel shirt, dark trowsers, with a cutlass slung to my side and a pair of pistols in my belt. I don't think I appear handsome in that rig, but the fellows at my back somehow think it is becoming to me, especially when we are engaged in a hand-to-hand fight! What say you, compadre?"

The Don said nothing, and merely waved his forefinger, as if dress was not a matter to which he devoted much attention. He thought, however, that sleeves should be cut loose when the pockets were not too small for knives and pistols; but he uttered no word.

"Buono! There I stood"—joining to the middle of the room as he spoke—"dressed with ruin, and there stood my tall and lovely wife!

"The saloon was brilliantly lighted; a profusion of plants and flowers were clustered here, there, and every where, on cabinets and tables, in striking contrast to the display exhibited yonder in that armory, where pikes, muskets, and knives were gleaming through the open door.

"Quick as the lightning which was piercing deep into the inmost crevices of the rocks and the crag without, Lucia's dark eyes flashed around the apartment, from floor to ceiling, from flower to blade, resting an instant on the frame of miniatures there—here—was not among the collection then: it is the one in the middle, Doctor—"

There were no knives on the table, or else, from the deadly look the Doctor gave, he might have perhaps sprinkled the narrator's heart's blood on the floor.

"—Until at last her gaze of terror rested on me. By-the-way, Nancy, can tell the power of a Spanish girl, who has never seen them when the whole passion of their soul—either in love or hate—came springing in a black blaze of jet from their gleaming eyes!

"Advancing a step toward me, with her white hands clasped together, she said in a hurried voice—and low as was the sound I heard it distinctly during the crashing thunder which shook the rocks of the crag to their foundations—

"'Señor! where am I? My father! Who—who, in the name of the Blessed Virgin, art thou?'

"Again giving a look of the utmost horror around the room, she pressed her hands to her eyes, and said, in the same low, distinct tone,

"'Speak, Señor! For the love of our Holy Saviour, speak!'

"I felt that the girl had saved me, by her own instinctive appealing to the world of painful explanations, and I replied:

"'Lucia! I divine that in further concealments my assistance to you are in the hour of the most noted pirate of these seas, and that man stands before you!'

"Caballeros!" continued Captain Brand, "had my pretty prize swooned away, or fallen down in a fit, or gone into hysterics and torn her hair out by the roots, I should not have been greatly surprised, but she did none of those things. On the contrary, she became as calm as marble—frightfully so in fact—and pushing back the bands of her magnificent tresses from her pale forehead, she raised her round white arm aloft, with her slender forefinger quivering like the tongue of a viper in mid-air, and then poured forth a torrent of such woefully impressive words that I quailed before her.

"ADVANCING A STEP TOWARD ME, WITH HER WHITE HANDS

"Yes, Señores, I am no coward, take me who will; but on this occasion I must honestly admit that I stood powerless before the gaze and gesture of that slight, delicately formed woman.

"'Pirate—wretch—monster—may the curses of hell be heaped upon thee! Murderer—betrayer—may thy heart be burned, and thy soul blasted for ever!'

"I need not pain you, Señores, by reciting the cruel words that came hissing and surging through her closed teeth, nor yet farther describe the terrible concentrated gaze of hate and fury which streamed from those gleaming eyes. Suffice it to say, that though often afterward I was treated in the same manner, yet, on the occasion alluded to, I cut short the interview by summoning Babette to see her mistress to her chamber; and then, glad to escape, I went out of the house and attended to the duties which required my presence."

The Padre, with his flat lips half open, eagerly drinking in—with his Santa Cruz punch—the words of his patron; the Doctor, calm, unmoved now, and thoughtful; the one-eyed old rascal, still puffing his cigarettos and allowing no rest to his uneasy, suspicious optic; all sat listening, with each an interest peculiarly his own, to the fate of Doña Lucia. The narrator leisurely arose and held his hourly conflict with the man at the signal-station, and then returning to his place, proceeded with his discourse:

"I shall pass rapidly over, my friends, many little incidents of a rather unpleasant nature which occurred here, in this my rocky retreat, for some months after the interview which I have described. I tried every argument and persuasion I was master of to bring my proud bride to reason; but to all my entreaties she turned a cold and chilling stare of obdurate hate. Day by day the intensity of her detestation grew stronger and stronger, and seemed to have become a part of her nature. Yes! the gentle, yielding girl I had won on board the Centipede had now become as stern and unbending as a rock, and my controlling power over her mind and love were gone. I left her entirely to herself for some weeks, until one day I thought her passion might have subsided, and once more, attired in a rich and splendid suit, I went to her, as she sat like a marble statue at table. She never looked up at my entrance, but her eyes shone like stars as she sat mechanically going through the forms of the dinner laid before her.

"'Lucia!' I said, gayly. No answer by word or look. 'Lucia! querida mia!' I repeated, and sinking on one knee beside her, I attempted to take her hand.

"By all the saints, Señores, that came near—very near—being the last time that I ever should kneel to a woman; for with a movement so sudden that I had barely time to leap one side, she snatched a gaudily painted carving knife from the table and lunged full at my throat! The blade just grazed my jugular artery, inflicting a slight wound. But she never turned round to see the extent of her effort, and again sat calm and rigid at the table.

"This was my last visit save one. I abandoned these comfortable quarters entirely, and occupied the rooms you do, mi Padre, out there among the men. In fact, my stern young bride was in entire command of the island, and even my good Babette here stood in such awe of her that she always crossed herself when called to approach her mistress.

"Month by month matters went on in this way, until the winter had gone, and I was preparing for another cruise in the schooner; but hour by hour the consuming passion which flamed in the veins of Lucia was doing its work. I sometimes beheld her standing out on the verandah, tall and stately as ever; and when the moon was at the full, it threw its light upon her wan and sunken cheeks and thin wasted frame. Ay! there she stood like an almost transparent statue of alabaster, with her dark eyes, shining with an unearthly light, turned in one long fearless gaze upon the ledge and curling breakers to seaward. It was singular, too, the effect she produced even upon the horde of these brave fellows of mine, for no persuasion could induce a man of them to come within pistol-shot of that part of the house while she was [illegible] keeping her nightly vigils. And as for success to the coming cruise—we were to sail on the following Monday—and while I was returning from my usual stroll to the Tiger's Trap, to see the battery in order and the look-outs wide awake, I met Babette toddling along nearly out of breath.

"'What is it, old lady?' You know, amigos, that that same Babette never spoke a word in her life, but she made signs to let me know that I was wanted at the crag, and that there was no time to be lost. I quickened my pace, and, preceded by Babette, I once more darkened my own threshold. The curtains and hangings were all closely drawn in the saloon here, and it was dark as a tomb; but there was a light burning yonder in the passage leading to the chamber, and I made my way to the door.

"I shall never forget what I saw—though I should like to, as it comes to me sometimes in the night, or when I am left much alone by myself."

The Pirate passed his hands over his eyes as if he saw something as he spoke, and then letting his voice drop to an almost sepulchral pitch, he went on hurriedly:

"I stood at the door, caballeros, and looked in. On the bed, which was drawn to the middle of the chamber, to get the air through the narrow loophole windows, with the gauze curtains falling square on all sides, lay Lucia. Her attenuated, wasted frame, scarcely presented an uneven surface beneath the snowy sheet which covered her body. Her superb hair was spread in great black masses on the pillow, and her pale, marble face reposed there like an ivory picture in an ebony setting. Her eyes were wide open, large and luminous, and her thin delicate hands were clasped around a silver and pearl crucifix which rested on her low breast. A single taper in a silver lamp threw a lurid, flickering ray about the room, and beside it was Babette on her knees and quivering with terror, while from one of the loopholed windows a broad white band of moonlight streamed distinctly across the pillow and face of the dying girl."

"A SUPERNATURAL WARNING! YES, THAT FINGER—"

Captain Brand's face assumed a deathly pallor, and with his icy blue eyes fixed on vacancy, and his voice sunk to a hoarse whisper, he went on:

"As I appeared in the portals of the door Lucia slowly raised her forefinger and beckoned me to approach. I could no more have resisted the summons than if a chain-cable to a frigate's anchor had caught me in its iron coils and was dragging me to the bottom of the sea. I moved to the foot of the bed.

"'Pirata!' came from her slightly parted lips, in her old low and silvery tones. 'Pirata, behold your cruel work! Destroyer of mother and child—of soul and body—may the curses of a dying woman and her unborn child haunt you by day and by night!' I was dumb, and my pulse stopped beating. 'Ave Maria Purissima!' were the last words that came in a sweet, pure whisper from her lips: she clasped the crucifix tighter, and the spirit departed. I bent aside the gauze net to lay my hand on her heart, when, on my soul, her right hand slowly relaxed its death-grasp on the crucifix, and, rising to a vertical line, with the forefinger pointing upward, it quivered in the light of the waning moon like—as it was—a supernatural warning! Yes, that finger—"

"Mama! mama!" came in a weak, plaintive voice from the grass hut, and Babette, with hands before him as if to shut out a frightful vision, and eyeballs starting from their sockets, was hoarsely whispering to his horror-stricken audience the last warning of the dead Lucia.

As the low, moaning cry, in the stillness which reigned around the saloon, struck his ear he sprang with a bound to his feet, and quick as thought, with a pistol in each hand, he shouted, "Who's there?"

"It is the little sick boy, Señor! Do him no harm at your peril!" and the Doctor stood before the Pirate's leveled weapons.

"Maldito on the brat! Pshaw!" said Captain Brand, quieting down, and returning the pistols to his pockets, "how nervous I am! Excuse me, caballeros. I was thinking of something else."

CHAPTER XVIII.

END OF THE BANQUET.

In the pause which followed the dreadful episode just recounted by Captain Brand the Padre was occupied in pattering a prayer, counting his beads, and elevating his crucifix as if he was mumbling high mass at the altar. Don Ignacio slowly waved his brown forefinger, and his single spark of glowing eye glared fiercely and fixedly at his host. A clammy sweat burst out on the pallid brow of the Doctor, and his hands were clutched before him on the table like the jaws of a steel vice. And still the drunken shrieks and cheers of the piratical crew at the sheds arose wild and shrill in the calm night and made a gloomy dissonance for the banquet. The Doctor was the first to break the awkward silence which pervaded the saloon.

"Capitano!" said he, in his habitual calm, deep voice, "with respect to what you said in the early part of the evening, of breaking up this establishment, what, may I ask, are your plans for the future?"

"Gracias! amigo Doctor! Thank you, my friend, for changing the conversation. My plans! eh? ah! Well, they are these—"

Here Captain Brand's face assumed its usual expression, and entirely himself again, he went on to state, in a precise, business-like way, the views he had resolved upon for future action.

"To-morrow, gentlemen, is Sunday. Those boisterous fellows out there, after mass, will need rest all the day. On Monday, however, I shall begin to change the rig of the schooner, fill up with provisions for a long cruise, take on board all the loose odds and ends we have stowed here, of course," he added, as he remarked an inquiring and a rather alarmed mercenary look from the Tuerto's glim—"of course, after having squared up all claims of our compadre there!"

"Hum!" croaked that sharp rascal with a nod of satisfaction, glad to be let alone.

"Then, Señores, I shall burn or destroy the old sheds, and bury the cannon and heavy articles we can not find room for in the Centipede; when, if nothing happens, we shall trip anchor and spread our sails for sea!"

"Bueno! bueno!" said Don Ignacio, "I believe that dear old negress has fallen asleep. Babette! ah! there you are, my beauty! See if you can't give us a bowl of okra gumbo before we break up here!"

Babette had not been asleep. Oh no! She had her ear to the door of the saloon, and was listening to the sad history of Doña Lucia, and when her master came to the final scene the old woman fell on her knees and shivered all over, where she remained until the sound of the Captain's voice again called her to her duties.

"And when we have left these quiet waters, my son!" broke in the Padre, "what then?"

The fact was, that the carnivorous and vinous Father Ricardo knew that his stomach was not suited for high winds and rough oceans, and was hoping that some scheme might be devised to allow him to remain tranquilly on the island.

"Why, Holy Padre, I propose to steer clear of the West Indies by some unfrequented track, and, striking the broad Atlantic, stretch down the coast of Brazil. Perhaps we may double Cape Horn, and see what New Holland's pirate cots are fighting for in Chili and Peru; then maybe across the Pacific, to the lovely islands and maidens of Polynesia; or into the Indian Seas, where we may fall in with an outward-bound Canton trader, or a galleon with a ton or two of silver on board—who knows? there is plenty of blue water and fine ships every where: so we must be coming."

Padre Ricardo made the sign of the cross, kissed his thumb and forefinger, and reaching his paw over to the Captain, shook hands with him.

"Ay, amigos," continued the leader, without minding the friendly interruption; "ay, my friends, we shall, I trust, give the hounds in search of us the slip, and even should they scent out this retired little spot, they will have their trouble for their chase, and find nothing but a few stones and heaps of rubbish above ground."

"They may find some little matters below though," chimed in the commander of the felucca.

"If they do," retorted the Pirate, with a meaning scowl, "I'll put the spy who betrays it to such a torture as this that will wish himself below ground when I come back here."

"Cierto, amigo! no fear of that!" muttered the Tuerto, with some little trepidation of manner. "My papers are white."

"Captain Brand," said the Doctor, "my contract with you is nearly up, and since I only agreed—as you know—to enlist my professional services here on shore, I presume you will have no objections to permit me to depart with Don Ignacio in the felucca."

It would be difficult to say what caused the flush of passion which overspread the leader's face as he listened to this simple request, but it was a full minute before he replied, and then, having weighed the matter carefully in his mind, he said, in a precise and determined tone, in French:

"Monsieur le Docteur! the compacts that I have made with all those that have taken service with me have never been broken except by death. I can not, therefore, consider your request, and I shall expect you to sail with me in the schooner."

Then he added quickly, as he noticed a certain haughty expression in his subordinate's face: "Pardon me, Monsieur, we had better not discuss this question now. Suppose you see me on the morrow."

"Willingly, Señor, and you will find my resolution unchanged!" Whereupon the Doctor with his searching, shark-like eyes until he had left the apartment, and there was something that denoted danger in the look; but he uttered no sound, and, placing a finger on his lip, he nodded meaningly to the Padre.

A moment after Babette brought in the steaming gumbo soup, and the Pirate's feast was nearly ended. Don Ignacio and Babette his companions had swallowed a goodly portion of the grateful mess, when he too refreshed himself. Then making his salutations in his usual observant manner, he departed. He declined, however, the offer of his host's society to his boat, saying he had, he knew, half a dozen of the felucca's crew outside the building to guard his footsteps, and he would not put the Capitano to the trouble.

When the Padre rose to give his benediction to his patron, the Captain took that opportunity by the rope which girded his cassock about the loins, and giving it a sharp jerk or two, he said:

"My Holy Father, I think we shall have a sad duty to perform to-morrow. Our old friend Gibbs has behaved badly, and I shall punish him. He is now in the Capella dungeon. After early mass go and console him."

The Padre returned a steaming smile, crossed himself, and slowly left the Pirate alone in his saloon.

QUASHY QUANDO.

LET me lay a detaining hand upon this skirte of the fast-retreating past, and chronicle a few of the sayings and doings of Quashy Quando.

Of my hero's parentage and ancestry I can say nothing, for they are involved in obscurity as black as his own skin; and in this connection his biographer can only vouch to two facts—viz., that his birthplace was the Guinea Coast of Africa, and that he had a mother; for in his softer moments old Quashy would often tell of the hot summer morning when his "mammy," placing a calabash in his hand, bade the little naked urchin bring her some cool water from the spring; and how he, hastening on his errand, reached his fountain, stooped, and was about to dip his gourd in the clear water, when he started at the sight of a fierce bearded face reflected up into his own, and turned to find himself in the grasp of a alligator.

"Poor old mammy done wait long 'nough for dat yere cal'bash o' water!" Quashy would add, with a sigh, as he finished the story.

Brought across the ocean, the little fellow (who had been upon the passage treated more as a plaything than a slave) was sold to the head of a New England family for this was while slavery was tolerated at the North), to whom he stood unto him the name of Julius Cæsar; but whether from doubt of his own ability to support this illustrious cognomen, or from attachment to the name of his infancy, the wild little barbarian would never reply to either command, summons, or request made in this name, but would sit or stand staring at vacancy with a stolid expression of indifference on his sunburnt features, or at most with a sullen twitch of the shoulders, defying alike scourge or flattery. But let the appellation be changed to "Quashy," and the perverse little creature would apply to it with pleased alacrity. So my hero's point was finally conceded; and although the experiment was occasionally resumed during the course of his long life, it was always with the same result.

Quashy did not love work, and infinitely preferred basking at full length in the July sun to hoeing corn. This partiality was occasionally brought him into trouble, and on one occasion was made the subject of severe comment by his master, a physician in good practice. Quashy listened patiently to the lecture, and when it was finished asked, tryly,

"Work no good for nigger, why no good for white man, Massa? Why you no work, massa?"

"I? I do work, Quashy—I work hard."

"What work you do, massa? You no hoe corn."

"No, I don't hoe corn; but I work, Quashy—I do head-work," replied the good-natured Doctor.

"Head-work—oh yes, I know him; he berry hard fink," suggested the other, with a look of intelligence and abnsidering his hoe, narcled off to his labors.

Later in the day my ancestor, returning from his round of visits, passed his corn-field, and beheld Quashy seated on a grass-mat, his chin resting on his two fists, and gazing in the full heat of the noontide sun.

"Hillo, my fellow!" exclaimed the Doctor. "What's that you work at?"

"Am, massa, hard to work; doin' head-work."

"Head-work, you fool! What head-work are you doing?"

"Tell'ee, massa. See dem two blackbirds on big apple-tree?"

"Yes, I see them, boy."

"Well, massa, I tinkin' 'pose I trow 'tone an' kill one bird, how many bird he lef' on tree. 'Pose massa can tell right off?"

"Certainly, you simpleton. There would be one left. Couldn't you tell that for yourself?"

"Hi! hi! hi!" laughed Quashy, rolling on the ground in ecstasy, "I always 'spise de head-work better dan yourn, massa! Dere be none lef', massa, 'cause 'tother fly away!"

Some years later, Quashy, returning from the field one evening, was met by Venus, the black cook, that Miss Patty had got a beau, and that they were "courting" in the kitchen.

"Pose you kerry in dis yer armful of wood, Quash," mentioned the cook, with a look at the gentman.

Quashy accepted the errand, and after a short absence returned to the kitchen with an approving expression on his broad black face.

"Berry good-lookin' young massa," reported he, "What he name, Venus?"

"Name Lord, sho man; come all de way from Boston."

"Dat him, Venus, 'cause de nigger is tickled—tickled mos' a deb to tink de Lord get one o' massa cullers; for I swear I 'tink de debbil get all 'e rest!"

Another of Quashy's witticisms was perpetrated upon a brother of his master's, one of those careless genial individuals, who are always out at their own, who sincerely wish more love than respect their inferiors and dependents.

This gentleman standing in his door-way one day observed Quashy returning to work with a great big pipe in his back, and evidently a little the worse for liquor.

"Hillo, Quashy, what have you got in your bag that makes you reel about the street so? What's your load?"

"Load, Massa Billy?" groaned Quashy, without looking up or pausing, "load 'nough for sartin, but 'taint nothing you need begrutch to an old nigger; 'taint nuffin but humanity an' poverty, an you got heaps o' dem yer 'cruday."

Another of Quashy's repartees was at the expense of a certain Judge Payne, a gentleman more celebrated for the fertility in rs than the suavity in modo.

Standing on the steps of the court-house in company with some other lawyers, the judge was saluted by Quashy, who was passing, with the question,

"How you do, Massa Payne; tell an ole nigger what's de last news from?"

"News?" growled the judge, surlily, "news is that the devil's dead."

"Ah, is dat so? Dead, poor fellow; well I know he been in Payne an long time, but I neber know he dead."

remarked Quashy, with an air of great concern, as he passed quietly on.

Do you Shave?

We have a private word for our unfortunate masculine brothers; excluding the gentler ear merely because nature has granted them an immunity from the care entailed on us—sharing. For several years we performed the matutinal cutting and slashing operation, facetiously termed shaving, ignorant of aught to ameliorate the rasped condition in which we invariably found our human face divine. One little year since, after reading in every professional journal, published in every conceivable place, a succession of complimentary worded advertisements of Burnett's Kalliston, we decided to try the preparation—Burnett! inventor of this balm of Gilead, if we had our way a monument of purest marble should rise to your honor, to be paid for by a tax on barbers' shops! We now rejoice in a smooth skin, and would censor part with our new patent leather boots, than our bottle of Kalliston.—Boston Saturday Express.

Sweet's Infallible Liniment is prepared from the recipe of the late Dr. Sweet, of Connecticut, who was a regular bone setter, and has been used in his practice for the last twenty years with the most astonishing success. As an external remedy it is without a rival, and will alleviate pain more speedily than any other liniment. For all Rheumatic and Nervous Disorders it is truly infallible, and as a curative for Sores, Wounds, Sprains, Bruises, &c., its soothing, healing and powerful strengthening properties excite the just wonder and admiration of all who have ever given it a trial. Over four hundred certificates of remarkable cures performed by it within the last two years attest this fact.

American Statesman:

A POLITICAL HISTORY, exhibiting the Nature, Origin and Principles of our Federal and Constitutional Government in the United States; the Rise and Progress of Parties; and the Views of Distinguished Statesmen on Questions of Foreign and Domestic Policy.

By Andrew W. Young.

Large Octavo, Library. Sheep. Price $3 50.

This work embraces the whole period of our governmental history, commencing with the brief "compact" drawn up by the Pilgrim Fathers in their landing, down to the present administration.

It presents the views of our statesmen, and the action of the government on all the prominent questions of public policy which have arisen under the constitution, and which have divided the people into parties.

An important feature of the work is, that in controverted questions, whether involving constitutional principles or mere questions of policy, the main arguments on both sides are impartially given, and submitted to the consideration and judgment of the reader.

Subjoined to the work is an Appendix, containing the Declaration of Independence, Articles of Confederation, a statement of the Electoral Votes that have been given for the different candidates for the Presidency, etc., etc.

A MUSICAL NOVELTY.

Tillman's Musical Treatise and Tonometer supplies a want long felt, by fully explaining all the laws of Sound which relate to Melody and Harmony. A practical application of the more abstruse portions of the Theory is made by a new method, readily acquired, but not easily forgotten. The Tonometer shows to the eye the same results in musical intervals made in true modulations, as well as those used on all keyed instruments. The arrangement is such that a child may comprehend the ordinary musical examples, as it is a key to the solution of all problems arising from temperament. This production has already elicited the approval of BRISTOW, STRADELLA, MARPETZER, ANCHUTZ, and many other prominent artists. The following is an extract from a letter written by the author for an eminent pianist and composer:

DEAR SIR,—I send your treatise on Sound, accompanied by your Tonometer, and was struck with the concise manner with which you embrace and methodize the vast subject of Analysis of Sound, and practical application of the same. We need simplified methods to expound the now apparently as complicated science, and it seems to me that your invention is a valuable innovation in the sphere of instruction.

Very truly yours,
ROBERT GOLDBECK.

FRENCH'S CONICAL WASHING MACHINE.

N.B. Price only $10

Price only Ten Dollars.

One woman, with this simple, compact, durable, portable, efficient, and economical machine, can easily and perfectly do the washing of an ordinary family before breakfast.

This is the only machine that will wash all kinds of clothes without the least injury. It has been tested in the laundry of French's Hotel and elsewhere, with all other washing machines making any pretension to merit in this city, and has in every instance, performed its work in less than half the time required by any other, and much more thoroughly and satisfactorily.

It will wash the single handkerchief, collar, lace sleeve, six shirts, or all of these articles together, without the necessity of soaking or boiling.

These results are produced by the constant reaction of the suds, and total destruction of rubbing surfaces. It is admirably adapted for introduction into houses with stationary tubs, as it may be inserted and connected with the waste and water pipes, and will make an important feature in houses "with all the modern improvements."

In Families, Laundries, Hotels, Boarding-houses, Hospitals, Asylums, Boarding-schools, on Ships and Steamers, and in the Army, it will be found unequaled and indispensable.

This machine may be seen in operation at the laundry of French's Hotel, and at the depot, No. 419 Broadway, corner of Canal Street.

PRICE ONLY TEN DOLLARS.

Entire satisfaction given or the money returned.

N. B.—The undersigned, Proprietors, are now prepared to organize agencies for the sale of these machines in all parts of the country, and to supply orders to any extent.

VOL. IV.—No. 180.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 9, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

GENERAL GARIBALDI.

We publish on the preceding page a portrait of General Garibaldi, who is evidently going to be the hero of the new Italian war.

Joseph Garibaldi is the type of the gallant soldier of fortune, to whom the excitement of war is a necessity; but who, when his country's opportunity arrives, is never found wanting among her defenders. Of all the Italian patriots of 1848 he is, without doubt, the ablest, most sensible, and most respectable.

He was born at Nice, fifty-two years ago, of a good family. While yet a lad, he entered the naval service of Sardinia, and distinguished himself by several acts of bravery; but having taken part in a revolutionary movement at Genoa in 1834, he was obliged to fly the country. He took refuge in France, and shortly afterward accepted a command in the fleet of the Bey of Tunis. A very few months' service disgusted him with the Moors, and he sailed from the Mediterranean to South America, where war was raging on the La Plata. He offered his services to the President of Uruguay, and obtained the command of the fleet which was then fighting against Buenos Ayres. His occupation was destroyed shortly afterward by the Anglo-French intervention; but, nothing disconcerted, Garibaldi raised a partisan corps of 2000 men, and fought gallantly for a long period of seven years.

Altogether he spent many years in South America, winning golden opinions, and acquiring a thorough knowledge of partisan warfare. He married a South American lady, whose beauty was as remarkable as her courage and devotion to her husband. She accompanied him in all his military movements, was by his side at the time of his greatest dangers, and died at last, of fatigue and distress of mind, during the disastrous retreat from Rome.

In 1848 the cry of Italian liberty reached Garibaldi in South America, and in a few weeks he was on Italian soil. The champion of Italy, then as now, was the King of Sardinia; to him Garibaldi offered his sword, and readily obtained the command of a corps d'armee to operate on those very same Alpine ridges where we hear of his victories now. He knows the ground, and the people know him. During the brief but disastrous war of 1848-49 Garibaldi achieved success, and Piedmont was overmatched, and the day came when the gallant partisan was compelled to lay down his sword. He settled in Piedmont, became a member of the Sardinian Chamber of Deputies, and took a leading part as a member of the Opposition.

The proclamation of the Roman Republic again roused him to action. He called his faithful legion together, and arrived at Rome in time to take the lead in the restoration of order. He had at this time with him Mazzini and all the other Italian patriots, very few of whom could compare with him in respect of experience or common sense, though not unfrequently their noisiness gave them an advantage over him with the Roman populace. The moment was critical. Rome was about to be attacked by the French. The French general, Oudinot, who perhaps had never heard of Garibaldi, despised his preparations for defense. He sent against him a corps of 3000 French troops, which Garibaldi very quickly defeated, and sent flying back in confusion. Another enemy—500 Neapolitans—marching upon Palestrina, Garibaldi hastened to meet them too, and with his legion, 3000 strong, he utterly routed them. Within a day or two afterward, at Velletri, he was equally successful, and was badly wounded. So unequal a contest, however, could not last long. The French were steadily advancing on Rome, and all that could be done was to prepare the old city to stand a siege. This Garibaldi did so well, that, though his fortifications, as every one knows, are in a ruinous condition, he held the French at bay for a whole month, to the amazement of their generals, and the great indignation of the Imperator. When it became certain at last that the city must fall, he proposed to his colleagues to blow up the bridges, abandon the city, and take to the hills. This desperate counsel was not followed. He then resolved to do it with his legion. His speech on that occasion would have done no dishonor to Brutus or the Gracchi: "Soldiers," he said, "in recompense of the love you have borne your country I offer you hunger, thirst, cold, war, and death; who accepts the terms let him follow me." The enthusiastic people hailed him to a man. The day before the surrender, Garibaldi, at the head of his faithful partisans, cut his way through the enemy's lines, and made his escape to the little republic of San Marino. There he dismissed his comrades, and, with two hundred men, embarked for Genoa.

It was now evident to the practical mind of Garibaldi that the revolutionary movement was crushed, and that further resistance would be hopeless. He made up his mind resolutely to dismiss politics from his thoughts till a better time came, and to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. After a brief stay at Genoa he sailed for New York.

He never came here. A candle factory which he established on Staten Island in conjunction with the celebrated tenor singer, Lorenzo Salvi, defrayed his expenses for a while. But the wily singer was more than a match, in business matters, for the patriot, and the candle factory failed. Garibaldi then started off to California, which was then the "promised land" for all adventurers. Shortly after his arrival there an American vessel in the port of San Francisco lent her captain; the post was offered to Garibaldi, who accepted it, sailed to China, and thence to Peru. In the latter country he could not resist an offer which was made to him of the chief command of the Peruvian army; but the Peruvian tactics, it would seem, did not exactly please him. He took the first opportunity of returning to his early vocation—the sea. For several years he commanded trading vessels, which not unfrequently resulted in New York, where Garibaldi was always received as a hero by his fellow-countrymen.

When the war in Italy broke out, Garibaldi at once appeared on the scene as the leader of a partisan force, under the general direction of the King of Sardinia. His exploits in Northern Italy are well known; he contributed not a little to the success of the campaign.

Since the conclusion of the peace Garibaldi has met with new troubles. His début as a member of the Sardinian Parliament was unsatisfactory to his friends and very distasteful to himself. His marriage with a daughter of Count Raimondi proved still more unfortunate. Domestic scenes the lady of frailties both prior and subsequent to her marriage; and Garibaldi, it is said, not only insisted on the law for her marriage, but spent three months in utter despair on a desert island.

Let us hope that his career in Sicily will efface the recollection of those sorrows.

THE WOOF OF LIFE.

I.

In the noontide glare and midnight gloom
A weaver is busily driving his loom;
And the woof of life is thrown off slow,
As the ponderous beam moves to and fro.
Strange figures are wrought for the world to view—
Over and over, for now and new,
The same old patterns are woven slow,
As the ponderous beam moves to and fro.

II.

Beautiful tresses and sire's face,
The hands of the weaver carefully place;
With hair and vanity, youth and age,
Crossed, recrossed, and woven in:
The pattern comes forth a scene of despair—
No hope of heaven is pictured there:
But a woman dying in wretchedness low,
As the ponderous beam moves to and fro.

III.

A brow that is furrowed by scenes of care
Is pencil by the weaver cunningly there,
And with greed of gain and love of gold
Is deftly woven: the tale is told
Of a life misspent, a heart with clutching hands,
The miser grasps at his gold and lands,
While death's bears him off in the endless woe,
As the ponderous beam moves to and fro.

IV.

A face bloodwritten is new thrust in,
With mantled cheek, for it is a sad sin,
A broken heart and a ruined name,
That once graced beauty in the path of fame!
This pattern is woven with little care,
For the weaver knows enough is the same there:
In the libertine's death bed's torments glow,
As the ponderous beam moves to and fro.

V.

A thoughtful face and a beaming eye,
With kisses of love and friendship's tie,
And faith and hope and charity free,
Are hid in the pattern that now we see:
The life is ending, but promises cheer
The kind friend who is left to mourn dear:
And the hopes through death in those promises show,
As the ponderous beam moves to and fro.

VI.

In the noontide glare and midnight gloom
The weaver is busily driving his loom:
The threads are many, the woof is long;
The patterns are scenes that end the strife
Of love and sorrow, of joy and woe:
The labors of sin or of pious zeal
As we weave from life to death's last thee,
As the ponderous beam moves to and fro.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 9, 1860.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END IN ITALY.

WE make no apology for devoting so much of our space hereafter to illustrations of the impending war in Southern Italy. As compared with that conflict, the Japanese visit to the United States, the reception of the Prince of Wales, the voyage of the Great Eastern, and such occurrences, are trivial in the extreme.

The course of civilization and human freedom depends, for a time, upon the success of Garibaldi. There are conjunctures in every age when the triumph or defeat of great principles hinges on the fortune of individuals. Had Charles Martel been beaten at Tours, Europe might have been Mohammedan. Had Bonaparte won Waterloo, the world might have been French. Had Washington died at Valley Forge, we might have been in the condition of the Canadas, and historians would probably have now been writing about the absurdity of democratic systems of governments. Just so, at the present time, if Garibaldi's invasion of Southern Italy be crushed out, millions of people will conclude that God is on the side of despotism.

This is not a mere question of good or bad government for the twelve millions of Italians. It matters very little, practically, to the world at large how these millions are governed, and whether they are happy or miserable. Wise men—of liberal instincts—have been so disgusted by their degradation as to denounce them as only fit to be trampled. They are, however, a mere secondary consideration. The question at issue is, whether tyrants like Francis of Naples and Pius of Rome can maintain their infernal doctrine to crush out human God's creatures, or whether there is and must be a divine retribution for such acts as theirs. The question is, whether men—living in Italy, or in Germany, or in France, or in Russia, or anywhere—have a right to their rational freedom or not. This is the point to be decided. If Garibaldi and his movement be crushed out, statesmen, and preachers, and journalists will argue that it was unwise, and contrary to divine intention; if they be successful, the same authorities will assume that it was providential, and monarchs will tremble on their thrones. Democracy, in the abstract, hangs in the balance.

We believe, for our part, that we are witnessing the beginning of the end. Garibaldi may be killed; but if he can hold out a few weeks longer, we believe that he will have kindled a flame which all the powers of Rome and Naples will be insufficient to quench. We look hopefully forward to see that glorious country—Southern Italy—one of the parks and curses which have so long defiled it, and fulfilling the destiny for which it was created, by becoming one of the noblest, happiest, and richest portions of the world.

IRISH ETHICS.

THE Dublin newspapers contain a proclamation warning Irishmen against enlisting in the service of the Pope. This became necessary in consequence of the enrollment of Irishmen—at the rate of forty or sixty weekly—in a brigade which a Papal agent is now raising in the Emerald Isle. Similar demonstrations of sympathy with the cause of Pius the Ninth have been witnessed in this country; here, however, they have assumed a practical shape in donations of money—not men.

It is by no means to be assume that the Irishmen who are willing to fight for the Pope or to hire others to fight for him, are ignorant of the nature of the impending contest. Irishmen are generally accurate of information; but they can hardly be so abominably ignorant as not to know that the Papal cause is the cause of oppression, superstition, and despotism, and that the cause of the Roman people is the cause of liberty, truth, democracy, and toleration. No child mistakes the issue—and discouraging as the progress of Irish Rich has been thus far in education, they can not be in error on the point.

It follows that the thousand odd Irishmen who abandoned work at Trieste to enroll themselves among the defenders of the Pope, and the hundreds who volunteered in Ireland, and the thousands who will take money here, are deliberately taking the side of brutal despotism and blind oppression against rational liberty and progressive light.

The fact will enlighten the world on the nature of the next contest in Ireland. Hitherto, many Americans have been in the habit of considering the Irish Catholic people, and of wishing them success in their struggles against the dominant English. But if the Irish idea of good government be the hideous tyranny enthralled at Rome civilization can be no gainer by their independence.

MEXICO AGAIN.

SOME of the papers are talking about "the beginning of the end" in Mexico, on the strength of the breach between Zuloaga and Miramon. Let us take care not to be hasty in coming to conclusions.

The readers of this journal do not require to be reminded that the pending conflict in Mexico is the old fight between Church and people which has been fought out in England, France, Sweden, Spain, and Germany, and which—under modern conditions—is being fought out in Italy—a fight inevitable in every country in which superstition on the one side, and ecclesiastical greed on the other, have built up a State Church and fattened it at the expense of the land. The Roman Catholic Church in Mexico owns the bulk of the productive lands in that country, and consequently aspires to rule it. It can afford to keep armies on foot and to hire generals to lead them. On the other hand, the people are conscious of the mischief which the Church has done them, and seek to get rid of it. Hence the Conflict. The Church calls itself Conservative, and hires first one, then another—first Zuloaga, then Miramon—to crush out its enemies. Its strength is in its money. The people call their party Liberals, and seek—with some incidental errors—to establish a Government on a popular basis, independently of ecclesiastical control. They are led by various chiefs—men of capacity being more plentiful on the other side than here.

Now no careful student of history needs to be warned how this conflict must end. Wherever the people have been roused against bloated hierarchies they have prevailed, and the creatures of superstition have gone to the wall. It is about to be so in Italy; it will be so in Mexico. The Pope and the Archbishop of Guadalaxara will both need a refuge in some neutral country before our generation dies out. But we must not allow ourselves to think that one battle will settle the affair, at least in Mexico. Such immense wealth as the Mexican Church possesses, and such immense power as it wields over the superstitious minds of the Mexican peasantry, are not to be conquered in a day. The Mexican Church will die hard.

Foreign interference has already delayed the American consummation. A pig-headed Briton—Mr. Otway, whose sole thought was to embarrass the United States—succeeded for years in leading the support of England to the Church party. Although Lord Malmesbury, the Foreign Minister—did the same thing for other purposes. Our own representatives in Mexico have gravely injured the popular cause by indiscreet manifestations of sympathy, which have enabled the priest party in accusing their adversaries of undue familiarity with foreigners. Altogether, thus far, foreign interference in Mexico has been pernicious.

What we and the rest of the civilized world have to do is very simple—it is simply to remain quiet and to look on. Compromises and armed interventions will only aggravate, can not cure the disease. The fight must be fought on till it is fought out. The Mexican Church must be stripped of its ill-gotten gain, and that by the Mexican people without foreign aid. If we and other foreigners let Mexico alone, this will come to pass before very long; and then Mexico will enjoy a stable and a safe Government, a respectable foreign commerce, and a large and prosperous home industry. But we must not try to hasten events.

THE LOUNGER.

THACKERAY UPON THE FIGHT.

In the new number of the Cornhill Magazine, not yet published, Thackeray treats of the late fight, as in the ninth chapter of Mr. "The unsentimental Traveler," published in the Weekly of last week, Dickens has a sly little word about the combatants. Thackeray talks of it like a genuine Briton, as they all do, in fact, over the sea, except the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, and as if there were much sense of the Bull and the John in their view of the matter.

"I am not going to expatiate on the battle, have read in the correspondent's letter of a Northern newspaper, that in the midst of the company assembled the Prince's humble servant was present, and in a very polite society, too, of lords, clergymen, men of letters, and members of both Houses of Parliament. For, I must have been asleep in the station in my sleep, paid three guineas in a profound fit of mental abstraction, and returned to bed unconscious. I certainly was not present at the time when history relates that the fight was over. I do not know whose colors I wore—the Benicius's, or those of the Irish champion—I remember where the fight took place, which, indeed, no somnambulist is bound to recollect. Ought Mr. Sayers to be honored for being brave, or punished for being naughty? By the shade of Brutus the elder, I don't know.

"In George III.'s time there was a turbulent navy lieutenant (Handsome Smith he was called—his picture is at Greenwich now, in brown velvet, and gold and sword-knot, his cocked hat under his waist-coat exceedingly handsome; but his face by no means the beauty)—there was, I say, a turbulent young lieutenant, who was found on the quarter-deck of the French ambassador for obliging a French ship of war to lower her topsails to a British ship at Spithead. But, by the King's orders, Tom was next day made Captain Smith. Well, if I were absolute king, I would send Tom Sayers to the mill for a month, and make him Sir Thomas on coming out of Clerkenwell. You are a naughty boy, Tom! but then, you know, we ought to be good or bad together, though ever so naughty. We are moralists, and reprimand you; and you are hereby reprimanded accordingly. But in the mean time should ever have need of a few score thousand champions, who laugh at danger; who cope with giants; who, beaten to the ground, jump up and begin the rally, and fall, and rise again, and strike, and die rather than yield—in case the country should need such boys, and you should know them, be pleased to send lists of the misguided persons to the principal police stations, where means may some day be found to enroll them in companies, and give their deplorable energies a right direction. Suppose, Tom, you and your friends are glad against an immense invader—suppose you are bent on holding the ground, and dying there, if need be rather than yield—is life, freedom, home, you are fighting for, and there is a death-dealing sword or rifle in your hand, with which you are going to maintain those tremendous enemy with all your championship on your native shore? Then, Sir Thomas, resist him to the death, and it is all right: all Islam, and Europe even likes you. Drive him into the sea, and there destroy, smash, and drown him; and let us sing, Laudamus. In these national cases, and in these only, the individual puts on the lion of morals. Loving your neighbor is very well, but suppose your neighbor will not be justified in humbly trying to pitch him into the water? If it were the King of Belgium himself we must do so. I mean that fighting, of course, is wrong; but that there are occasions when, etc.—I suppose I may that one-handed fight of Sayers is most spirit-stirring little story with every love and respect says to her, 'Do, madam, keep your t and gentle remarks for another day. Have the great kindness to stand a levée aside, and just let us see you or two more rounds between the men. That little man with the one hand powerless on his breast facing yonder giant for hours, and telling him, too, every now and then! It is the little Jass and the Constitution over again.

"I think it a most fortunate event for the brave Heenan, who has acted and written since the battle with a true warrior's courtesy, and with a great deal of good logic, too, that the battle was a drawn one. The advantage was all on Mr. Sayers's side. Say a young lad of sixteen insults me in the street, and I run and thrash him, and do it. Well, I have thrashed a young lad. You great, big tyrant, couldn't you hit your own size? But say the lad thrashes me in the latter case! I walk away discomfited; but in the latter, I am positively put to shame. Now, when the ropes were cut from that death-grip, and Sir Thomas released by the peacemakers, the Ko-rope-an laws—the gentleman of Benicia was confessedly blind of one eye, and possibly otherwise was blind of both. Could Mr. Sayers have held out for three minutes, for ten minutes more? He says he could. So we say we could have held out, and did, and had beaten off the enemy at Waterloo, even if the Prussians hadn't come up. The numbers differ pretty much according to the nature of the opinants. I say the Duke and Tom could have held out, that they meant to hold out, that they did hold out, and that there has been ratifying enough. That crowd which came in and stopped the fight ought to be considered like one of those divine clouds which the gods send in Homer:

"'Apello shrouds
The godlike Trojan in a vail of clouds.'

It is the best way of getting the godlike Trojan out of the scrape, don't you see. The nodus is cut; Tom is out of the scrape; the Benicia Boy ad a lib the worse, nay, better than if he had beaten the little man. He has not the humiliation of conquest. He is grounded, still to be loved more hereafter by the gentle sex. Suppose he had overcome the godlike Trojan? Suppose he had tied Tom's corpse to his rain-bow and driven to Paradise, smoking the pipe of triumph? Faugh! the great hulking conqueror! Why did you not hold your hand from yonder beer? Your body, I say, was wearied by that opportune appearance of the British gods, protectors of native valor, who interfered and 'withdrew' their champion."

TOM BROWN.

MR. HUGHES, the author of "School-days at Rugby," and the editor of Macmillan's Magazine, is writing a serial continuation of his first novel. It is called "Tom Brown at Oxford," and appears here in monthly parts from Tickner & Co. The novel is strictly of the Prize-Ring school. Its details of English Public life are vivid and interesting, and as an illustrative treatise upon muscular Christianity it is extremely amusing. It is the apotheosis of muscle. The action of the story for the six months now ended, and of the first three hundred pages of the book, is the training for a boat-race in which Tom's boat, that of St. Ambrose, wins. The hero, thus far, is not Tom, but Hardly—a poor, proud, pious servitor of the most formidable brogue, a tremendous boxer, a tremendous rower, a tremendous scholar, and a tremendous Christian. In its details of boating and training the book is curiously accurate, but interesting; and the scenes are all sharply cut. But the delicate didactic effort is so apparent—the "good boy" is so unquestionably the book hero—that what probably would profoundly appal the author, is "spoony." The effort to show that a good scholar and a good man is not necessarily a milksop is timely and commendable, but it is overdone in Tom Brown at Oxford, as it is in several of the recent popular novels.

The book, so far, is thoroughly English; and it is curious to see how like and very unlike we are to our cousins. The life described is no more like that of an American college town than that of a Paris student; and yet we are almost at home in it all the time. It is entirely realistic, and might be the diary of an Oxford man. The only literature of which three hundred pages, we have any glimpse is Miss Winter, who is just now introduced, and Patty, a pretty bar-maid, with whom Tom fancies himself in love, but as we say plays no other part in the story. Indeed, there is no plot at all. It is a description of University life at Oxford, in a series of character tiaces. It all lies in full daylight. There are no shades, no mysteries, no doubtful suspense, no romance of any kind, in the usual sense of the word. Neither has it the faintest touch of imagination. Thackeray is said to be destitute of imagination; but let the reader compare the University life of Pendennis with that of Tom Brown, and remark the singular difference of impression. The foolishness of folly is just as apparent in Pendennis, and the value of pluck: but it is not preached at you any more than it is in Tom; and, without speaking ill, a kind of poetic aura hangs around the whole narration, as if college and its life were felt by the reader as Pendennis himself felt it. It is not told to him by a head-master.

Mr. Hughes's story is the work of a clever man, and it is good, hearty reading. It has a very obvious and very wholesome purpose; and if young men at the English Universities do not hereafter prefer the path of honor, and industry, and gymnastics to that of self-indulgence and sin, it will be fault of the historian of Tom Brown.

enthusiasm which marks every thing he does. For Mr. Milnes not only speaks, but he writes, eloquently; and, moreover, his eloquent writing is delightful reading. His feeling for wild nature and adventure is so fresh and genuine and warm, that in his brain the stories of the old Spanish conquerors and explorers upon our southern shores acquires a new romance and interest. The search for the fountain of youth, the desperate march across the continent to the shores of the great river, and the wide sea of life all are poetically and irresistibly appeal to the quick fancy of the fervid preacher; and the blind man showers color and richness upon his pages.

The substance of this work was thrown into the form of lectures before the Lowell Institute in Boston, a few years ago. The interest and attention they then excited will be more than renewed by the collected printed form. Himself a descendant of the Western and Southern spirit, although born upon the Atlantic border, profoundly loyal to the life, literature, and institutions of his native land among whom he has long lived, the author speaks and writes with a generous ardor which will to us who know him seem the more heartily prized in the regions which it describes, while it is to all others an admirable illustration of their special genius.

WITH WILL BE THE HANSON PARK tower

completed with perhaps suggest to some wise man what a capital thing a convenient and cheap vehicle she would be, which to the visitors of Hanson Park those noble pleasure-grounds. It may be interesting intelligence to somebody that there is a fortune to be made by the man who will introduce cabs in New York. He has only to provide clean and easy vehicles of this kind, put and keep the charges at rigorously low rates, and he will have, as a course, and lower if he dare, and the demand for them would be delightful and surprising to the brave man who plunges in boldly.

There are, perhaps, more than two objections to the public hacks. They are very dirty and inconvenient, and the drivers are the most brazen in settling with the coacher. But if you and your friend could take an open Hansom cab on Broadway, drive up to the door of Brandreth, and out to the Park, bowl along its smooth hard roads, seeing every thing and every body as you go, and return in an open wagon, and back again to any point you chose, and all for a little money, attended with the blissful consciousness that you were going to be insulted and cheated, what greater evidence of a triumphant civilization could you demand?

A Hansom cab is a very light, strong square-topped gig with a seat for the driver behind. It is a gondola on wheels. The lines pass over your head as you sit. You see only the horse's head, his wide, wide world before you, and you direct Cabby through a little door in the gig top. It is just the thing for the Park, if it can be kept at just the price for the thing.

THE NEW NIAGARA.

MR. CURNCH's picture, followed by that of Mr. Cignous, seemed so fully to have done the work of representing the great cataract that, unless Mr. Thorpe's had been there, one might have have known how inexhaustible the subject is. That Mr. Thorpe's name, also, has been hitherto ranked with the other painters of Niagara only makes the pleasure in his work also a surprise. He has selected, for his view, an imaginary point immediately in front of the Falls, from which level every part can be seen, and yet distant enough for the harmonious combination of the whole. The great objects all are there, and, of course, the old familiar ones; but he has so happily chosen and grouped that the majesty and grandeur of the spectacle have a genuine freshness and charm. Mr. Thorpe's picture is distinguished by simplicity and breadth. It is not a panorama, and owes its fullest impression which the traveler derives from studying the falls from many points and at leisure moments. It is the picture which he will bring away in our minds, even if we have not seen it with our eyes; for, strictly speaking, nobody has ever seen precisely the scene which it gives us.

As a work for engraving it is especially admirable. It is much too technically excellent to be considered in the light of a mechanical labor, henceforth we shall have a right to require and expect from Mr. Thorpe beautiful pictures.

DOG LAW.

SOMEBODY was recently bitten by a dog belonging to Mr. Nibb and brought a suit for damages. For some reason or other the jury felt that a man should not be able to recover against another who indulges himself in keeping wild beasts in a difficult question to be answered. It seems to be only fair that people should keep animals of all kinds at their own risk and not at that of others. Dogs are universally liable to bite, and are notoriously intended to serve as a kind of private police. In the country, for instance, dogs are kept as sentinels and protectors. The intention is that they shall seize offenders by the legs—and a placid old gentleman who should thus be apprehended between the rogue and the respectable citizen. But when this discrimination fails, who is to suffer? It cannot yet well be told but the law presumes over bites—that he is perfectly harmless—that he is as playful as a kitten—that he has a singular knack of telling who is who, etc., etc., but when all these things, which every body says of every dog, are said and done with, and then the dog lays hold and puts his teeth into your child's cheek or your own arm or leg, are you to pay all the consequent surgical expenses, and run the risk of lock-jaw and hydrophobia, with no other comfort than that you are a—— fool to lie afraid of a dog?

A Man has a right to set spring-guns and traps upon the highway because such acts abound. I'm not a thief, and I have a right to walk the roads without having my legs surreptitiously cut off. Neither has a man a right to keep savage dogs, which rush out and bark and bite at the innocent wayfarer under the pretense that he is only protecting his property. The innocent wayfarer doesn't endanger his property. A man who keeps a bulldog is a pest to society. His neighbor, if he be a man of common sense, will keep a gun and use it at sight.

The case of the Veteran and Mr. Nibb merely serves as a text. In that particular instance the dog was, as he ought to have been, chained in a remote part of the building, which it was forbidden to enter. It was also in evidence that he was old and useless and could not bite a rat. But that was not such evidence; for why, under such circumstances, was he chained at all? And if he could not bite a rat, how did he succeed in biting a man so that he must have recourse to a hospital or surgical treatment?

The Court charged the jury that every one might keep a dog, and that the lawful avocations, ought not to suffer. A man may have a garden, and in it one particular shed which it is forbidden to enter. Mr. Nibb has a right to keep a royal Bengal tiger, old and loose or chained, and half-starved. But unless the fact of the forbidden entrance be made unavoidably evident, it really seems as if the heirs of the unwary stranger, who ventured within the shed in search of the proprietor, ought to be justified in an action for damages.

THE JEWEL CONSISTENCY.

I WAS listening the other day to an exciting harangue by a Methodist preacher, in praise of a man who died more than a hundred years ago. He was commended for his heroism and devotion, and his piety was extolled as perfect. All his prospects in life to a great principle. Especially he was extolled for his willingness to be misunderstood and reviled by his contemporaries as a fool and a fanatic. And certainly it does require some real courage to endure contempt nobly, and to seek no plaudits while every body considers you a fool.

The point was well put, and the story of the man's life well told. But I was not a little struck by stinging sarcasms upon those who could not or would not perceive and acknowledge the genuine heroism of the man. The preacher made an eloquent appeal to all who heard him not to be prejudiced by any traditional slander, but to look at the hero's character in greatness of soul, and never fail to honor it accordingly.

As I walked slowly home, reflecting upon what I had heard, it occurred to me to find myself discovering that the orator himself was one of the most striking examples of the very stupid spirit of the Pharisee which he had so powerfully denounced and so pointedly denounced. For while he was thus busily commending the deed of a hundred years ago, he was busily engaged in denouncing his present neighbors, and to the eternal confusion of his own consistency, he was himself at heart one of those very enemies—unconsciously, perhaps, but none the less unquestionably.

The man whom he had read a public letter from the same speaker, in which he condemned as wicked and treasonable the course of one of his contemporaries, was the identical course of the hero he praised so warmly within the following twenty-four hours. He held him up to contempt and ridicule with that bitterness of a demagogue, a fool, and a fanatic. Society was no more safe with such a man than a powder magazine with a lighter near it. He was an impracticable enthusiast—a lunatic, but not harmless—a citizen whom all loyal people must condemn.

The man who was thus the clearer and the more ludicrous it seemed; for the orator himself represented in our own day precisely the persons whom he denounced in the past; and I knew that had he lived a hundred years before he would have written letters and have made speeches to show that the man in his contemporaneous history, whom he now invited us to remember with the profoundest gratitude.

I suppose the moral is, that people who believe in the stuff that makes saints and martyrs, are very careful how they believe in the stuff that makes the statu quo a thousand or a hundred years ago; because such praise, even while it is uttered, becomes criticism of themselves. And it is a great pity that an orator should speak so vividly of other times and men as to throw upon himself by the contrast the profoundest contempt and scorn which always wait upon cowards.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

TUPPER'S SONNET CCCI.

TO MY FIVE NEW SISTERS.

Sore little beauties! constantly ye lie
Snuggling and snoozling by your purring sire,
Mother Grimalkin. But somedays approve
A shorter word, and boldly I defy
Those who would call you Tuppers (by patent rule).
O kittens, you're not thinking, I'll be bound,
How these verses of you in the papers have appeared
But that my little boy came home from school,
And begged your lives, though Cook remonstrance made,
Declaring we were overrun with cats.
That licked her cream-dish and her butter-pats!
But childhood's pleadings won me, and I said—
"O Cook, we'll keep the innocents alive; They're five, consider, and you're fingers five."

"THE INVITAL."—A lady friend of ours, who, having small house to spare, is in the habit of taking boarders, has found that, since the fashion of wide petticoats came in, her spare room will hardly hold all the mashings that they used to do. In order, therefore, to make space to accommodate more guests, she has lately hit upon the notable expedient of putting a court postcript to her formal invitations, requesting moderation in circumference of dress. The postcript consists merely of the letters "I. C. L.," which being interpreted, mean simply: "Please Come Lightly."

ADDITIONAL ANECDOTES OF QUASHY QUANDO.

In his latter years the habit of drinking to excess became fixed upon Uncle Quashy, and was a source of great annoyance to those who wished him well. Upon an occasion he was found lying beside the road in a neighboring town by the minister of the parish, who, admonishing him for his horse, helpful the old fellow to his feet again, and then addressed him in a good deal of sanctimonious reproof and exhortation. "The delinquent listened with respectful attention, and when the divine was congratulating himself on his success, when, at a pause in the discourse, Quashy suddenly inquired,

"Yes, Massa Kendall, dat all berry true, berry good wholesome advice, but I wants to know if you'll help me up to Squire Dodge's house?"

Under the act of manumission Quashy became a freeman, and was acquainted with the fact by his master, who was very fond of using it to urge his workmen to consideration of Quashy's resigning the dictatorship of the domestic circle, which he had gradually usurped much to the annoyance of his co-servitors.

The newly-born dignity sometimes proved agreeable to the old man's mind, and he soon renewed himself and his efforts to the hair of Pompey Ely, in a part of the town called New Guinea, and here the biographer feels compelled to pause for a moment to explain the singular subtriget of Quashy's bendited.

Pompey had also originally been held to service by one of the rich men of the town of——, but had either hired his time or received it as a gift when years before he became legally free, and building himself a hut on the lake shore, had commenced life on his own account, and selling, finding a ready market for his fancy captives in the neighboring town. Coming in one day to this market upon his arm containing the latter commodity, Pompey was accosted by a frequent customer with the query:

"Good-morning, Pomp; got some eels to-day?"

"No, massa, too-late, too-soon, too."

"Well, leave a bunch at my kitchen door, and ask the cook to give you a shilling."

"Two shillin', massa; dat dem seize to-day."

"Two shillings! Why, what do you mean by that? You never asked but one before."

"Yes, massa," bowed Quashy, blandly, "but one—bubber ask but one sabee; nebber would now, my fer lastly hird tell you dat."

"Tell you to charge two shillings for eels, Pompey?"

"Yes, massa," and as the man 'nonsuited' with a half-sob, side de road, 'jus' as I start from home dis mornin', an' tell-me-sell-my-eels-shillin'—two-eels-shillin'. Pompey Ely, sell-no-eely-more-shillin'—two-eels-shillin'." So you see, massa Thomas, Quashy sell dem eels for shillin' 'cause he two shillin' one way."

Quashy came to live with Pompey Ely, and the two old men kept house together in great harmony for several years, until ten years ago and upwards, Quashy as heavily on Quashy Quando that he was no longer able to support himself. Coming in one day from the labor of the little métayer, and he became a pensioner upon the bounty of his former master. This was minister kept on unwilling, and matters went on very comfortably for both parties, until about a year ago, Quashy received at the great house that Quashy wished very much to see son of his old friend, the owner of the dark Tower Estate, the youngest daughter of the house and Uncle Quashy's prime favorite, was about to be wed to some lord or other.

A pleasant walk brought her to the hut, when her low voice, however, was audible from within.

"Walk in, Miss Fanny, my dear. Berry glad you come, honey; I 'spect you come to see Quash. Now you come more, for ole Quash near his end, I 'fraive, for sartain."

"Oh no, uncle, don't say that."

"Yes, Miss Fanny, I know, 'cause it de trut', an' trut' mus' be 'spoken at all time. But I wanted to see you, honey, to get Quash's an' all massa's folks a warnin', some as I got warnin' las' night."

"Warning of what, Uncle Quashy?"

"Dunno, chile, 'cept de word 'comin' 'as an eel'; but all night de shadow keep a hangin' over de room at de par winder, 'O PIDRE, PIDRO, PIDRO! O PIDRO, PIDRO, PIDRO!' an' I 'spect it mean Quash, 'cause he name his name my words, chile, an' take de warnin' in time, jis as I'm gwine to tell you."

And it is to be hoped that the warning, as he chose to consider it, helped his soul as much as it did his earthly and earthly joys, and turn to the belief, which in his simple, childlike way he had so strongly evinced, he immortal joys beyond the grave, for that very night the old Quashy sounded a deep sleep at last.

A CURIOUS COINCIDENCE.—Some time ago a good wife, residing in the neighborhood of Perth, went to her usual supply of butcher's meat, according to the usual several of her old acquaintances. In the course of her perambulations she met with a friend from the country. Recurring home with a saddened heart, she encountered her husband returning from his cottage garden, when she also communicated at great length all her transactions in the day, concluding with the question: "But, man, you winna guess what's befaun me?"—Deed, I canna guess," said the husband, rejoicing in an hour of relief. "Aweel," rejoined his helpmate, "I has lost a mate; but I canna be sorry for we rather ought to be mair than thankfu' that we had one to lose!"

The Religious Intelligencer says: "The question has been asked, how many of the papers in which women have been converted during the present season. Some have replied that it is a matter of no consequence whatever. The number of females compared to males who are converted by the use of prayer is vastly greater than the usual proportion. If hoops keep persons away from the mourners' bench, we advise the ladies to wear a hoop of seals laved is likely to be less; hence we infer that hoops keep about six of the kingdom."

Two Yankees were strolling in the woods without any arms in their possession, and observing a bear ascending a tree, one of the young men clapped his hands, and one of them ran forward and caught the bear's paws one after the other, and immediately called out to his comrade: "Jonathan, I say, go home and bring me something as quick as you can, for I have got a bear fast." "Well, I'll stay, or I'm a fix."

"Come, no—if we fast as he could, but was an exceedingly long time in returning. During the interval the bear made several desperate attempts to get the mind of him who held it. At length Jonathan came back.

"Hello, what the devil are you doing here?"

Jonathan replied, "Well, I'll tell you: when I got home he couldn't come so ready, and I guessed he'd be as well to wait for it."

"Here now, Jonathan," said his comrade, "come you and hold it, and I will kill the critter in a jiffy."

Jonathan took the bear's paws, and held the animal until the other should kill it.

"Well, have you hold of him?"

"I guess I have."

"Very well, hold him fast; I'm off for dinner."

Several years ago Thomas Williams was running for Congress in Illinois; and as he was fully persuaded that in many instances the word "gray mare is better horse," he omitted no opportunity of "plowing with the heifers" for the benefit of constituents to win votes.

It was a close canvass, and our eager candidate did not leave even domiciliary visits in his peregrinations through his district.

Arriving one day at a farm-house in Henry County, he found a family in which several women were busily engaged in the domestic manufacture of flaxen cloths. His expressions of pleasure at the sight were unbounded. "It was very sweet in [or how manufactures—had been raised in that school." "for many is the day," said he, "that I have listened to my sweet lips the face which my mother and sisters afterward made into clothes for my family."

MAP OF THE KINGDOM OF THE TWO SICILIES.

WE publish on this page Colton's map of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, which is about to be the scene of a new Italian war. The reader will remark, at the western extremity of Sicily, the town of Marsala, where Garibaldi landed, and which the Neapolitan frigates proceeded to bombard in consequence.

The kingdom of the Two Sicilies comprises all son of that king who was known throughout the civilized world by the nickname of Bomba, in consequence of his fondness for bombarding his own cities. The occurrence at Marsala shows that, in this respect, the son treads dutifully in the steps of the father. No part of the globe has been more favored by Nature than the kingdom of the Two Sicilies. Blessed with a splendid climate, a large area of very fertile land, a sea-coast even more extensive, in proportion to the interior, than that of the United States, a healthy air, and an adjoys every variety of climate; snowy summits on the Abruzzi look down upon delicious temperate regions in the mountain valleys and tropical plains in Southern Sicily.

There was a time when these advantages were appreciated by their possessors and turned to good account. Before Rome, Tarentum flourished and rivaled the great cities of Asia in splendor. Authentic European history dates from the great struggle between Rome and Carthage for the possession of Sicily. From the close of that war down and luxury—such is the picture of Southern Italy which we find in the historians of the palmy days of Rome.

What a change now! In the peninsular portion of the kingdom there is but one town of any size—Naples; in Sicily two—Messina and Palermo—both monuments of the past rather than actors in the movement of the present day. Of the 9,000,000 inhabitants about 40,000 are priests and monks, and probably 1,500,000 dependent, directly and indirectly, on the Church for support. The Calabria after the late earthquake are fearfully suggestive. In most instances the only relief obtained by the sufferers came from foreigners. The English and Germans raised a large fund for the purpose, but refused to allow any portion of it to be disbursed by native officials. The almoner of the English fund—a man of great energy and courage, went through the devastated region in person with the money. In one place he was attacked by robbers; the man who tried to garrote him, while confederates clutched at his bag of ducats, was the village curate. This was in broad daylight. We published a portion of his report in the Weekly about a year ago.

Both in Sicily and in the Peninsula the priests display the same blind greed which characterizes their brethren in Mexico; and the government invariably supports them. Quite recently the people of a small town built a theatre; the Jesuits, jealous that money should be spent for any public building that was not a church, laid claim to the ground, obtained a judgment from Naples in their favor, seized the theatre, and, with a few changes, turned it into a church. A man of some wealth died in 1858, leaving a handsome property to the widow—in spite of the earnest endeavors of the priest who shrove him, and who urged the claims of the Church. The priests, not a whit baffled, contested the will, and the minor tribunals unhesitatingly gave judgment in their favor. The case was carried to Naples. The lady retained one of the most eminent counsel.

"Madam," said the lawyer, "how much money can you afford to spend to win your case?"

A large sum was mentioned and counted out in ducats; with this the lawyer called upon the minister of justice, and, after briefly explaining the case, laid the bag on the table and left, observing, "There are my client's strongest arguments." A few days afterward judgment was rendered in favor of the lady; but the Church was compensated by a grant of some property which was taken from a suspected Liberal.

This is the kingdom, and these the institutions which Garibaldi has gone to war to overthrow.

CHAPTER XIX.

FANDANGO ON ONE LEG.

HALF a mile, perhaps, inland from the sheds where the sailors lived, and beneath the steep face of the ridge-like crag which split the island in two parts, stood a low chapel, built of loose stones nicely fitted together and roofed with tiles. A rough iron cross was fastened over the doorless entrance, and at the other end was a rough stone holastrade, with a rude painting of the Virgin over the altar, on which stood four or five tall brass candle-sticks and a lighted taper.

SHRIVING A SINNER.

Within the chapel kneeled a dozen or more of the Centipede's crew, the coarse and sodden faces and uncombed locks, from their night's debauch, in striking contrast to the place and the apparent devoutness of manner in which they crossed themselves while the rites of the Church were going on. Before the altar stood Padre Ricardo, with his breviary on the chancel beneath the taper, bending his knees and chanting forth from his deep lungs the services of the mass. In a few minutes the unholy hands and lips which performed the solemn ceremony ceased word and gesture; and with a sonorous benediction at the elevation of the Host, and a shake of a bell, the sailors arose from their knees and again staggered back to the sheds, to slumber through the day. When all had gone the Padre clasped his missal, tucked it into his bosom, and making the sign of the cross with a genuflexion before the Virgin, the sacrilegious wretch turned on his heel and left the chapel.

Pursuing the winding path which led to his own habitation for a certain distance, he then turned to the left, and carefully picking his way through the sharp cactus and Spanish bayonets along the face of the crag, he stopped at a yawning fissure which gaped open in the rock. Here, too, the same wiry vegetation had crept; and it was with great difficulty, and many an "Ave!" and "Santa Maria!" that the Padre succeeded in passing into the dark, ragged mouth of the cavern.

"By the ashes of San Lorenzo!" he muttered, "there are serpents and venomous insects in this pit of purgatory. Holy Jesus, wouldn't what has pierced my leg? Why should my son drag me through this hole? Ah, blessed Saint Barnabas! a slimy reptile has crossed my instep!"

Feeling with his outspread paws in his fright, as he gradually made his way into the dripping chasm, getting narrower and lower as he proceeded, he at last, after stumbling prayerfully along for about a hundred and fifty yards, came to a loose pile of stones. Here opened another low, narrow fissure on the left; and, in some doubt, he was about to enter, but the noise he made by stepping on a stone was answered by the hissing warning of a serpent, and the scared Padre fell back at his full length in a pool of stagnant, slimy water.

"O Madre di Dios! I am stung by a cobra! Holy Virgin! my new cossack ruined too! Ave Maria! light me out of this abode of the devil!"

Slowly recovering, however, from his fright, he once more regained his feet, and, after a few steps, which he was obliged to accomplish by scraping his crown against the jagged rocks above, his outstretched hands touched an iron-bound door.

"Gracias á Dios! Thanks be to all the saints! I am here at last; but alas! curses on me! I shall be obliged to return by the same path, unless my son allows me to escape by the casa."

Cautiously searching with his fingers as he muttered these words, he touched a bolt, and, grasping it with both hands, he drew it partly out, like the knob of a bell. Then placing his ear to the door, he presently heard a rattling, creaking noise, as if a beam of timber with pulley and chain was being raised from behind the entrance. When the sound ceased the door yielded to the Padre's sturdy shoulder, and there was just room to admit his portly body. Here the passage was wider, the rock evidently chiseled away by the hands of man, and on one side was an artificial chamber, blasted out of the solid rock, with a narrow door with heavy iron bolts on the outside. At this opening the Padre paused and listened. No sound caught his ear at first; but as he clutched the bolt and it grated back in its bands, he was saluted by such a volley of frightful curses as to make him start back and cross his ample breast. It was the voice of Master Gibbs, lying there on a low iron settle in the noisome dungeon, with not a ray of light to cheer him, and only a jug of water and some weevily biscuit to save him from starvation. All through the day and during the long, long hours of the awful night, in pain and suffering from his lopped-off limb, had he lain on his hard bed with clenched hands, blaspheming and impotently raging in his agony and despair. No prayer, however, dawned in his ruthless heart, or was breathed from his brutal lips; but curses upon curses came thick and fast, till his tongue refused to give them utterance, and he fell back in utter exhaustion. As the noise, however, of the bolt struck his ear, he clutched the stone water-jug from the floor, and hurled it, with a yell of execrations, toward the door, where the fragments fell with a clattering crash on the stone pavement.

Grinding his teeth in his frightful passion, he howled: "Let me but once put these hands on your blood-stained carcass, and if the mother that bore ye will know her spawn again my name's not Bill Gibbs! Ha! you miserable swab, with your soft words and white hands! when I get out of this hole I'll blow you and your infernal hounds to ——! Give me fair play, and, even on one of my legs, I'll cut the cowardly heart out of you, Captain Brand! Come in, will ye, ye son of the devil? and I'll bite the tongue out of your mouth by the roots!"

Here the hoarse and panting wretch again ceased his roarings, and the Padre timidly opened the door.

"Hi! who's that?—Babette?"

"No, my son; it is your good Padre Ricardo, come to console you."

What the maimed villain replied to the Priest, and what means the holy Father took to allay the passion and assuage the sorrows of the man lying helpless in the dungeon, or whether successful in his mission, is not important to state in detail. An hour later, however, the Priest seemed relieved in body and spirit as he retired from the loathsome hole, and shocking the sea he closed the door, cautiously felt his way along the dark and narrow passage. Presently, as he turned an angle, a ray of light from the loopholes of the great stone vault beneath the Pirate's dwelling lighted his pathway; and a moment after, with a hearty sigh of satisfaction, he seized a door above his head and gave it a jerk. A bell sounded above, and then a large square hinged trap-hatch fell down, and swung gently to and fro from the beams above. At the same time the Padre put his arms about a square wooden stanchion which supported the floor of the saloon, and then painfully sticking his toes in some deep-cut notches at the sides, he slowly began to mount upward. When, however, his oily shaved crown appeared nearly at the level of the floor a vigorous grasp was laid on his shoulders, and he was pulled up like a flapping lobster and rolled into the apartment. It was Captain Brand who kindly assisted the holy Father, and it was the Captain's hollow laugh which saluted him in his torn and soiled raiment, as, with difficulty, he regained his perpendicular.

"Laugh not, hijo mio, at my sorrowful plight," said the bruised Ricardo, with some asperity; "I have met with dangers of venomous serpents, and been stabbed cruelly by those villainous cactus."

"But I raised the beam, my Padre, the moment you made the signal."

"You did, my son; but what I suffered in the cavern was as nothing to what I endured when I entered the dungeon of the English Gibbs. Jesus Maria, what an infidel he is!"

"You did not find his spirit subdued, then, by bread and water?"

"Far from it, my friend. He rages like a wild beast. He consigns your body and soul to everlasting torments! But what is more impious still," went on the Padre, as he crossed himself, "he swore at your holy Father, and hoped I would roast in hell!"

"But he confessed, Ricardo, and you gave him absolution?"

"If calling me thief and assassin, and hurling his stone water-jug at my head be confession and forgiveness of sins, the ceremony has been performed. Ah! my son, he needs no more mercy in this world!"

"Of course not, my Padre; and we will give him a short shrift and a long rope. Babette," continued Captain Brand, "Ah, my Baba! you have not forgotten to feed our jolly Gibbs these below? No? I thought not. Well, then, it is Sunday, you know; give him a pure pint of rum for his morning's draught. And Baba, my beauty! slip a pair of steel ruffles over his wrists, and then pass a cloth over those bloodshot eyes of his, and lug him here beneath this hatch. Be quick, my Baba, as I wish my breakfast presently!"

All this was said in a cool, and rather an affectionate tone, as Captain Brand sipped a spoonful or two of chocolate from a cup of Dresden china. Then turning to the Padre, he said,

"You would perhaps like a cordial, my Father, to take the chill off your stomach? Yes? You will find some capital curaçoa in that stand of bottles there."

The Padre, forgetful of the dignity of his calling, shuffled with indecent haste to the spot indicated, and without going through the form of filling one of the diminutive thimble-shaped glasses in the stand, he boldly unscrewed the flask to his lips and sucked away until it was nearly empty. Then seating himself on the settee he lapped on his illuminated missal and pored over its contents. Captain Brand occupied himself with opening the loop of the silk rope which fell from the ceiling and securing the end firmly on the stout cleat at the wall.

So passed the time until a noise beneath the room of a voice in anger, and a body banged and dragged along, once more attracted the attention of those in the saloon.

"Ho! Is that you, Master Gibbs?" exclaimed Captain Brand, in a cheerful voice. "You have risen early; but stop that profane language, my friend, or you will never see daylight again!"

The maimed ruffian only muttered, "Your friend, eh? blindfolded and manacled!" And then, apparently abashed by the cool, commanding tone of his superior, he held his peace.

"Well, you are quiet, my lad. Now we'll see if we can't boist you up here in the saloon."

"Thank ye, Sir!" said Gibbs, aloud; and then he muttered to himself, "Let me jest get one grip of ye and I'll show ye how quiet I'll be!"

"Do you think we shall need assistance, my son?" whispered the Padre into the ear of his patron.

"Diavolo! no! I never wanted help in these little affairs, except in the case of that violent Yankee whaler, who gave us much trouble, you know, and we were obliged to call Pedillo," replied the Captain, in the same low tone. Then, raising his voice, he said,

"Hark ye, Master Gibbs! Babette will lift you off the stones, and the Padre and I will rouse you up to the room here. You don't weigh so much as you did since you had your leg hacked off with a hand-saw—ho! and I dare say you are as light now as a dried cod-fish! Up with him, Baba! There—steady! all right —here you are!"

Saying this, Captain Brand, with the assistance of the stout negress and the Padre, raised the once burly ruffian, with a vigorous hoist that made him groan, to the floor of the saloon, where they laid him out at full length on his back.

"Wait a moment, my hearty, till the hatch is raised, and then we will raise you. Unpleasant position, no doubt," continued Captain Brand, as the trap came up and was secured by a spring; "but then, you know, you would have that pin of yours cut off, and somehow you have been so careless as to dispose of the nice leg you had the other day, made out of the upper fore topmast of the Centipede—a very tough bit of a spar it was."

Here Master Gibbs grated his teeth and grinned hideously.

The Captain smiled like a demon, and approaching the prostrate cripple, said, cheerfully —sy, in a frank and hearty tone—

"Now, my hearty, place a comfortable chair for Master Gibbs, and we will help him to a seat."

The considerate Ricardo stood a large, roomy Manilla chair on the fatal trap, and then aided his chief in lifting their victim to the position assigned him. And as they performed this operation the Captain, with the gentleness of a tiger before he strikes his prey, and with a wink to the Padre, lightly passed the noose of the silk rope over the ruffian's hairy throat, where it lay like a snake with its black coil squirming at the back of the neck.

"Now, Master Gibbs, I am about to remove this bandage from your beautiful eyes," said Captain Brand, in his cold, chilling, deliberate manner, "and if you so much as move when daylight shines before you, I'll blow your brains out."

Here the Pirate leisurely cocked a pistol close to his antagonist's ear, removed the bandage, and laid the weapon on the table within reach.

"No noise either, Master Gibbs!" continued Captain Brand, "or I shall be stirred up the nearest bit chocolate and gulped it down; "for it is Sunday morning, and we must respect the feelings of our Padre. You were unkind to him, he tells me, just now, and even said some disrespectful things of me. What have I done to vex you?"

The manacled wretch tried to raise his horny hands to his face when the cloth was removed from his eyes, and to rub those organs, while he glared suspiciously around; but the Captain pointed with his white finger in a threatening way to the cocked pistol, and Master Gibbs let his hands fall again.

"Well, Captain Brand, I s'pose now you're going to treat me as a faithful man who has served under you ought to be treated, and I'm willin' to forgive what has passed."

There was no look of forgiveness, however, in those brutal blood-shot eyes, nor much signs of repentance in those grinding teeth and compressed lips.

"Why, no, my Gibbs, I am not going to treat you as a faithful man, but I tell you what I will do"—here the Captain moved his chair nearer till his straw slipper touched the spring of the trap—"I will drink a glass of grog with you in forgetfulness of the past and forgiveness for the future."

"Thank ye, Captain Brand; I do feel dry. That stuff Babette gave me a while ago didn't touch the right spot, and I'll be glad to join you."

"Ah, bueno, my old friend! you shall drink something that will touch the right spot! What shall it be? Name only to name it."

"I'll take a toss of that old brandy you gave me the other day, if it's the same to you, Sir!"

"Oh, Master Gibbs, it's all the same to me. Delighted I am to oblige you! Padre mio! a glass of old cognac for your friend—a tumberful of wine—grog will do for me."

The Padre poured out the brandy as he was desired, handed the larger glass to the Captain, and the tumbler he placed in the locked hand of the victim. Slowly and painfully the subdued ruffian raised the glass to his mouth, revolved not to spill a drop; then before draining it, he cleared his throat, while at the same time the Captain rose to his feet, his right foot resting a little on the heel, and held the wine-glass before him.

"Now then, Master Gibbs, for a toss that will touch the right spot."

"Ay, ay, Captain!" said Gibbs; "and here's to your future!"

Scarcely had the words been uttered, and the liquor began to gurgle down the throat of the manacled man, than the Pirate before him pressed his foot with a quick nervous action on the spring.

Like a flash the trap fell, carrying chair and man with it. The hinges of the hatch creaked, the wooden chair fell with a bound on the stone floor below, the heavy beam overhead gave a jarring quiver as the strong silk rope brought up with a shuddering strain on the cleat where it was belayed at the wall; and with a gasping, choking cry of pain mingled with the ring of the shattered tumbler on the pavement, the ruffian of a hundred crimes fell full five feet and hung struggling in the death agony. With almost superhuman force he raised his clenched hands and struck his forehead till the muscles were twisted like wire by the effort, spinning around on the rope lapsided weight of his body, while the beam above yielded slightly to the strain, and the deadly cord, no longer squirming but taut as a bar of iron, held the wretch in its knotted embrace, clasped tight around the neck. In a minute or two the hands ceased beating the inflamed face and head, and fell with a clank before the body; the leg gave a few convulsive twitches, a last and violent spasm shook the frame, and there Master Gibbs hung, a warm dead lump of clay.

While this murderous business was going on, and the poor crippled wretch was struggling in the jaws of death, the Padre was chanting with his profane voice the service for the dead, the Sobre Domine, and his patron coolly took down a telescope and swept it over the blue water of a seaward. Then, however, after a quarter of an hour had elapsed, the body of their victim gave no more signs of life, the Captain laid down the telescope, and the Padre closed his missal, and remarked quietly, while glancing critically at the suspended form—

"He did not go off so easy as I had anticipated; his bull neck is not broken, though the rope was placed well placed. Ricardo, bring a stone dead, and we will lower him down. You, my Padre, will bury him!"

Saying this, Captain Brand rounded up the chair, detached the silk rope, hung the loop in its accustomed place, and then waited the reappearance of Ricardo with a stone. Not many minutes elapsed before the Padre, having performed the last rites, again ascended the stanchion and was assisted above the floor by Ricardo. Then both together got hold of a ring-bolt in the trap, drew it up and secured the spring, placing square bars of iron across the two transverse apertures so as to prevent accidental falls or hangings of themselves.

LAMBDA HERCULIS.

IT was evening; two figures stood motionless and spell-bound high above the mountains of the ocean. Around them the hills were clad in snows which the pale glare of the sunlight had no power to disolve. The air was of a most dangerous keenness, and often would a sharp blast come sweeping over the land, and scatter the fine snow-flakes like winds of the desert, with a howling and shrieking down the valleys and over the waste.

From the summit of the cliff a vast wilderness was seen stretching away to the horizon—an expanse seaward. No vegetation broke the blank whiteness of the view; only in a few rare spots were clustered together the dark evergreens, true to the color of the snow, which tossed their rattling arms and shook with hoarse laughter in the hurrying gale. The earth was dead—cold—dark.

The sun, although two hours had barely passed since noon, was already low down in the west; a few monstrous clouds lay in a wild mass below the horizon. The two watched his descent with troubled, perplexed looks. "Will he never, will he never grow the days, O Orlan!" said the one; "and brighter as they shorten grows our pilgrimage. Oh that we had planted ourselves in a climate where shines the sunder by the earthquake! Then had we been spared the doom of calculating, moment by moment, the hour of our inevitable destruction."

"Peace!" answered he who was called Orlan; "murmur not rashly that the Maker of earth has yet preserved us, but thank Him therefore. It is a solemn, it is a glorious lot to have outlived all other children of Adam, and now to stand face to face with the last work of the Lord of all. Such like we are; nor less than godlike our destiny—to return to the elements amidst the chaos of a ruined world. And I tell you, Ulric, that if my spirit can not wrestle with the infinite: it is too much that he should bear to look upon the terrible vengeance of the Almighty. Ha! lo! the sun sinks beneath the sea; the sun that has shone for so many ages upon our fathers, ere his race rising shall we, perchance, behold him more! Ulric, I tremble!"

As he ceased to speak the dimmed orb set, and his cold shadow struggled and fought and wrestled with the still, grey waters. At the moment a hurricane swept the earth; borne upon the pinions of the gale, the waters of the ocean mingled with his skirts the heaths, and stirred the feathery snow into dense, impenetrable clouds, which filled the air and obscured the light of the moon and all the land. Darkness prevailed; and through that darkness the ave-astrok mortals seemed to hear the wild shrieking of the spirits of the storm around the globe through space with speed inconceivable. Trembling, they fell upon their knees, and, with face loved to earth, awaited the end.

Soon the fury of the blast was spent; the winds lulled, the snows subsided. Orlan and his companion arose and were astonished to perceive, by their safety when, terror of terrors! from the very spot where lingered the traces of the sun so lately set arose another sun, in size greater than the former, and in lustre unlike aught ever seen by man before. The orb, not dazzling like the sun of earth, but soft and beautiful as a moonbeam yet brilliant as an archangel's halo, seared majestically overhead. It was a heavenly vision; the heavens the heavens was oblique. "Great God! what portent can it be? Knowest thou, O Orlan?" "No, it was foretold," Orlan answered, solemnly; "and often have said it long ago: but the children of the world believed them not. Know thou, then, this is that star which was seen in the east at our birth, and have been since the orbits of the universe were drawn by the finger of God. Into this star, the so small and insignificant, yet awful appalling, shall suns and worlds, the myriad nebulæ of heaven, and all created things, sooner or later be absorbed. We can understand the great Will of the Omnipotent?" And the other answered him not, because of the sinking of his soul: so the two were mute.

And the earth journeyed on ever through space. Hour succeeded to hour, and year to year; and yet time was not. There was no day, there was no night; only the soft phosphoric brightness of the star in which the globe was ever bathed. And the two lived together on the earth, and their dwelling was amidst the snows. And fishes, and the wild sea-birds which came to them from beyond the great ocean, served them as food. Patiently they awaited the disposal of the supreme Will; until the companion of Orlan sickened and laid him down in the wilderness and perished; for his spirit was overbourdened with awe. And Orlan made him a his profane and blasphemous speech concerning the Sobre Domine, and his patron coolly took down a telescope and swept it over the blue water of a seaward. Then, however, after a quarter of an hour had elapsed, the body of their victim gave no more signs of life, the Captain laid down the telescope, and the Padre closed his missal, and remarked quietly, while glancing critically at the suspended form—

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, May 28, in the Senate, Senator Dixon offered a resolution declaring that the Senate has the right to remove Theodore Hyatt from jail, and permit him to appear without custody before the city of Washington. Objection being taken, it was laid over under the rule. Mr. Pratt offered a resolution to print the Agriculture and Diplomatic Appropriation Bills, which was agreed to. Mr. Bigler presented a memorial from citizens of Pennsylvania, praying a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lewisburg to Elmira, New York, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. Mr. Bigler presented a petition of a shake of the hands, after which I invited them to walk up stairs, and led the way accordingly.

"I at first took them into the drawing-room; but the rush of ladies and others that followed almost alarmed my visitors, and Namura asked, 'Do all these people live in this house?' He evidently deemed them very intrusive.

"'Well, Namura,' I said, after he and his party had taken seats on the sofas and various chairs, 'how did you like the President's dinner on Friday?'

"'Very much,' said he, 'but not standing. I had to stand for two hours.'

"'What did the ambassadors eat: turtle soup?'

"'Yes, soup.'

"'Fish?' I continued, suggestively.

"'Yes; fish about that size,' and he described the length and thickness with his hands.

"'Chicken salad?'

"'Yes, chicken salad—very good.'

"'Roast chickens and pigeon?'

"'Yes; roast chickens and pigeon—both very good.'

"'Ale?'

"'Oh yes, very good ale, Champagne, and sherry.'

"'Strawberries?' I queried. When these were first offered to them at Fortress Monroe, they tasted, but neglected them, saying that the fruit was too sour.

"'Oh yes, strawberries very good, and ice-cream.'

"'Mustard, of course?'

"'Yes, mustard.'

"'And cheese?'

"'Yes, cheese very good, and butter very good too.'

"'What would you like to drink now? I asked.

"'Some ale,' answered Namura, and ale was accordingly produced and drank in the drawing-room, notwithstanding the unorthodox nature of the proceeding in such a place."

MARRIAGE OF MADAME BODISCO.

A correspondent of the Herald writes:

"I have just returned from a spectacle of great interest, which has attracted the memories and associations of an old Jacobite of Washington more than any thing else that has occurred here for a long time. To-day at noon, in St. John's church, Lafayette Square, the Countess Bodisco, widow of the late distinguished and popular Minister from Russia, was married to Captain Douglas Gordon Sconce, of Scotland. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Dr. Norwood, of Georgetown, to whose contregation the lady belongs, her family belonged. The bride was given away by President Buchanan. There was a quiet simplicity about the whole matter which imparted the character rather of a religious than a festive occasion.

"As the guests entered, they were approached, both by members of the diplomatic corps and their families arrived in their carriages, one by one, and mingled with the throng, without regard to place or precedence. A party from the executive mansion, including Miss Mackintosh, of Philadelphia, Miss Buchanan, and Mr. James Buchanan, Jun., were came a little after, the appearance of the President at the door indicated that the bride was to be 'the observed of all observers.' As soon as he met at his side, immediately the President entered with the Countess Bodisco leaning on his arm, while the whole congregation rose. They passed down the aisle to their places on the left of the chancel, where they were joined by Captain Sconce, a shook hands cordially with the President, and the ceremony was performed, as seen by the officiating clergyman. There were neither bridesmaids nor groomsmen, and the whole affair had an air of unusual simplicity."

HER FIRST MARRIAGE.

He adds: "I remember the Countess when she was a school-girl in Georgetown—the sweet and lovely Harriet Williams, the favorite Queen of every May-day. Her father, a native merchant of that town, became a remarkable burgh, gave her every advantage of education; but she was at a tender age, and unaffected as she was, a matter of an hundred citizens could be. Her personal loveliness was always her rich dot, which, with her eccentric humour shone on her bright eyes. Her form was a model for a sculptor, so delicate and rounded—and—dream of beauty seldom realized on earth. The Count Bodisco was a widower, and mingled in the gayeties and was at once conquered. He was old, but in excellent preservation, and was made young—he got every one whenever he appeared before, not only company, but his most distinguished guests—he made a display in the most agreeable society, and was highly acceptable, not only in the drawing-room as fashionable, but in our bred circles. His good-nature and intelligence commanded all, and his eminent meed of all political parties. One of his earliest and kindest friends was Henry Clay, for whose talents and popularity he had an unbounded admiration. Indeed, he loved that great statesman and orator to a degree rather uncommon among foreigners. But there was really a strong tincture of romantic sensibility about the excellent old Count. He was fond of all the pleasures and pure and innocent enjoyments. The attentions of Countess to him was extraordinary, and could only have been conciliated by that genuine benevolence and kindness of heart which beamed from her countenance and gushed out in his cordial voice. He wooed and won the affections of the fair Georgetown girl that had ever been seen in metropolitan circles. His old diplomatic companions and friends—some good-natured and sneered—the beau monde wondered; but he had his own taste, and he made the sweet, young, blooming Harriet his wife.

ANOTHER DUEL.

The Savannah Republican of Friday says: "We learn that a duel was fought yesterday, at Screven's Ferry, between Messrs. R. W. Moore, formerly of this Town Navy, and Mr. Charles A. L. Lamar, of this city. Lamar shot Moore in a vital part, and left him in the Government in the trial of J. Egbert Farnham, for piracy, and in a letter stated that the difficulty arose from some strictures of Mr. Lamar on his testimony, given in a few days ago. The challenge was accompanied, and the parties met on the ground, with their respective friends, at eleven o'clock on Thursday. Shots were exchanged with pistols without effect, when John Gowen, Esq., second of Mr. Lamar, approached Hamilton Cooper, Esq., the second of Commodore Moore, and stated that, in behalf of his principal, he felt it his duty now to say that the offense was given under excitement and misapprehension, and that Mr. Lamar regretted exceedingly the language that had given rise to the meeting. The retraction was deemed an satisfactory; whereupon the parties exchanged friendly salutations, and returned to the city."

SHOCKING ACCIDENT.

Henrietta Fuller, daughter of Willis Fuller, of South Reading, Massachusetts, employed in the cotton mills at the factory, aged about eighteen years, went to a watercask to obtain water for drinking. This cask was very near an upright shaft and coupling-box, which was revolving at the rate of over one hundred revolutions per minute, and with which the dress of the unfortunate girl became entangled. With every revolution the girl was struck upon the strong iron frame-work which supported the machinery, crushing her forehead, and forcing the eyes from their sockets, while her body and limbs were shockingly mangled and broken. The cask and the ceiling were covered with the marks of the catastrophe, and the body was so firmly bound to the shaft that the steel skirts were cut with chisels before she could be liberated.

PERSONAL.

The Auburn Advertiser says a Committee of leading officers of that place called on Mr. Seward, on Saturday morning last, and requested him to consent to deliver an address on the Fourth of July. Mr. Seward received the request very kindly, and said he must decline the [illegible] year. He added however, that of July, 1861, he would then be address to his fellow-citizens on his fellow-citizens on that date he had [illegible] ing

Mr. Everett has at last definitely accepted the honor of the Baltimore nomination, and will run as the candidate for the Vice-Presidency of the United States next year.

Bleeding's ropes are stretched across the gorge at Niagara, between the International Hotel and the Museum House. The incursions are also finished, giving access to admission for 50,000 persons.

The Rev. Mr. Corbett, late the pastor of the Green Street M. E. Church, in this city, died at Jersey City on Saturday last. A number of his friends chartered a steamboat and accompanied his remains to New York.

It appears that the unsophisticated strangers from Japan have learned from experience that the best way for the institutions of whose existence we affectionately advise them, is the Tammany one. Mr. Heco, who is the only especial pet of Washington ladies, has been invigilated into a translation which is to appear in New York, and having the fear of the Mikado before his eyes, sold him a pinchbeck watch for eight dollars, which he says he might be expected by a single numeral. It seems a little singular that of all the Washington pet guests, Mr. Tommy should have allowed himself to be victimized.

Jenny Lind Goldschmidt and her husband left for London for Sweden in the early part of June. They will make a visit to the latter place of their nuptials in England.

The Right Reverend the Provisional Bishop (Potter) of this diocese is about to take a trip to Europe for the benefit of his health, which has been somewhat impaired by his arduous duties during the winter. He will be absent until about before the session of the Protestant Episcopal Convention in the fall. Episcopal acts will be performed in this diocese during the summer by Bishops Eastburn, of New Hampshire, Whittingham, of Maryland, and De Lancey, of Western New York.

Died, on the 28th of April, at Chattahoochee, Florida, Jesse Hargrave, aged 107 years and 6 months. Mrs. Eliza P. Ross, wife of Dr. John D. Ross, of New York. Mrs. Ross was highly esteemed and respected by her friends, her chief attention was the benevolence of her nature. She will be long remembered and lamented by the poor of New York, to members of whom she had been a personal and constant benefactress. Mrs. Ross was interested in the public as well as private charities of the city, and was a lady of great intelligence and refined Christian feeling. She established and maintained, for two years, a workhouse for destitute females, in 1837-8, and in 1852 and 1853 she opened a house of refuge for widowed mothers and others, where they could find shelter and the temporary comforts of a home. In the succeeding autumn, by means of the contributions of her friends, a house of rest was necessary for the temporary home, she established, under this direction, a Protestant Orphan Asylum, in New York Juvenile Asylum, to which she contributed over a thousand dollars, besides annual donations. She became the condition of the parents of such children as were committed to the institution. Mrs. Ross was a native of Ireland. She suffered from the effects of acute rheumatism, contracted in the service of the poor, which was down with pain, she fell asleep, calmly resting on a Saviour's love.

Mrs. Cornelius Roosevelt, of this city, married a gallant Major, of the 3d Regiment of Cavalry, at Fort Monroe, on Saturday last. Mrs. Lyons assesses her dowry at $25,000. It is said that Mr. Prosser is worth about $100,000, and able to pay the claim if a just one be found. It is worth the money. Mr. Prosser recently married.

Mr. J. R. Chase, principal of the Pemberton Mill, publishes a statement in the Boston papers, showing that the mill paid in 1859 $1,000 more in the former operatives in that establishment remains unpaid.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PAY FOR THE LORDS.

In the House of Lords, on the 14th, the Marquis of Normanby moved the production of all the correspondence with Sardinia relative to the cession of Savoy and Nice to Garibaldi's expedition.

Earl Granville promised to produce the dispatches.

In the House of Commons Mr. Gladstone withdrew the motion for a select committee on the Paper Duty. He put that Sir Rowland Hill's health was such as to require an immediate change of air.

Mr. Cardwell stated that the attention of the Government had been called to the fact that the Royal Navy Estimate in Ireland for the use of the Pope, and to enlist Irishmen for the Papal army, was considered by many highly irregular, and steps would be taken to check them.

In the House of Commons, on the 15th, Lord John Russell stated that Lord Cowley had received no information from the Austrian Government that Austria would claim further territorial compensation if Sardinian territory was extended by the annexation of Central Italy.

He also announced that Government had received information from St. Petersburg that the sale of effects left in Turkey similar to what appeared under the head of "Russia and Turkey" (Vol. iii., p. 1,) was not to lead to the concentration of a Russian army on the Pruth.

THE PRIZE-FIGHT AGAIN IN PARLIAMENT.

On the 15th Mr. Bowyer asked a question for correspondence between the Home Secretary and the South Australian Government with regard to the return of Heenan to the late fight for the championship. He avowed his determination to bring the matter before the House.

Lord Palmerston protested against the exaggerated observations of Mr. Bowyer with regard to the fight, and who witnessed the fight. Such matters were certainly matters of taste. He had received information from Australia to the effect that the fight was conducted with the greatest propriety, and that the conduct of the Australian spectators was highly creditable of the British race.

The question was then dating which several members protested against the police being called upon to keep the peace at fights between gentlemen. Others encouraged those who violated it, the subject dropped.

SETTLEMENT OF THE DISPUTE.

Bell's Life of the 20th of April states that a meeting took place between Sayers and Heenan, at that office, relative to the disease in the latter's eyesight, which it is quite between them, and as to the possession of the championship belt. The arrangements agreed upon are briefly these—exact counterparts of the one so much covet—should be made, and the original belt handed over to the stakeholder unconditionally. Each of the candidates is to head the list with a subscription of £100, and the belt is to be retained in the possession of the proprietor of Bell's Life, to be forthcoming at the shortest notice for the honor of wearing it.

Sayers has engaged to retire from the Ring.

DEATH OF LADY BYRON.

Lady Byron is dead. She was born May 17, 1792, and was married to the poet Byron January 2, 1815. Before her engagement Lord Byron, in a letter, thus describes her: "Yesterday a very pretty girl called, a Miss Milbanke, which I answered. What an odd situation and friendship is ours! William and Lady Jersey, who are so much and produced by circumstances which generally led to separation on one side, and sometimes on both, are in a very superior woman, and very little epoint, which is strong, and her knowledge of Latin—a devilish thing that is to be in her own right—an only child and a mamma, who has always had her own way. She is a poetess, a mathematician, and yet without very kind, generous, and gentle, with very little pretension. Any other head would be turned with half her acquisitions and a tenth of her advantages." She was the only daughter of Sir Ralph Milbanke Noel, and succeeded, November 13, 1856, to the barony of Wentworth. Lady Byron's will is said to might be expected of a marriage without love, was unhappy. She had one for the issue of the Earl of Lovelace. Lady Byron was of a liberal disposition, and long her philanthropic gifts was $250 for the Kossuth Emigration Society. Her daughter Ada, who died before her, inherited remarkable mental qualities—among others, a taste for mathematics, and was the favorite friend of Mrs. Somerville, the astronomer.

SYMPATHY FOR GARIBALDI.

The Opinione Nationale heads the subscription for Garibaldi with 100 francs to which its editors add and printers add 50 francs 20 cents. A M. Rouille Bernard sends 1000 francs. The Duke de Persigny, governor of the Zouaves, contributes 109 francs, with the following characteristic note:

"PARIS, Sunday, May 13, 1860.

"Since the Emboury St. Germain, Rue de Bac, the banner of Lamoricière, it is only just and logical that the Zouaves Pontificaux should reinstate a name like Garibaldi. Will you, then, interest me through your journal, that I, who have had the honor to command, may be allowed to go out to Garibaldi would be favorably received by the Imperial Government? In other words, may I serve under Garibaldi, with the permission of the Emperor? Receive, monsieur, the assurance of my (with authorization) under Lamoricière? Your answer will be addressed to me at Nice, where I am going to start with me.

"DE PERSIGNY.

"P. S.—A recent commissioned officer of the First Regiment of Zouaves, commanded by Lamoricière.

GARIBALDI AND THE PRINCE IMPERIAL.

A Paris letter, describing the Fête de l'Assomption, says:

"In the course of the afternoon the carriage of the Prince Imperial passed through the Champs Elysées, by the Avenue de l'Impératrice, down that of the Champs Elysées. The young prince, his mother and the Grand Duke Michael state of the atmosphere had induced tens of thousands of Parisians to assemble in the course of the day. The spectacle was enlivened by such a glittering accessory as a mounted escort of the Imperial guards and other accompanying sheen, a regular communication was caused throughout the whole length of the line of march. The cry of Vive l'Empereur! was the cry far and near, and a general rush was made towards the carriage. The cortège, preceded by the gyrons in their usual livery, obviated at the Arc de Triomphe, and the Champs Elysées was filled by the customary four horses, with postilions, the cavalry escort, and the crowd interposing themselves between the carriage and the spectators. The little boy, who is now the hope of the Napoleon race, stood up and leaned over the door of the vehicle, and seemed to watch with a look of curiosity the crowd and the surrounding scene, over whom he might one day be called to hold sway. The Empress looked pale and fatigued, but the minds of the people, and suddenly, by a species of acclamation, the cry of Vive l'Empereur! was heard from all throughout that dense throng, in which the names of Garibaldi and Vive la Liberation! were also distinguished. 'Vive Garibaldi la Liberation!—Vive le Prince Impérial!' were the cries which were heard, and was between the two personages I do not exactly see, but I give the simple fact. Garibaldi, with his staff, was standing on the pavement, and the Emperor, the Empress and Empress, with the Prince Imperial, were seen on the same carriage. They were seated in a very low carriage, and as it passed slowly down the Champs Elysées the cheering and shouting of the crowd were almost in juxtaposition. Again the cry of Vive l'Empereur! was heard, and this time it was combined with vivas for the head of the state. The Emperor and Empress bowed to the people right and left, when the shouts of the multitude united in the same association of Garibaldi and Napoleon."

A DRAMATIC TALE.

A suit has been commenced in the French Courts, the incidents connected with which will be the basis of the dramatists in a whirl, and give work to their pens. The story runs thus:

"Nearly thirty years ago a widow lady, of a noble and distinguished family, was residing in the south of France, placed her child with a governess's wife, who was to act as its foster-mother. Shortly after the lady to the young heir was quarreling before the door, and the gardener's wife, who was also in the garden, saw the nurse throw the wheels of a carriage, and immediately suspected that the nurse had committed some crime with the child or woman. In her flurry she snatched up the heir, but slipping, let him fall into the water, thus making his right arm lame and collar-bone. In her terror she rushed to her husband, who, with the aid of a neighbor, carried the child to a murder the bed-clothes, and, taking his garments, he placed the child in a cradle, and, having buried all the dead, left with the lady's coming. Contrary to the usual penal practice, the wife was not punished with death, but her husband was struck at the change in her darling, to the lady, brown, instead of bright chestnut, and placed in the place of her own plump baby, that, vexed and exasperated, she determined to have nothing to do with it at once, and made the postillion drive away. The gardener and his wife at once determined to bring up the child as their own, and in a few days left the district, and made an explanation. They were afterward joined by a sister of the wife, who, marrying that the lady was gone, and had taken away with her the child, left the country. Shortly after this, while the ignorant cottagers, influenced by terror, never dreamed of the value of the supposed changeling's wife, as her death-bed, recently made a full confession. In the course time, the real heir of the family died and left as the member or one of the noblest families of France, has been living in the south of France, and has been awarded a difficult position; while the real heir has spent his youth in religion and is now a soldier in Algeria. The latter now brings suit to recover his property and title."

Dervieux, the celebrated famous lawyer in France, has been engaged for the defense.

WHAT BECOMES OF CIGAR ENDS.

A young girl was arrested in Paris for selling what was supposed to be smuggled tobacco, but she positively declared that it was not. She proved, and it was proved that she was connected with a regular gang, carrying on a large and lucrative business in cigar ends. They had been observant discovered that the parents of the girl lived at Lyons. The police proceeded to that city, and, not content, which he found to be an isolated house, which they entered, and found the old man and his wife busy at their disagreeable occupation. Having knocked and rung several times at the door, and receiving no answer, they concluded, very necessary, in a loud voice, ordered the door to be forced. This order produced the desired effect, for the door was opened by a man. On entering the place, a strong smell of tobacco was perceived, and lying about were a quantity of wrappers with labels of different kinds, such as Maryland, Levant, Virginia, etc. In an adjoining room was a woman lying in bed, apparently very ill, and the Commissary of police, who was provided with the search warrant, through the other parts of the premises, where all kinds of apparatus for the manufacture of cigars were found, and also a quantity of powdered wood, chippings of logwood leather, and other substances, intended to be used in making a composition sold as snuff, were found. On again entering the room where the woman lay, the Commissary, who had begun to entertain suspicion that her illness was feigned, and that she had thrown herself on the bed to conceal something under her, ordered her to get up. This she at last did, and beneath the mattress he discovered a neck filled with cuts of unmanufactured cigars, probably picked up in the streets or cafés, and which were destined for the manufacture of new ones. The man and his wife were arrested.

RUSSIA.

ANOTHER MENSCHIKOFF MISSION TO TURKEY.

The attitude of Russia toward Turkey is attracting much attention, and regarded as decidedly menacing.

The St. Petersburg correspondent of the Paris Imperial Invigis Ministers, excepting the Turkish, were recently assembled in council at Constantinople, and declared that the position of the Christians in Turkey had become unbearable. The Russian envoy on this occasion having strong representations to the Porte in their favor, and refuse to obtain any concessions from it.

The London Times says that Russia is meditating a Menschikoff Mission, and that Count Ignatieff, while labouring to advance the interests of Christians, can not be unaware that he is playing to advance the views of the Crimean Statesman.

ITALY

VICTORY OF THE INVADERS.

At latest dates we hear that Garibaldi's forces have driven the enemy from every point. The capture of Piacenza by Garibaldi was simply between the Neapolitan troops and a rebel force, the number of Italian volunteers from Malta, who were marching to join those hosted at Marsala. The Neapolitan leaders were that Garibaldi had obtained a decided victory at Monreale—a town of about 20,000 inhabitants, situated on the heights, which commands the latter place. It is also reported that the Garibaldian army was in possession of a number of guns. Garibaldi's troops were daily being reinforced by volunteers from all parts of Italy.

DEATH OF THEODORE PARKER.

The following, an extract from a private letter to Professor Cornelius Conway, of Cincinnati, dated May 11, we copy from papers:

"I have sad news to communicate. Our dear suffering friend, Theodore Parker, died yesterday evening. Yet I must never see him more in the flesh. He died free of vigor. I saw him about three hours before he died, by the gallery, which he was then able to go conveniently to himself. He left written directions for his funeral, limiting to five persons only, including his wife, be sent, she thinks, from the peculiar tenderness of his manner yesterday, that he was going to die. He left drawing for some days, and talked dreamingly of two Theodore Parkers—one, he said, was dead, the other living. He cherished his work; perhaps a true thought only mystically expressed. Among the last words expressed were these: 'Of course you know I am not afraid to die, though I wished to live to finish some things I had begun to do.' I had great powers committed to me, and I have but done little.'

"Since writing this, I have seen him lying, oh, so peacefully! I shall not attempt to describe the look in death of terror. The bottle color remains on his cheek, and it is best to remember him as he was when he passed away. He ceased to breathe without the least struggle."

A FAITHLESS CONSUL.

The Boston Transcript has advices from Italy, received by the steamer Arabia, report that Mr. Henry H. Hamilton, late Consul at Messina, Sicily, has been guilty of an act of perfidy, which will forever brand him with infamy. He was appointed Consul to that city by the Navy, was instrumental in betraying Father Ottavia Lanza, one of the noblest and most patriotic citizens of Italy into the hands of the agents of the vilest and most tyrannical despotism on earth. Father Lanza was arrested on the 14th of April, Palermo was stacked with the report of the arrest of Father Lanza. He was immediately thrown into a merchant vessel, bearing the 'stripes and stars,' and sent the set out for Naples, and there put in jail. Mr. Hamilton, the American Consul! The diplomatic corps at Palermo have written to the Neapolitan representation with this traitor against humanity—his side and shutter to the disgrace of the American second Brutus, protests his official position. If one quarter part of the statements reported in this Journal be true, Garibaldi is at once dismissed from the service of a free republic, and suffer the official as well as the social disgrace awarded to renegades."

RAILROAD CAR FOR THE PRINCE OF WALES.

The editor of the Hamilton Canada West Spectator has inspected the railroad car intended for the use of the Prince of Wales during his visit on the Great Western Railway. He says: "In its size and outside appearance the car will not differ much from the ordinary passenger coach in its painting, a part of which will be the Prince of Wales's arms, and the letters 'Great Western.' The principal feature of the inside is the spacious saloon, 36 feet long by 8 wide. The ceiling is of white satin wood, and the room are richly ornamented with pedestal, cornice, chandelier, and ventilators. The chairs and sofas are surmounted by a silk upholstery panel and hung with drapery; there are also two sofas and four chairs in placed the Prince of Wales's consort and feathers, covered in wood. The floor is covered with a fluted silk panel, in shape like an extended fan, while in place of carpets two fine buffalo robes are spread over each side of the door-way. The furniture will be constructed of the best of satin wood, and the whole car will be one of the style of Louis XIV. and XV. Next to the saloon, on either side of the car, are two compartments for small-room, which will be fitted up with every regard to convenience and elegance. At the other end of the car is the gas-chamber, 14 feet long. This room will be placed the servants' cabin, but by no means debarred to elegance and taste."

MEXICO.

PROGRESS OF THE REVOLUTION.

The steamship Panchuca, from Vera Cruz the 16th ult., arrived in New Orleans on the 24th, with dates from the city of Mexico to the 7th, with a considerable force, some 6000 or 7000 men, was ordered against the rebels. He still continued to advance, and on the 5th all marched out to meet him, and a battle was fought between the contending armies. The Secretary of War in the engagement, and the Liberals are said to have a more numerous force than the Reds. The latter, however, possess superior discipline.

The President Zuloaga, Zuloaga turned, a few days previously, from the command of the army, to the city of Guadalajara, whereupon that personage had him arrested and imprisoned, and on the 5th issued a decree that forced him to accompany the army, obliging him, in some convenient state, to march in his court-dress. General La Vega has not been executed, as had been previously stated, but was a prisoner at San Luis Potosi, in the hands of the Liberals, suffering from a severe wound. Another forced loan had been decreed by Miramon two days before leaving the capital. Vincente de Gobrino, the French Minister, left the City of Mexico on the 5th, and was at Jalapa at the latest accounts, waiting for means to reach the coast. He is said to have taken quite a fortune Arriba his residence in the country. The Herald of Cross of Vera Cruz has been stopped for want of paper.

NAPLES AND MESSINA.

We publish herewith views of the cities of Messina and Naples, from recent pictures. They are of peculiar interest at the present time, and will be still more valuable as the war which has commenced in Southern Italy progresses.

NAPLES.

The city of Naples needs no description. In a former number of this journal we said of it:

Fancy a city of some 450,000 inhabitants, of whom 18,000 are priests, 40,000 idlers, 4000 lawyers, and nearly 30,000 prisoners of state, locked up in some of the five hundred and thirty royal prisons! Fancy this city in a state of chronic siege, with the guns of its forts constantly pointed, not upon its enemies, but upon its people! Fancy a government consisting of a priest-ridden king, cruel, treacherous, and false; maintaining his power by the aid of Swiss and German guards, most of whom are kidnapped, contrary to law, in the southern German States and Switzerland; so miserable an administrator that no department of the government makes the least pretense to efficiency but the police, which has its spies every where, and is said to be as perfect as Fouché's; so blind to facts that he believes he is a blessing to his people, and calmly expects that God will scatter his enemies! Finally, fancy a people systematically trained in idleness, servility, and ignorance; denied the privileges of wholesome education and the use of books; forced to kneel at the feet of the Jesuits, and taught from their childhood that rebellion against their authority involves not only eternal damnation but present punishment; educated in contempt for the laws and indifference to every virtue that can exalt the race! Such is Naples.

Let us look at it in detail. The traveler who walks through Toledo or Chiaja for the first time, on a sunny day in the cooler months, is amazed at the evidences of life and happiness which he sees. Fifty thousand people, they say, throng Toledo (the Broadway of Naples) daily. Every trade under the sun is carried on in the open street. There are shoemakers and tailors at their benches; scribes inditing love-letters to amorous swains; begging monks proving clearly that all who do not give them a carline will be served up hot in another world; mendicants pluming poultry or cleaning vegetables; quack doctors forcing their panaceas down the throats of peasants from the Abruzzi; cooks roasting and frying at great fires on the sidewalk; mothers combing their children's hair, or turning them up and whipping them; old women on crutches selling lottery tickets, and old men reciting Ariosto with much fervor; water-sellers bawling iced water; pious minstrels playing doleful bagpipes under the shrine of the Virgin; Sicilian girls dancing the tarantella with uncommon vigor; friars roaring that they only want a gran more to have a new church built; boys fighting for watermelons; exchange tables loaded with copper; lemonade-stalls surmounted by triumphal arches, bedizened with gold paper and wreaths of flowers; macaroni-sellers lading huge masses of the smoking delicacy into red cabins, and beseeching the crowd not to let it cool; more monks, tinkling little bells, and knocking Punch and the conjuror over as they hurry past with a dead man; ladies in Parisian dresses, peasant girls in scarlet rags; lazaroni in every corner, lying, crouching, squatting, running, sleeping, laughing, fighting, picking pockets; and an array of carriages, carroccli, omnibuses, cavaliers, tearing and dashing along at a furious rate, as though collisions were impossible and bones could not be broken.

MESSINA.

Messina, as every one knows, is one of the two large towns in Sicily. It is situated on the northeast coast, opposite to Calabria, from which it is separated by the channel of the Faro, here about four miles wide. The town of Messina is built partly on the slope of a steep hill, and partly along the sea-shore at the foot of it. The port is formed by a strip of sandy beach projecting into the sea at the south side of the city, and sweeping round in the form of a semicircle. On this narrow track of land are the citadel, the lazaretto, the light-house, and the Castle of Salvatore at the entrance of the harbor, which faces the north. The larger part of the town rises in the form of a crescent, on the west side of the harbor, which is more than two miles in circumference, and is one of the best in the Mediterranean. The view over the channel, the opposite coast of Calabria, with its towns and villages, and the lofty Apennines behind them, and, on the other side, the low promontory of Faro, with its tower, advancing into the sea as if to meet the Italian coast, form a splendid landscape, which is one of the finest even in that classic sea, whose shores are so remarkable for the variety of beautiful scenery it presents.

THE INSURRECTIONS.

The signal for Garibaldi's interference was insurrections throughout Sicily. The following summary of news gives a fair picture of the state of affairs:

The Messinese, like the rest of the Sicilians, had borne their wretched treatment till they could bear it no longer, and on the 4th ultimo the inhabitants of the city rose, but were overpowered and driven into the country. A great number of soldiers, guns d'armes, and citizens were killed and wounded, but the numbers have not been correctly ascertained. A report having got abroad that the king in Palermo, which had taken place some days previously, had been quelled, the idea of a successful revolution was for the time abandoned, and the citizens gradually returned to their homes. On the night of the 10th and 11th ultimo attacks were made on the city by the troops, and many persons were killed in their houses. There was both musketry and cannon fire, and the soldiers appear to have fired right and left, without any apparent object; indeed, the troops were to be dreaded even by peaceable citizens. The British and French Consuls, in the first place, made remonstrances against the bombardment, but the Commandant informed them that they were at liberty to take refuge in the arsenal, that he had no discretion to spare the town if any necessity arose, and, in fact, a proclamation was published to that effect. On the ensuing day taking place the Consuls protested in very strong terms. To show with what caprice the soldiers acted, it may be stated that a Swiss citizen was wounded as he was coming out of a monastery, where he had been paying a visit, and on being taken to the guard-house was shut up for three days. An officer was said to have been shot by one of his own men; in fact, the reign of terror had been established by the very pitch of.

The last intelligence from Messina says there was scarcely a person to be met with in the streets. There were, however, numbers of soldiers parading the town in all directions. Bills were posted on the houses and shops to the effect, "This is French property," "This is English property," etc., and many persons had sought refuge with the various Consuls, as being the safest place of abode. There can be no doubt that numerous unarmed and quiet people have been shot by the troops, and the conduct of the authorities has been rather to provoke a revolution than to quell one.

The insurrection at Palermo broke out on the 4th ult. It was announced to the people by a loud report of musketry. The police, well aware that in the church and in the stores of Catania (a convent at the east end of the capital) men, ammunition, and arms had been assembled, made an onset against the place, which they had previously encompassed all round. Cannon were reared in that part of the marine plain which looks in a straight line toward the main door of the church. The doors were thrown down on the first discharge, and a storming party of sixty men and policemen advanced. They were received by volleys of musketry; but the defenders inside were but forty. A few of them fell dead; several others were wounded; some made their escape over the roof; others sought a refuge in the sepulchral vaults; thirteen were taken, and these, laden with chains, were led to prison, followed by thirty of the monks, who were dragged along with the prisoners. Arms, ammunition, and a wooden cannon with iron hoops were found in the church and store-rooms. The soldiers then carried harvest and fire throughout the building; nothing was spared. A silver crucifix was broken to pieces by three Christian soldiers, who shared the fragments among them. They took the golden "pisside" from the tabernacle, strewing its contents—the consecrated wafers or hosts—on the ground. Some fighting was still going on at Parrazzi, and musket-shots were heard all along that line as far as the St. Antonino Gate. The fire ceased in a few hours, and the cry, "Viva il Re!" announced the complete victory of the troops. The soldiers had driven before them a few of the insurgents at Parrazzi, and had then fired at random all along that line as far as the abovementioned gate, either through fear or with a view to strike terror among the unoffending population. The Lady Abbess of the Dasta del Monte, out of the Macqueda Gate, and a chaplain in his gown and surplice, were dragged in chains to prison, because, unaware of any guilt in the matter, they had suffered the bells of the church to announce the faithful to the usual service.

THE CITY OF MI

On the 5th ult. the soldiers again attacked Parrazzi, where not a living soul was left; they battered with cannon the villas of Farese and Mastegna, which had been previously sacked; these tenements burned for three days. They slew on this occasion a woman who was flying before them with an infant in arms—they slew mother and child. They killed seven women in their houses, firing at them long after they had secured their easy victory.

The next day fifty of the insurgents isolated three tricolor flags on a mound two miles west of Palermo, at a place called Baida. A battalion of Chasseurs attacked them; the fire lasted about four hours without much harm on either side; for the troops, notwithstanding their numerical superiority, kept at cannon-shot distance from the insurgents. These latter removed their business and retired, in good order, to the neighboring height of Monte Cuccio. The soldiers wreaked their wrath upon the luckless monastery and hospital of Baida, which they changed with having sheltered the insurgents in the night and supplied them with drink. Two of the monks were killed; and the patients in the hospital were thrown on the ground with the beds overturned upon them. The victorious troops encamped at Boera di Falco.

The report that had reached the Messinese on the 8th, to the effect that the southe come, was a false one: for the 12th, when the steamp and twenty-five of them ist The massacres, too, s Royal troops have seen g unheard of. Whole towns stroyed and the popula villas and the magnificent all in ashes. Military ex day, and no one knows wh ers are shot in batches of time.

have served and will serve their country with the devotion and discipline of the best troops in the world without hoping for any other reward than that of an unspotted conscience. They are attracted to the service by no offers of rank, honors, or rewards. When the danger is over they will retire to their simple private life; but now that the hour of combat has come, Italy beholds them in the front rank, joyous and determined, ready to shed their blood. The war cry of the Chasseurs des Alpes is the same now as it was on the banks of the Ticino: "Italia et Vittorio Emanuanele !" and this cry raised by us will strike terror into all the enemies of Italy.

THE LANDING AT MARSALA.

The Times has the following:

Our Malta correspondent, under date of the 12th of May, announces the arrival on that morning of her Majesty's steamer Intrepid from Marsala, with intelligence of the landing thereat on the 11th of a band of 2000 Italians, under Garibaldi, who immediately pushed on to Calata Fimi and Alcamo, where the insurgents are concentrated, and will, it is hoped, hold their ground. These Italians had no sooner landed than three Neapolitan steamers of war, and another private vessel chartered by Government, proceeded, without any previous notice or warning whatsoever, to bombard the unarmed and defenceless town of Marsala, and when the Intrepid left to communicate the fact to the British Admiral at Malta, shot and shell were falling over the fugitive or wine factories of Messrs. Woodhouse, Ingham, and other British subjects, to protect whom another English steamer of war supposed to be the Scylla had just arrived. On the 8th of May the Neapolitan gun-boat Stelo arrived at Malta in forty hours from Palermo, reported to have been dispatched to overtake and arrest some political fugitives, and to ascertain whether there be any truth in the reported filling out at Malta of a new expedition at Malta against Sicily. After communication with her consul she put to sea on the same night. The result, adds our correspondent, of this visit will scarcely be worth the fuel consumed. Only two individuals, and them of no note, have recently left Malta with a view of joining the insurgents; while the only fugitive who has reached these shores is an old lady, who landed clandestinely on the coast on the night of the 7th of May, from whom the Neapolitan Government can scarcely have had much cause of alarm. Accounts from Palermo to the 6th, and from Messina to the 8th of May, report the insurgents as concentrating near Marsala."

A private letter from Marsala says:

While on shore to-day, about 2.30 or 3 in the afternoon, we entered a caffé. In a few minutes several fellows entered—some in red, others in plain clothes, all armed with muskets and bayonets. Every one around seemed favorable to them. We at once asked what was the matter, and were told that it was a case of "Viva Italia," and Garibaldi had landed. We immediately took a walk round the town, and found the soldiers (patriots) had possession. We wanted to go out toward the country, but the officer in command—a fine-looking fellow—told us we could not pass without an order from General Garibaldi. We therefore returned to the mole for the purpose of getting on board, and met more soldiers coming in. At the mole gate we were again stopped, and there detained until a pass from the General was procured for us. On the mole we met fresh troops, who had disembarked with arms, ammunition, etc. We were informed that some two thousand had been thrown into the town, and that more would soon follow—the only thing they wished for being that they might meet the Neapolitans. They all appeared fine athletic fellows—just the sort to make short work of a dish of macaroni. They landed from two steamers close under the noses of the Neapolitans, who, with two steamers and a sailing frigate, had been constantly watching the coast. The smallest of those vessels could easily have prevented the landing, but she was too cautious to attempt it. After the soldiers, however, were safe on shore the Neapolitans closed in and fired on the town, or rather at a few stragglers on the mole—a mere waste of powder, for many of the shots fell short, and those that did reach terra firma merely plowed up the earth that the enemy had passed over. There is no doubt whatever but that one at least of Garibaldi's vessels, particularly the rearmost, could have been cut off; but no, they were afraid to try it on. After these had been abandoned by the Italians they were taken possession of at 6.30 p.m. by the Neapolitans, who, however, displayed much heroism, evidently deeming "discretion the better part of valor." At this moment, as we are in the act of leaving for Malta, a steamer and frigate are opening on the town, but the fire receives no return. Whether they have artillery or not, we are unable to state. We can only remark that we saw none. The people in the town received Garibaldi and his followers with open arms, appearing as if they had been long expecting them. At the time of the General's arrival there were no Neapolitan troops in the town. Owing to the hollowness of the water their large ships could not approach.

STATE OF PALERMO AND NAPLES.

The Naples correspondent of the Daily News writes on the 8th instant:

A person who is often in Palermo tells me that on Friday, at four o'clock, the shops were opened, and the cannon removed from the street; but on Saturday, at four o'clock, they had been replaced, as a row or two had taken place the night before outside the gates. The cavalry, he heard, had suffered much, and indeed beyond Palermo the state of things was awful. An order to open the shops was posted on the walls, and every thing was compulsory. When the insurrection broke out in Trapani the prisoners were liberated from Favignana, and joined the patriots. The Bagni of Favignana is as notorious as the Bastile of Paris. Of the interior little that was precise was known; but the insurrection was far from having been put down. Dispatches just arrived from Messina announce that all was tranquil, and that the state of siege was taken off as the 24 instant. A most sanguinary proclamation, which owes its origin to Filangieri, had been published in both places. Arms were to be given up directly, and lists of the names of persons in arms, or supposed to be so, were to be affixed to all public places for fifteen days. If the persons whose names were therein entered did not appear and have their names struck out they would be liable to be tried by court-martial and shot. If a chief were to be brought in by any one, his captor would have 100 ducats reward; if a common man, the captor would have 50 ducats.

Letters from Naples to the 12th inst. state that on the previous Thursday a demonstration took place at Palermo. An immense crowd assembled, shouting "Viva l'Italia!" "Viva Emmanuele !" "Viva Napoleone!" Women of the highest rank excited the men and insulted the soldiers, who fired several shots. The garrison had been ordered to remain in their barracks. Fresh reinforcements are about to be dispatched. A proclamation had been published signed by the Governor of Sicily, Prince Castelcicala, stating that in view of the grave and sanguinary misdeeds and of the plundering which had taken place at Cemina, Petralia, Sottina, Caccamo, Vicari, and Portecilla, the carrying or detention of arms by any band is prohibited.

Another letter of the 11th from Palermo is from a gentleman who writes thus:

On Sunday last there were two or three demonstrations in the churches. The steamer which was to have left yesterday (16th) was detained by the Government. She was sent off the night before last to cruise in search of Garibaldi, who has not yet been found. We have been worse off than ever during the last two days—constant demonstrations, and yesterday and the evening before the people, on being fired on, got feul of the abiezi with knives, and wounded and killed several. Some of the people also were wounded, and we are approaching by degrees to a Sicilian Vespers. The people were never more united, and are beginning to get desperate. The squadri (likewise had a row with the troops near Balestrate, to the eastward of Palermo. We have this from a good source, as also that the 10th Regiment of the Line at the Mole showed symptoms of disaffection. The general said, "Abasso il Colonello," etc. So that by degrees you will see things are beginning to take the same complexion as by Lord John Russell. The reports about Garibaldi have thrown the Government into confusion, and the evening before last all the steamers were ordered into requisition, and sent off in every direction. The Elettrico came back yesterday afternoon. The Neapolitan troops are no longer in the Cassaro and the Toledo, but in the Marinella and the offskirts. Everything is getting agitated here, and orders have been sent to Avellino to the 34 regiment (the foreign regiment—Austrian) to hold itself ready for departure. A report prevails that a telegram from the Neapolitan Consul at Tunis had been received, announcing that the expedition of Garibaldi, consisting of 800 men, was there.

WHERE GARIBALDI LANDED.

Marsala, where Garibaldi has landed, is a port of Sicily, situated about twenty-four miles from Palermo. It belongs to the province of Trapani, which extends, as well as the province of Palermo and that of Messina, from the western coast of the island. Marsala carries on a large business in the wine which bears its name. It also deals in corn, flax, fruit, cotton, and salt. The population is about twenty thousand. It possesses a number of foreign commercial houses, the most important of which are English. It was a flourishing place under the Romans, and its prosperity was maintained until the close of the 15th century. In 1520 the port was filled up, by order of Charles V., to prevent the fleet of Soliman II. from getting possession of it. It has never completely recovered from that disaster, and vessels of large tonnage can not enter. The attack on Marsala indicates the plan conceived by Garibaldi. He carries the struggle on the north coast of the island, where all the strong places are situated, and approaches those positions which, if seized on by him, will give decisive results. On the other hand, the Neapolitan army appears to be prepared for an energetic defense. It had received information of the attack, and a good road had been formed to unite the towns on the coast, so that the concentration of troops might be readily and promptly effected.

As we go to press, a rumor is current that a battle has taken place between the invaders and the royal troops at a place about eight miles from Palermo. This, however, lacks confirmation. As soon as Garibaldi's force is ready, he will undoubtedly march on Palermo; but hardly enough time had elapsed, when the Africa sailed, for news to have arrived of his having done so. Our readers will find some further intelligence on the subject in the news pages, to which we refer.

E DISTANCE.

UNFORGOTTEN WORDS.

"HAVE you examined that bill, James?"
"Yes, Sir."
"Any thing wrong?"
"I find two errors."
"Ah! let me see."

The lad handed his employer a long bill that had been placed on his desk for examination. ten dol-

"Here is an error in the calculation of ten dollars, which they have made against themselves; and another error of ten dollars in the footing."

"Also against themselves?"

"Yes, Sir."

The merchant smiled in a way that struck the lad as peculiar.

"Twenty dollars against themselves!" he remarked, in a kind of pleasant surprise. "Trusty clerks they must be, then."

"Shall I correct the figures?" asked the lad.

"No; let them remain as mistakes. We don't examine bills for other people's benefit," replied the merchant. "It will be time enough for us to credit these errors when they find them out. All so much gain, as it now stands."

The boy's delicate moral sense was shocked at so unexpected a remark. He was the son of a poor widow, who had given him good instruction and taught him that to be just was the duty of all men. Mr. Carman, the merchant in whose employment he had been for only a few months, was an old friend of his father's, and a person in whom his mother reposed the highest confidence. In fact, James had always looked upon him as a kind of model man; and when Mr. Carman agreed to take him into his store, he felt that great good fortune was in the way.

He then corrected their own mistakes." The words made a strong impression on the mind of James Lewis. When first spoken by Mr. Carman, and with the meaning then involved, he felt, as we have said, hurt; but as he turned them over and over again in his thoughts, and connected their importance in a person who stood so high in his mother's estimation, he began to think that perhaps the thing was fair enough in business. Mr. Carman was the best man to do wrong.

In a few days after James examined the bill a clerk from the house by which it had been rendered called at the establishment. The lad, who was present, waited with considerable interest to see whether Mr. Carman would speak of the error. But he made no remark on that subject. A check for the amount of the bill as rendered was filled up, and a receipt taken.

"Is that right?" James asked himself this question. His moral sense said No; but the fact that Mr. Carman had so acted bewildered his mind.

"It can't be wrong in business"—so he thought with himself—"but it don't look honest. I wouldn't have believed it of him!"

Mr. Carman left the boy with him that was upon the boy's heart, and naturally tended to make him judge whatever he might do in the most favorable manner.

"I wish he had corrected that error," he said to himself a great many times when thinking, in a pleased way, of Mr. Carman and his own good fortune in having been received into his employment. "It don't look right; but maybe it's the way it is business."

One day he went to bank and drew the money for a check. In counting it over he found that the teller had paid him fifty dollars too much. So he went back to the counter and told him of the mistake. The teller thanked him, and he returned to the store with the pleasant consciousness in his mind of having done right.

"The teller overpaid me by fifty dollars," he said to Mr. Carman, as he handed him the money.

"Indeed!" replied the latter, a light breaking over his countenance. And he hastily counted the bank-bills.

The light faded as the last bill left his fingers.

"There's no mistake, James." A tone of disappointment was in his voice.

"Oh! I gave back the fifty dollars. Wasn't that right?"

"You simpleton!" exclaimed Mr. Carman. "Don't you know that bank mistakes are never corrected? If the teller had paid you fifty dollars short he would not have made it right."

The words fell like the knocks of James under this reproof. It is often the case that more shame is felt for a blunder than a crime. In this instance the sense of mortification at having done what Mr. Carman was pleased to call a silly thing; and he made up his mind that if they should ever pay him a thousand dollars at the bank he would bring the amount to his employer, and let him do as he pleased with the money.

"Let people look after their own mistakes," said Mr. Carman.

James Lewis pondered these things in his heart. The impression they made was too strong ever to be forgotten. "It may be right," he said to himself, but he did not feel altogether satisfied.

A month or two after the occurrence of that bank mistake, as James counted over his weekly wages, just received from Mr. Carman, he discovered that he had been paid half a dollar too much. The first impulse of his mind was to return the amount to his employer; and it was on his lip to say, "You have given me too much, Sir," when the unforgotten words, "Let people look after their own mistakes," flashed upon his thoughts, and made him hesitate. To hold a parley with evil is, in most cases, to be overcome.

"I must look out for myself," said James, as he put the money into his pocket. "If it is true in one case, it is true in another. Mr. Carman don't correct mistakes that people make in his favor; and he can't complain when the rule works against himself."

But the boy was very far from being in a comfortable state. He felt that to keep that half dollar would be a dishonest act. Still he could not make up his mind to return it; at least not then. He would retain it for the present, and think the matter over more carefully. He could, if the case did not prove clear on further reflection, make all right with himself and Mr. Carman.

To hold a parley with evil is, as we have just said, in most cases to be overcome; and it was unhappily so in the present case. James did not return the half dollar, but spent it for his own gratification. After he had done this it came suddenly into his thought that Mr. Carman might only be trying him, and he was filled with anxiety and alarm. How bitterly did he regret having spent the half dollar! For two or three days it was as much as he could to keep from starting when Mr. Carman spoke to him; or to look steadily into his face when receiving from him any direction. It was his first sad experience in wrong-doing. But as no lack of confidence was exhibited James felt reassured in a few days.

Not long afterward Mr. Carman repeated the same mistake. This time James kept the half dollar, or with less hesitation.

"Let him correct his own mistakes," said he, resolutely; "that's the doctrine he acts on with other people, and he complained if he got a bad piece in the coin he puts in circulation. I just wanted half a dollar."

From this time the fine moral sense of James Lewis was blunted. He had taken an evil counselor into his heart, who not only darkened his moral perceptions of right, but planted a spirit of covetousness—latent in almost every mind—and caused him to desire the possession of things beyond his ability to pay for.

James had good business qualities, and so pleased Mr. Carman by his intelligence, industry, and tact with customers, that he advanced him rapidly, and gave him before he was eighteen years of age the most responsible position in his store. But James had fatally fixed somewhere in his mind a power than how to do business well. He had learned to be dishonest—after the world. He had never forgotten the first lesson he received in that science; and he had acted upon it not only in two instances, but in many. He was now always to be the injury of Mr. Carman. He had long since given up waiting for mistakes to be made in his favor, but adopted the habit of making small calculated transactions of a large business in which he was trusted implicitly; for, strangely enough, he had never forgotten the words, "Let people look after their own mistakes." The man that his failure to be just to the letter in dealing might prove a snare to this young man.

James grew rapidly in the confidence of all always on the alert; always bright; always prompt to meet any approaches toward a discovery of his wrong-doing from his employer, who held him at the highest regard.

Then it went on until James Lewis was in his twenty-first year, and had become one of the partners in the firm. He was a partner that spoke of the young man as not keeping the most respectable company, and as spending more money for a clerk on a moderate salary. Before this time James had removed his mother into a pleasant house, for which he paid a rent of four hundred dollars. His salary was eight hundred dollars; but he received his mother by telling her that he received fifteen hundred. She was confident that she needed no more supplied, and she was beginning to feel that after a long and cheerful struggle with the world her happier days had come.

James was at his desk when the letter just referred to was handed to him by the porter. His mind was always on the alert, and suspicious of every movement that may involve betrayal or exposure. His face had deadened in its expression as he received the letter, and observed him change countenance suddenly. He read it over twice, and James saw that the contents, in some way, had produced a strong disturbance. While he was yet observing him, Mr. Carman glanced toward his desk, and their eyes met; it was but a momentary glance, but the look James received made his heart stop beating.

There was something about the movements of Mr. Carman for the rest of this day that troubled the young man. It was plain to him that suspicion had been aroused by that letter. Oh, how bitterly now did he feel the penalty of dishonesty and punishment, the evil of which he had been guilty! The fear of exposure, disgrace and ruin him, and how the head of his mother, it might be, even to the grave.

"I can not well this evening," said Mrs. Lewis, as she looked at her son's changed face across the tea-table, and noticed that he did not eat.

"My head aches," he replied, as he turned partly away from his mother's direct gaze.

"Perhaps the air will do you good better."

"I'll lie down on the sofa in the parlor for a short time," said the young man, rising from the table. "A little rest may give relief." And he went from the dining-room.

Mrs. Lewis followed him into the parlor in a little while, and offered, even by force, to send what she was lying placed her hand upon his head. Ah, it would take more than the loving pressure of a mother's hand to relieve the mental fever of a soul suffering. The touch of that pure hand increased the pain to agony.

"Do you feel better?" asked Mrs. Lewis, after she had remained for some time with her head on her forehead.

"Not much," he replied; and rising as he spoke, he added, "I think a walk in the open air will do me good."

"Don't go out, James," said Mrs. Lewis, a troubled feeling coming into her heart.

"I'll only walk a few squares." And James went from the parlor, and, taking up his hat, passed into the street without another word.

"There's something more than headache the matter with him,"was the thought of Mrs. Lewis, and the slight feeling of trouble she had experienced began deepening into a strange concern that involved a dread of coming evil.

For half an hour James walked without any purpose in his mind beyond escape from the presence of his mother. Every phase of Mr. Carman's manner toward him after the receipt of that letter was reviewed and dwelt on, in order if possible to determine whether suspicion of wrong-dealing was entertained. At last his aimless walk brought him into the neighborhood of Mr. Carman's store, and in passing he was surprised at seeing a light within.

"What can this mean?" he asked himself, a new fear creeping, with its shuddering impulses, into his heart.

He went near and listened by the door and window, but could hear no sound within.

"There's something wrong," he said. "What can it be? If this thing is discovered, what will be the end of it? Ruin! ruin! My poor mother!"

The wretched young man passed on, and walked the streets for two hours, when he returned home. His mother met him at the entrance, and inquired, with unconcealed anxiety, if he were better. He said Yes, but with a manner that only increased the trouble which she was trying unsuccessfully to hide from her own.

In the morning the strongly-uttered fear of James, as he met his mother at the breakfast table, struck alarm into her heart. He was silent, and evaded all her questions. While they still sat at the table the door-bell rang loudly. The maid attended James, and he turned his ear to listen in a nervous way in which did not escape the observation of his mother.

"Who is it?" asked Mrs. Lewis, as the servant came into the room.

"A gentleman wishes to see Mr. James," replied the girl.

James arose instantly, and went out into the hall, shutting the dining-room door as he did so. Mrs. Lewis sat, in almost breathless expectation, awaiting the return of her son. She heard him coming back in a few moments; but he did not enter the dining-room. Then he returned along the hall to the front door. Then she heard it shut. All was now silent. Starting up, she ran out into the passage, but James was not there. He had gone away with his visitor, he had called, and without a word!

Ah, that was a sad going-out! Mr. Carman had spent half the night in examining the accounts of James, and discovered frauds to the amount of seven thousand dollars. Bitterly indignant, he had sent an officer to arrest him early in the morning; and it was with this officer that the unhappy young man met from the home of his mother, never again to return.

"The young villain shall lie in the tell he has made for himself," exclaimed Mr. Carman, in his bitter indignation. And he did not hold back in any thing, but made the exposure of the young man's dishonesty as full as the trial he showed an eager desire to have him convicted, and presented such an array of evidence that the jury could not give any other than a verdict of Guilty."

The poor mother was in court, and audible, in the silence that followed, came her convulsed sobs upon the air. The presiding judge then addressed the culprit, and asked if he had any thing to say why sentence of the law should not be pronounced against him. James arose, and turned upon the pale, agitated young man, who arose with an effort, and leaned against the railing by which he stood, as if needing the support.

"Will it please your honors," he said, "to direct Mr. Carman, my prosecutor, to come a little nearer, so that I can look at him and your honors at the same time?"

Mr. Carman was directed to come forward to where the boy stood. There was a breathless silence in the court-room as the prosecutor obeyed the order, and moved forward so as to be in the eyes of all. James looked at him steadily for a few moments, and then turned to the judges.

"What I have to say, your honors, is this"—he spoke calmly and distinctly—"and it may, in a degree, extenuate, though it can not excuse, my crime. I went into that man's store an innocent boy; and if he had been an honest man I would not have stood before you to-day as a criminal."

Mr. Carman started from the young man, and appealed to the court for protection against allegations of such an outrageous character; but he was contemptuously ordered to be still.

"Only a few weeks after I was put on his employment I examined a bill by his direction, and discovered an error of twenty dollars.

The face of Mr. Carman reddened instantly.

"You remember it, I see," remarked James; "and I shall have cause to remember it while I live. The temptation to the error of Mr. Carman, and I asked if I should correct the figures, and he answered, 'No; let them correct their own mistakes. We don't examine bills for other people's benefit.' It was my first lesson in dishonesty, and I never forgot the words. I saw the bill settled, and Mr. Carman take the money. I knew that it was wrong. I felt shocked at first; it seemed such a wrong thing. But soon after, he called me a simpleton for handing back the teller of a bank fifty dollars overpaid on a check; and then—"

"May I ask the protection of the Court?" said Mr. Carman, appealing to the judges.

"Is it true what the lad says?" asked the presiding judge.

Mr. Carman hesitated, and looked confused. All eyes were on his face; and judges, jury, lawyers, and the prisoner waited for what he was guilty of leading the unhappy young man astray.

"Not long afterward," resumed young Lewis, "I received my wages. I found that Mr. Carman had paid me fifty cents too much. I was about giving it back to him when I remembered his remark about letting people correct their own mistakes, and said to myself, 'Let him correct his own errors,' and dishonestly kept the money. Again the same thing happened, and again I kept the money that did not, of right, belong to me. This was how James Lewis fell, and how I, Mr. Carman has shown an eagerness to convict and have me punished, as the court has seen. If he had shown my mercy I might have kept silent. But now I interpose the truth, and may it incline you to show some consideration for the unhappiest being that is alive to-day."

The young man covered his face with his hands, and sat down overpowered by his feelings. His mother, who was near him, sobbed out aloud, and bending over, laid her hands on his head, saying,

"My poor boy! My poor boy!"

There were few eyes in the court-room undimmed. In the silence that followed Mr. Carman spoke out:

"Is my character to be thus blasted on the word of a criminal, your honors? Is this right? Is this just? Is this the protection a citizen finds in the court-room?"

"Your solemn oath that this charge is untrue," said the judge, "will place you all right. It was the unhappy boy's only opportunity, and the Court felt bound, in humanity, to hear what he wished to say."

James Lewis stood up again instantly, and turned his white face and dark piercing eyes upon Mr. Carman:

"Let him take that oath if he dare!" he exclaimed.

The counsel for the prosecution now interfered, and called the attention of the court to an oath illegal, and unheard of before in a court-room. But the judge commanded order, and then said to Mr. Carman:

"The Court offers you the only way of reparation in its power. Your oath will scatter the allegation of the criminal to the winds. Will you swear?"

Mr. Carman turned with a distressed look toward his counsel, while James kept his eyes fixed upon him. There was a brief conference, and the lawyer said,

"The proceeding is irregular, and I have advised my client to make no response. At the same time the protest against all this as an outrage upon the rights of a citizen."

The judges bowed, and Mr. Carman withdrew.

After a brief consultation with his associates, the presiding judge said, addressing the criminal,

"In consideration of your youth, and the temptation to which, in tender years, you were subjected by subjected, the Court gives you its lightest sentence, one year's imprisonment. At the same time, in pronouncing this sentence, let me solemnly warn you against any further steps in the way you have taken. Crime can have no valid excuse. It is evil in the sight of God and man, and leads only to suffering. When you come forth again, after your brief incarceration, may it be with the resolution to be rather than commit a crime!"

And the curtain fell on that sad scene in the boy's life. When it lifted again, and he came forth from prison, a year afterward, he was dead. From the day her pale face faded from his vision as he passed from the court-room he never looked upon her again.

Ten years afterward a man sat reading a newspaper in a first-class inn, town. He had a calm, serious face, and looked like one who had known suffering and trial.

"Brought justice at last!" he said to himself, as the blood came into his face. "Convicted on the charge of fraudulent insolvency, and sent to the State Prison for two years for the man who gave me in tender years the first lesson in wrongdoing! Too well, alas! did I remember his words. But, thank God, other words have been since remembered. 'When you come forth again,' said the judge, 'may it be with the resolution to die rather than commit a crime!' and I have kept that injunction in my heart when there seemed no way of escape except through crime; and, God helping me, I will keep it to the end."

TENANTS AT NUMBER TWENTY-SEVEN.

IT was summer twenty-seven of a quiet London street, the number at which it is meant to specify here. It had stood empty for a considerable time, and such of the neighbors as were of a speculative turn of mind had begun to wonder among themselves how much longer it would remain without a tenant; when one chill, misty autumn morning, shortly after dawn, a cab drove up to the empty house, from which slighted a tall, gaunt, middle-aged person, of rather severe aspect, attired in a foraging cap and a long gray military cape; whose face was half concealed by a thick tangled beard and mustache, and who, as he did so, was coming wintry with age. Beneath the shaggy gloom of his eyebrows burned a strange, restless, fitful fire, and when he spoke his voice had a resonant, and the whole of his worn and rugged face became visible, the deep tracks and furrows left by care and suffering began to be distinctly prominent into view. He held in one hand a small, leather-bound box, on the top of which was a tiny brass plate, with "Captain Lisard" engraved upon it.

Having satisfied himself that no one was a witness of his arrival, Captain Lisard turned round, and assisted a tall, slender young lady to alight, evidently his daughter, from the inner chaise, and in spite of the difference in sex and age, existed between them; who was followed out of the cab by a tall, rich-colored female of service—dressed, even in faded black bombazine. Captain Lisard, accompanied by his daughter, ascended the steps, unlocked the door, and entered the house. The female in black, whom the Captain addressed by the name of Parish, having paid the driver, at once followed her master; and the door was immediately closed, double locked, and bolted.

They passed on from one room to another, slowly, and without speaking; for there is something solemn in a large and empty house, especially if seen in the dull haze of morning or evening. It was chill and damp outside; but within it seemed as though they held pri-moist atmosphere of a grave-yard, nipping the very marrow of those who entered, waking prolonged and hollow echoes of their footsteps, and making the loudness of ordinary conversation seem a profanation of the dim solitude.

"Surely a large house, papa?" whispered the young lady, when they had passed out of the rooms.

"Would not a smaller one have satisfied our wants? Our furniture will not fill half of these large rooms."

"Not too large for the heiress to the Pinchlock estates," said the Captain, with an extensive sweep of the arm and motion of his gray mustache. "Besides, Carry, I never could bear to live in those pottering little boxes where cramping people contrive somehow or other to exist. Spacious and lofty rooms are one of the necessities of life to a gentleman," added he, again, you know," he added, mysteriously, laying his hand on her arm, "they will never think of looking for me here. That's the grand point—to throw them off the track till I've had time to complete my case and set them at defiance. For they will shriek from nothing—no, I—nothing, nothing! Not even my life will be safe from them if they discover my retreat!"

His sallow cheeks flushed as he spoke, and a wild wilo-o'-the-wisp fire burned in his eyes. He turned and left the room, and tramped heavily over the sounding stairs, still carrying the leather-bound box, till he reached a small room at the very top of the house. Opening a little closet which was built in the wall, he placed the box within it, and having locked the door, proceeded to survey the rest of the rooms up stairs.

The furniture arrived in the course of the morning. Captain Luard was restless and uneasy, till it was all properly placed, and the men who brought it had departed. Seated on a large box, he then proceeded to give his instructions to his little household.

"You are both of you aware," he began, very gravely, "for what reason I have taken this house. It will contain no tenant from the street the appearance of being empty and to let. The shutters of the lower floor windows will remain closed; and the upper rooms will remain, as they are now, empty. You, Parish, will take up your quarters in the basement story; you, Carry, in the room to the back immediately over it; while one of the small rooms up stairs will serve me for a study. Once every week, Parish, after dark, you will be allowed to go out for the purpose of buying the needful supply of provisions, at which times I will let you out and let myself, and will teach you how to knock so that I may recognize you. Oh! if we can only succeed in remaining concealed for a short time, all will go well. Time is all I want. A few short weeks—perhaps even a few short days—and every thing will be clear, and I shall triumph. The other day, in the other city, (they don't like almost forget) I had the whole case clearly mapped out in my head; but some one interrupted me, and it all slipped from me in a moment. But it must be found again; for it lies there—there, in my little box—waiting for me. To-morrow I shall begin."

The Captain kept his room for the remainder of the day, according to his custom down stairs in the Parish out, and again to admit her when she returned with provisions. He retired to bed at an early hour, after seeing that all the doors and windows were carefully secured. Carry sat up for a short time after, keeping Parish company, for she did not care to be left alone after dark in that gloomy room up stairs. At length she, too, retired, and Parish was left alone. That exemplary female continued for some time her occupation of darning the Captain's socks, till catching yawrid nodding over her work, she took off her spectacles and put it away.

"A grewsome, ghostly house this," she muttered, gently rubbing her elbows, and stamping her feet; "for me to be our little family, and I don't feel half comfortable in it. Why couldn't the Captain take a cottage in the country? But that was always the way with him—big ideas and ways, and little money to keep them up with. And now his poor wife was left to keep-gathering women and worse every day. As for his chance of getting the Pinchlock estates, I wouldn't give tuppence for all the papers he has in his box. A grewsome, lonely place, indeed! I declare I'm almost afraid to go up stairs to bed."

Before going up stairs she thought she would take another glance round the area, and see that the door of the coal-hole was properly secured; so, unfastening the door with as little noise as possible, she stepped out into the darkness, leaving the candle burning on the table inside. But hardly had she crossed the threshold when a hollow voice whispered suddenly:

"Jane Parish!"

It was all she could do to keep from screaming as she stepped back into the house and bolted the door. A momentary glance had revealed to her a dark figure standing with folded arms, looking down at her over the area railings. Her heart was still quaking with the fright, when she was again startled by hearing herself called a second time.

"Who are you?" asked Parish through the keyhole, grasping the poker in one hand. "You are not known here. We are strangers, and know nobody. If you stay here another minute I'll call the police."

"Cruel fair one!" replied the voice outside. "Know that I am desperately in love with you. Oh, relieve my suspense, and say that you will be mine!"

Parish's brow grew dark, and her eyes flashed as she listened to these audacious words.

"——— Sir, or it will be worse for you! You she exclaimed, in great cruel words," reme desperate my pa-

"Who are you, Sir?—who are you? What's your name?" screamed the irate Parish.

"My name's Penggion. I am a young man, and have a little money in the bank."

"You scamp!" said Parish, shaking the poker as though he could see her through the door. "Be gone this instant, or I will call my master, and I warn you he'll shoot you like a dog!"

A low, peculiar laugh was the only reply, but Parish recognized it in an instant, and flung the door open the moment she heard it.

"Mr. Harry Welford, Sir, how came he" she cried. "I think you might have found some other way of letting us know of your return, without frightening an old woman like me."

"Parish, old girl, don't be angry with me," exclaimed a tall, sunburned young man, springing nimbly over the railings, and jumping down and grasping the housekeeper's hand.

"It was all for your good, Parish—but you never did things like any body else."

"Nonsense, old friend. I meant no harm, I assure you. And, see, you seem to be highly gratified, for when you went write home to your friends you may say with truth that you have had an advantageous offer of marriage, but you didn't choose to accept it. And now tell me how the Captain and Carry both are. I have heard no news of them for years."

"Before I answer your question," said Parish, "tell me how you found us out. The Captain thinks we are secure from all the world."

"Oh, that's a very simple matter," replied Welford. "On landing from the vessel I found a note from Captain Luard, which was left by a boy, informing me of his change of residence. I set off as soon as I could, found the street and the house, and seeing no light in it, and the shutters were afraid of disturbing you, and was just about to retire when you opened the door."

"And you have been away three years?" said Parish, interrogatively.

"Four-and-twenty nine days. But tell me how Carry and the Captain are."

Parish shook her head sadly; and, while she set about preparing some refreshment for him in his a full budget of news concerning the family; how poor they were; how the Captain's property had involved him in a Chancery suit, which was a contesting a hopeless suit, till but a mere trifle of it remained; of the Captain's present infatuation; and of the plan he proposed before them. They sat up talking far into the night; after which Parish prepared a shakedown for Harry before the kitchen fire, and then made him comfortable.

Welford's presence there was a glad surprise next morning both to Carry and her father, for he was dear to both. Carry was the only Captain Luard's oldest friend; and when that friend died, poor man, the Captain took him home, educated him, and, when he was old enough, in accordance with Harry's own wish, obtained for him a situation as supercargo on board a trader from abroad. Carry and he had grown up together like brother and sister; and when the time came for them to separate, after their return from the engagement, they separated without fear, confident that neither of them would forget the other. It seemed not improbable to the Captain that they two should marry as soon as the proper time should come; and though the Captain had never said a word to either of them on the subject, he could hardly have been blind to the facts; and the two people most concerned in the matter never had a doubt as to the result.

Carry and Welford went out after breakfast for a walk, and a very interesting one, doubtless, it proved, they found it. Parish was informed, and having so much to tell one another, Harry's love, hitherto unspoken, now found winged words; and he determined to take an early opportunity of speaking to the Captain on the subject of his marriage.

Captain Luard invited Welford up into his study after dinner.

"Only a poor place this to receive you in, Harry, my boy," he said; "but the next time you come, I hope we shall have a better: in fact, there is no doubt of it. Your arrival may even consider the whole matter as settled. Of course it will make a great change in Carry's prospects, as she will then be heiress to the Pinchlock estates; and I think I am not going too far in saying that she will then be one of the most eligible young ladies in England; in fact, between ourselves, I intend her to marry into the aristocracy. But remember, Harry, my boy, where the trouble lies, there it yours also. I hope then to have influence to get you some snug little thing under Government, far better than the miserable affair you are at now. Oh, never fear that I shall forget your interests!"

Here was an end to all Harry's brilliant visions for the Captain spoke with such seeming authority —with so much pretension and earnestness—that the young man could hardly doubt but such vast expectations had no foundation in fact. Anyway, it would not do for him to stay there any longer, thinking away the best of Carry Luard's daughter. Let the cost and pain be what they might, he must go at once. He was constrained and silent for the remainder of the day; and though Carry perceived the change in his demeanor, she was at a loss to account for it. He parted from her that night with a tenderness which he tried in vain to conceal; but next morning, when they all parted to sleep in Liverpool, and that several weeks would probably elapse before his return. Carry felt hurt and grieved that he should go away so suddenly, without a parting word to her, but was too proud to show how deeply her feelings were wounded. Parish was out of temper all that day, and kept muttering under her breath something about the lad being a fool, and not knowing when he was well off.

Until December passed away, and the last month of the year was come, when one evening Captain Luard startled his daughter and Parish by bursting into the room where they were sitting—a wild flame of excitement burning in his eyes.

"I've seen him!" he exclaimed, in a hoarse whisper. "I have found him out at last—and never I might be! Something bade me go into his front room and look out of the window; and I saw him standing under the lamp-post, looking up at the house. There is no more peace for us here."

"What man is it, papa?"

"The man with the green studs."

"But you are mistaken, papa. How could you distinguish his studs from the place where you were standing?"

"Mistaken! A man is never mistaken in the person of his bitterest enemy. What nonsense you talk! I tell you that I saw him—nay, he is probably there still. Come, let us go and look; but be careful that his sharp eyes do not find you out. Allons!"

They followed him up stairs, trembling a little, and hardly knowing what to think. He led them into one of the front rooms, which was faintly lighted up by a lamp on the opposite side of the street.

"Behold him!" he whispered, seizing Carry by the shoulders. "See, he is leaning with folded arms against the lamp-post. His green studs shine in the dark like serpents' eyes."

There was no one there.

Next morning Captain Luard was so ill as to be unable to rise. Parish, who was called in meanwhile shook his head when Parish took him on one side to ask his opinion, and said, "Wait a while; I can not pronounce at present."

Day after day passed without much visible change in the Captain's condition. He remained in bed most of the time, with a feeble wreck of a man—heedless, for the most part, of what was passing around; buried in his own sad reflections, and yet keeping anxiously the dark issue which he was tending. Still the old idea never left him—that some mysterious foe was endeavoring to hunt him down, and he was in a constant state of much anxiety to him that he could no longer look after the proper security of the house, and see that no strangers had free access, or allowed to set foot across the threshold.

One night, Parish, who had been sitting up, and anger had he seen Parish enter the house, as she did one evening, accompanied by a gentleman with a green shade over his eyes, and a heavy cane; who followed her down the steps into the basement story, stepping lightly in the echo of the housekeeper's own treacherous tread.

Parish struck a light, and then turned round and confronted her companion with a stern, searching gaze, as though asking her by what right she had intruded there.

She was a woman who, years before, had probably been handsome, but upon whom a heavy shadow of the beauty of former times still clung to her. But whatever of sweet bloom and cultivation there had been, it was now shorn was now choked up, overgrown, and all but lost to view, beneath the coarse growth of after-years—years of despair, and hopeless misery, and discomfort in her better self.

"Thus, then, we meet again," said Parish, in a low, stern, concentrated voice.

"Thus again," replied the woman, "after seventeen weary years."

"It should have been seventeen more before we met. Why have you sought me?"

"Not to upbraid you, but to make any claim on the forgiveness which you, perhaps, think yourself entitled to dispense. I come to see him."

"Madam, what have I to do with you, or you to him? Nothing—less than nothing—less than if he had never seen you!"

"You forget, so you preach, as ignorance ever preaches till suffering brings knowledge. Nothing to me! O Heaven! can I ever forget that he once called me his wife; that on his lips kissed me; that his arms sheltered me; that his child called me mother; that he lived but to make me happy! Nothing to me!"

"You forget," said the stern, unmoved housekeeper, "that when you left his house of your own accord—left him to misery—he lost both his wife and his friend—that wife and that friend became, in point of fact, dead to him forever; as dead as if you had died on the day you left your home; that he were mourning for them as if such had been the case; and that for him there are no such persons as Emily Luard and Richard Marbeet in existence."

"I forget nothing. I know every thing you would say—all the reproaches you would heap upon me, and how your wrath has been gathering strength during the years. What then? I know things that you can never know; that if he has suffered, I have suffered too—oh! how bitterly! that if I were to forgive his injuries, I wrecked my own also. I make no claim on that score, either on your compassion or on his. What would it avail me if he were to forgive me the great wrong I did him? If he were to pardon me a thousand times, I could never pardon myself; and there lies the sting. But let him—I will not—I come neither to talk about myself, nor to exchange idle words with you. The man whom I once called my husband lies ill, perhaps dying, up stairs; and him once more I am determined to see."

"You can not—he would not receive you."

"I do not want him to receive me. All I want is, to see him again, even though he be asleep."

"Parish answered, with decision.

"Wait here," she said, "while I go up stairs and see how he is."

The woman bowed her head, and Parish took the candle and went up stairs. In a minute or two she returned.

"Come," she said; and the woman flitted up stairs, behind her, noiseless as a shadow.

"He is asleep," whispered Parish, when they reached the door of Captain Luard's room. "Remember that you look only, and do not speak. I would not for the world that he should awake and find you here."

"Fear not," replied the stranger. "Let me but see him, and I shall go on my way content."

Parish opened the door gently, and holding the candle aloft with one hand, shaded it with the other, so that the light should not fall too strongly on the sleeper's face. By the dim candle-light enough, one arm thrown over the coverlet, and the other called beneath his head, his thin and care-worn face looking, even in sleep, sad ghastly still from its setting of beard and mustache.

"What a change!" said a change" muttered the woman. "Lost to me forever!" It was all that she could say.

Enough, Parish, in a low, stern voice, turning to leave the room. But before she was aware, the woman had glided from her side, and, stooping over the sick man, had imprinted a light kiss on his lips. Light as it was, it was sufficient to break his feverish slumber; and he called out, loudly,

"Parish, is that you? You should not have disturbed me. Give me something to drink."

Parish was too angry at what she had just seen to venture a reply, and gave her master a drink without speaking. At that moment Caroline, who had come out to purchase some delicacy for her father, entered the house. The woman had disappeared from the room, and Parish was in an agony of fear lest Caroline should encounter her on the stairs. No such meeting, however, took place; for Carry entered the room as quietly as usual, and went to her father's side.

The Captain again disposed himself for sleep; and Caroline, kneeling at her post, Parish hastened down to see what had become of her strange guest.

She found her kneeling on the rug before the kitchen fire, her head pressed tightly upon the chest, rocking herself to and fro. She neither spoke nor wept, but as Parish looked down on her, there was what is hard, dry, rigid, and at with such ineffaceable lines into her face, that the words of reproach with which the housekeeper had come to upbraid died away on her lips in silence. At length the woman roused herself like one trying to shake off an overwhelming dream; and stood up before the housekeeper terrible in her agony.

"I crouched into a dark corner," she began, in a slow, measured voice, very different from her former vehemence, "and saw my child my daughter, passed me, and knew not that I was there. Her dress brushed across my face, and I kissed it as it passed. I saw her grief moments after, and knew of her presence was about me; and this is all of her I have had in my lives. Sod, is it not? And yet she is my own people may not be my child, but she is my own Carry, my own daughter. She used to call me 'mamma,' and put my head on my breast; and now I may neither touch her, nor kiss her, not even speak to her. Sad again, is it not? Is you, I know, have told her about its being dead, but is that any comfort to me? Don't be alarmed. I am not going to intrude myself before her and him. I have had my happiness of both for a time; Parish, that there is one thing you can do for me —one little kindness you can do to a poor wretched woman—carry to your mistress, my beggar before you. Procure me a lock of my darling's hair. Will you?"

"I will; you may trust me."

"Then let me go; my business here is done. I will not trouble you to-morrow evening in the street; and after that you shall see me no more. I dare not come here again. If I did, I should drown myself afterwards; and I am not fit to die."

Parish opened the door.

"Dear ones, farewell!" murmured the unhappy woman; and departed, and was lost to view.

Captain Luard lingered on for some time after this, apparently neither better nor worse than before; but one morning, when Parish entered his room, she found that a dread visitor had been there in the night, and that in silence and darkness her master had departed with him.

When the first burst of grief was over, and the necessity of immediate action made itself felt, Parish addressed Harry Welford, who was not long in answering the summons; and all the onerous duties which must be performed at such a time lie devolved upon him. In the course of a few days need not be dwelt over in here. It was finally arranged that Caroline, accompanied by Parish, should go and reside with a maiden aunt in Derbyshire. From the wreck of the Captain's property was saved sufficient to enable them both to live in modest independence.

Whatever fleeting clouds had at one time interposed between Caroline and Welford did not vanished forever. They could not speak of love at such a season, but they understood each other thoroughly.

On the afternoon of the last day of the year, they set off, arm in arm, to pay a last visit to the churchyard where all that remained of Captain Luard now lay; for Carry was to leave London on the following morning. The sky was overcast when they set out, and the weather bitterly cold. A few premonitory flakes of snow fell at intervals, forerunners of what the night would bring. They passed slowly into the field of the dead, took their last look in silence, and then turned to depart.

A short distance from the path stood a woman, faded and miserable-looking, whose eyes were fixed earnestly on them as they drew near. Instinctively Welford slipped a coin out of his pocket and offered it to the woman; but she drew back with a slight wave of the hand. Welford colored up.

"TIME IS ALL I WANT."

"I ask your pardon for the mistake," said he.

The woman did not reply, but drew her shawl more closely round her; and Caroline, looking back at the turn of the walk, saw her still standing there, with her eyes fixed earnestly on them. She did not stir till they were out of sight, and then she approached the grave they had just left, but with a more importunate grief than theirs—a grief that heeded neither darkness nor storm.

Meanwhile Caroline and Welford passed slowly on through the lighted streets of the great city; sorrowful, indeed, and mourning for their loss; but in their hearts young love sat brooding with folded wings, and all the future lay golden before them.

THE ENCAMPMENT AT ORANGEBURG, SOUTH CAROLINA.

WE present our readers with a view of the encampment of the Washington Light Infantry, of Charleston, South Carolina. The point chosen was in the village of Orangeburg, about eighty miles from the city. This village is known as one of the most beautiful in the State. The residences are spacious, and the lots vary in size from four to twelve acres. The shade trees form a striking feature, and add much to the attractions of the place. In one of the most beautiful of these grounds the Infantry made their camp. As will be seen by a glance at the picture, the immense shade trees and luxuriant shrubbery cause the tents to appear quite small; the opening through the centre of the encampment is the main avenue —thirty feet wide—which leads to the family mansion. At the entrance of it stands the "guard tent," and near the house the "marques" for the officers. On either side are the tents, arranged in the order of a battalion encampment, in all twenty-four—twelve on the right, and twelve on the left of the main street. The tents are arranged in rows of six each, which face each other on streets of convenient width.

The company carried with them the "Eutaw flag," the only standard of the Revolution which is known to exist in the State, and which was given to the corps by the widow of Col. William Washington.

The Washington Light Infantry was organized in 1807, during the excitement growing out of the "Leopard and Chesapeake affair," and is known as "the banner corps of South Carolina." It is at present commanded by Captain Charles H. Simonton, a prominent lawyer of the city.

IV.

No circumstance of the slightest importance happened on my way to the offices of Messrs. Gilmore and Kyrle, in Chancery Lane.

While my card was being taken in to Mr. Kyrle, a consideration occurred to me which I deeply regretted not having thought of before. The information derived from Marian's diary made it a matter of certainty that Count Fosco had opened her first letter from Blackwater Park to Mr. Kyrle, and had, by means of his wife, intercepted the second. He was, therefore, well aware of the address of the office, and he would naturally infer that if Marian wanted advice and assistance after Laura's escape from the Asylum she would apply once more to the experience of Mr. Kyrle. In this case, the office in Chancery Lane was the very first place which he and Sir Percival would cause to be watched; and if the same persons were chosen for the purpose who had been employed to follow me before my departure from England, the fact of my return would, in all probability, be ascertained on that very day. I had thought, generally, of the chances of my being recognized in the streets; but the special risk connected with the office had never occurred to me until the present moment. It was too late now to repair this unfortunate error in judgment—too late to wish that I had made arrangements for meeting the lawyer in some place privately appointed beforehand. I could only resolve to be cautious on leaving Chancery Lane, and not to go straight home again under any circumstances whatever.

After waiting a few minutes, I was shown into Mr. Kyrle's private room. He was a pale, thin, quiet, self-possessed man, with a very attentive eye, a very low voice, and a very undemonstrative manner; not (as I judged) ready with his sympathy where strangers were concerned, and not at all easy to disturb in his professional composure. A better man for my purpose could hardly have been found. If he committed himself to a decision at all, and if the decision was favorable, the strength of our case was as good as proved from that moment.

"Before I enter on the business which brings me here," I said, "I ought to warn you, Mr. Kyrle, that the shortest statement I can make of it may occupy some little time."

"My time is at Miss Halcombe's disposal," he replied. "Where any interests of hers are concerned, I represent my partner personally as well as professionally. It was his request that I should do so when he ceased to take an active part in business."

"May I inquire whether Mr. Gilmore is in England?"

"He is not: he is living with his relatives in Germany. His health has improved, but the period of his return is still uncertain."

While we were exchanging these few preliminary words he had been searching among the papers before him, and he now produced from them a sealed letter. I thought he was about to hand the letter to me; but, apparently changing his mind, he placed it by itself on the table, settled himself in his chair and silently waited to hear what I had to say.

Without wasting a moment in prefatory words of any sort I entered on my narrative, and put him in full possession of the events which have already been related in these pages.

Lawyer as he was to the very marrow of his bones, I startled him out of his professional composure. Expressions of incredulity and surprise which he could not repress interrupted me several times before I had done. I persevered, however, to the end, and as soon as I reached it, boldly asked the one important question.

"What is your opinion, Mr. Kyrle?"

He was too cautious to commit himself to an answer without taking time to recover his self-possession first.

"Before I give my opinion," he said, "I must beg permission to clear the ground by a few questions."

He put the questions—sharp, suspicious, unbelieving questions, which clearly showed me, as they proceeded, that he thought I was the victim of a delusion; and that he might even have doubted, but for my introduction to him by Miss Halcombe, whether I was not attempting the perpetration of a cunningly-designed fraud.

"Do you believe that I have spoken the truth, Mr. Kyrle?" I asked, when he had done examining me.

"So far as your own convictions are concerned I am certain you have spoken the truth," he replied. "I have the highest esteem for Miss Halcombe, and I have therefore every reason to respect a gentleman whose medication she trusts in a matter of this kind. I will even go further, if you like, and admit, for course's sake and for argument's sake, that the identity of Lady Glyde, as a living person, is a proved fact to Miss Halcombe and yourself. But you come to me for a legal opinion. As a lawyer, and as a lawyer only, it is my duty to tell you, Mr. Hartright, that you have not the shadow of a case."

"You put it strongly, Mr. Kyrle."

"I will try to put it plainly as well. The evidence of Lady Glyde's death is, on the face of it, clear and satisfactory. There is her aunt's testimony to prove that she came to Count Fosco's house, that she fell ill, and that she died. There is the testimony of the medical certificate to prove the death, and to show that it took place under natural circumstances. There is the fact of the funeral at Limmeridge, and there is the assertion of the inscription on the tomb. That is the case you want to overthrow. What evidence have you to support the declaration on your side that the person who died and was buried was not Lady Glyde? Let us run through the main points of your statement and see what they are worth. Miss Halcombe goes to a certain private asylum, and there sees a certain female patient. Is it known that a woman named Anne Catherick, and bearing an extraordinary personal resemblance to Lady Glyde, escaped from the Asylum; it is known that the person received there last July was received as Anne Catherick by the book; it is known that the gentleman who brought her back warned Mr. Fairlie that it was part of her insanity to be bent on personating his dead niece; and it is known that she did repeatedly declare herself, in the Asylum (where no one believed her), to be Lady Glyde. These are all facts. What have you to set against them? Miss Halcombe's recognition of the woman, which recognition after-events invalidate or contradict. Does Miss Halcombe assert her supposed sister's identity to the owner of the Asylum, and take legal means for procuring her? No: she secretly bribes a nurse to let her escape. When the patient has been released in this doubtful manner, and is taken to Mr. Fairlie, does he recognize her? is he staggered for one instant in his belief of his niece's death? No. Do the servants recognize her? No. Is she kept in the neighborhood to assert her own identity, and to stand the test of further proceedings? No: she is privately taken to London. In the mean time, you have recognized her also—but you are not a relative; you are not even an old friend of the family. The servants contradict you; and Mr. Fairlie contradicts Miss Halcombe; and the supposed Lady contradicts herself. She declares she [illegible]t in London at a certain house. [illegible]hows that she has never [illegible]d your own admission [illegible]prevents you from [illegible]t to investigate [illegible]over minor points of evidence, on both sides, to save time; and I ask you, if this case were to go now into a court of law—as I believe it will—bound to take facts as they reasonably appear—where are your proofs?"

I was obliged to wait and collect myself before I could answer him. It was the first time the story of Laura and the story of Anne had been presented to me from a stranger's point of view—the first time the terrible obstacles that lay across our path had been made to show themselves in their true character.

"There can be no doubt," I said, "that the facts, as you have stated them, appear to tell against us; but—"

"But you think those facts can be explained away," interposed Mr. Kyrle. "Let me tell you the result of my experience on that point. When an English jury has to choose between a plain fact, on the surface, and a long explanation under the surface, it always takes the fact in preference to the explanation. For example, Lady Glyde (I call her by the name you represent by that name for argument's sake) declares she has slept at a certain house, and it is proved that she has not slept at that house. You explain this circumstance by entering into the state of her mind, and deducing from it a mental physical conclusion. I don't say the conclusion is wrong—I only say that the jury will take the fact of her contradicting herself in reference to any reason for the contradiction that you can offer."

"But is it not possible," I urged, "by dint of patience and exertion, to discover additional evidence? Miss Halcombe and I have a few hundred pounds—"

He looked at me with a half-suppressed pity, and shook his head.

"Consider the subject, Mr. Hartright, from your own point of view," he said. "If you are right about Sir Percival and Count Fosco (which I am not to admit, mind), every imaginable difficulty would be thrown in the way of your getting fresh evidence. Without nothing about expenses, because my partner and myself would advance whatever was necessary where Miss Halcombe's interests were concerned. It is the difficulties and the delays that would be too much for us. Every obstacle of litigation would be put in our way; every inch of the case would be systematically contested—and by the time we had spent our thousands, instead of our hundreds, the case would break down in all probability, be against us. Questions of identity, where instances of personal resemblance are concerned, are themselves the most difficult of questions to settle—the hardest, even when they are free from the complications which beset the case we are now discussing. I can see no prospect of throwing any light whatever on this extraordinary affair. Even if the person buried in Limmeridge churchyard be not Lady Glyde, she was, in life, on your own showing, so like her, that we should gain nothing if we applied to the testamentary authority to have the body exhumed. In short, there is no case, Mr. Hartright—really no case at all."

I was determined to believe that there was a case, and, in that determination, shifted my ground and tried him on another point.

"Are there not other proofs that we might produce besides the proof of identity?" I asked.

"Not any," he replied. "The simplest and surest of all proofs, the proof by comparison of dates, is, as I understand, altogether out of the question. You could show a discrepancy between the date of the doctor's certificate and the date of Lady Glyde's journey to London, but you could not show a totally different aspect; and I should be the first to say, 'Let us go on.'"

"That date may yet be recovered, Mr. Kyrle."

"On the day when it is recovered, Mr. Hartright, you will have a case. If you have any other proofs in the moment, of getting at it—tell me, and we shall see if I can advise you."

I considered. My housekeeper could not help us; Laura could not help us; Marian could not help us. In all probability the only persons in existence who knew the date were Sir Percival and the Count.

"I can think of no means of ascertaining the date at present," I said, "because I can think of no persons who are sure to know it but Count Fosco and Sir Percival Glyde."

Mr. Kyrle's calmly-scientific face relaxed, for the first time, into a smile.

"With your opinion of the character of those two gentlemen," he said, "you don't expect help in that quarter, I presume? If they have combined to gain large sums of money by a conspiracy, they are not likely to confess it at any rate."

"They may be forced to confess it, Mr. Kyrle."

"By whom?"

"By me."

We both rose. He looked me attentively in the face, with more appearance of interest than he had shown yet. I could see that I had perplexed him a little.

"You are very determined," he said. "You have, no doubt, a personal motive for proceeding, into which it is not my business to inquire. If a case can be produced in the future, I can only say my best assistance is at your service. At the same time I must warn you, as the money question always enters into the law question, that I see little hope, even if you ultimately established the fact of Lady Glyde's being alive, of recovering her fortune. The foreigner would probably leave the country before proceedings were commenced; and Sir Percival's embarrassments are numerous enough and pressing enough to transfer almost any sum of money he may possess from himself to his creditors. You are, of course, aware—"

I stopped him at that point.

"Let me beg that we may not discuss Lady Glyde's affairs," I said. "I have never known a say thing about them in former times, and I know nothing of them now—except that her fortune is lost. You are right in assuming that I have personal motives for stirring in this matter. I wish those motives to be always as disinterested as they are at the present moment—"

He tried to interpose and explain. I was a little hasty, I suppose, by feeling that he had doubted me; and I went on bluntly without waiting to hear him.

"There shall be no money-motive," I said, "no idea of personal advantage in the service I mean to render to Lady Glyde. She has been cast out as a stranger from the house in which she was born — a lie which records her death has been written on her mother's tomb—and there are two men, and two men only, living who are responsible for it. That house shall open again to receive her in the presence of every soul who followed the false hearse to the grave; that lie shall be publicly erased from the tombstone by the authority of the head of the family; and those two men shall answer for their crime to me, though the justice that sits in tribunals is powerless to pursue them. I have given my life to that purpose; and alone as I stand, if God spares me, I will accomplish it."

He drew back from his table and said nothing. His face showed plainly that he thought my delusion had got the better of my reason, and that he considered it totally useless to give me any more advice.

We each kept our opinion, Mr. Kyrle, I said, "and I will wait till the events of the future decide between us. In the mean time I am much obliged to you for the attention you have paid to my statement. You have shown me that the legal remedy lies, in every sense of the word, beyond our means. We can not produce the law-proof; and we are not rich enough to pay the law expenses. It is something gained to know that."

I bowed and walked to the door. He called me back and gave me the letter which I had given him after I sat at table by itself at the beginning of our interview.

"This came by post a few days ago," he said. "Perhaps you will not mind delivering it? Pray tell Miss Halcombe at the same time that I sincerely regret being thus far unable to help her—sincerely regret, which will not be more welcome, I am afraid, to her than to you."

I looked at the letter while he was speaking. It was addressed to "Miss Halcombe. Care of Messrs. Gilmore & Kyrle, Chancery Lane." The handwriting was quite unknown to me.

On leaving Mr. Kyrle, I asked one last question.

"Do you happen to know," I said, "if Sir Percival Glyde is still in Paris?"

"He has returned to London," replied Mr. Kyrle. "I saw his name used so from his solicitor, whom I met yesterday."

After that answer I went out.

In leaving Laura to the first precaution to be observed was to abstain from attracting attention by stopping to look about me. I walked toward one of the large squares which are situated on the north of Holborn—then suddenly stopped and turned round at a place where a long stretch of pavement lay on my left hand.

There were two men at the corner of the square who had stopped also, and who were walking slowly together. After a moment's reflection I turned back so as to pass them. One moved as I came near and turned the corner which divides the square into the street. The other remained stationary. I looked at him as I passed him, instantly recognized one of the men who had watched me before I left England.

If I had been free to follow my own instincts I should probably have begun speaking to the man, and have ended by knocking him down. But I was bound to consider consequences. If I once gave myself publicly in the wrong, I put the weapons in other hands than Sir Percival's hands. There was no choice but to oppose cunning by cunning. I turned into the next down which the second man had disappeared, and passed him waiting in a door-way. He was a stranger to me; and as I was glad to make sure of his personal appearance in case of future annoyance. Having done this I again walked toward Hyde Park. I reached the New Road. There I turned aside to the west (having the men behind me all the time), and waited at a point where I knew myself to be at some distance from a cab-stand, until a fast two-wheel cab, empty, should happen to pass me. One passed in a few minutes. I jumped in and told the man to drive rapidly toward Hyde Park. There was no second fast cab for the spies behind me. I saw them dart across to the other side of the road to follow me by running until a cab or a cab-stand came in their way. But I had the start of them, and when I stopped the driver and got out they were nowhere in sight. I crossed Hyde Park and made sure on the open ground that I was free. When I at last turned my steps homeward it was not till many hours later—not till after dark.

I found Marian waiting for me alone in the little sitting-room. She had persuaded Laura to go to rest after first promising to show me her drawing the moment I came in. The poor little dim faint sketch—so trifling in itself, so touching in its associations—was propped up carefully on the table with two books, and was placed where the faint light of the one candle we allowed ourselves might fall on it to the best advantage. I sat down to look at the drawing, and to tell Marian in whispers what had happened. The partition which divided us from the next room was so thin that we could almost hear Laura's breathing, and we might have disturbed her if we had spoken aloud.

Marian preserved her composure while I described my interview with Mr. Kyrle. But her face became troubled when I spoke next of the man who had followed me from the lawyer's office, and when I told her of the discovery of Sir Percival's return.

"Bad news, Walter," she said; "the worst news you could bring. Have you nothing more to tell me?"

"I have something to give you," I replied, handing her the note which Mr. Kyrle had confided to my care.

She looked at the address and recognized the handwriting instantly.

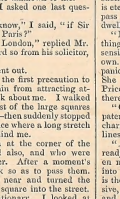
"You know your correspondent?" I said.

"Too well," she answered. "My correspondent is Count Fosco."

With that reply she opened the note. Her face flushed deeply while she read it—her eyes brightened with anger, as she handed it to me to read in my turn.

The note contained these lines:

"Impelled by honorable admiration—honorable to myself, honorable to you—I write, magnificent Marian, in the interests of your tranquillity, to say two consoling words:



"Fear nothing!

"Exercise your fine natural sense and remain in retirement. Dear and adorable woman! I invite no dangerous publicity. Resignation is sublime—adopt it. The modest repose of home is eternally fresh—enjoy it. The storms of life pass harmless over the valley of Seclusion—dwell, dear lady, in the valley.

"Do this; and I authorize you to fear nothing. No new calamity shall increase your sensibilities—sensibilities precious to me as my own. You shall not be molested; the fair companion of your retreat shall not be pursued. She has found a new asylum in your heart. Priceless asylum!—I envy her, and leave her there.

"One last word of effectionate warning, of paternal caution, and I tear myself from the charm of addressing you; I close these fervent lines.

"Advance no farther than you have gone already; compromise no serious interests; threaten nobody. Do not, I implore you, force me into action—Me, the Man of Action—when it is the cherished object of my ambition to be passive, to receive the vast reach of my energies and my combinations for your sake. If you have rash friends, moderate their deplorable ardor. If Mr. Hartright returns to England hold no communication with him. I walk on a path of my own; and Percival follows at my heels. On the day when Mr. Kartright crosses that path he is a lost man."

"HE LOOKED ME ATTENTIVELY IN THE FACE, WITH MORE APPEARANCE OF INTEREST THAN HE HAD SHOWN YET."

The only signature to these lines was the initial letter F, surrounded by a circle of intricate flourishes. I threw the letter on the table with all the contempt that I felt for it.

"He is trying to frighten you—a sure sign that he is frightened himself," I said.

She was too genuine a woman to treat the letter as I treated it. The insolent familiarity of the language was too much for her self-control. As she looked at me across the table her hands clenched themselves in her lap, and the sly quiet fire came flaming out again, brighter, in her cheeks and her eyes.

"Walter!" she said, "if ever those two men are in your power, and if you are obliged to spare one of them—don't let it be the Count."

"I will keep his letter, Marian, to help my memory when the time comes."

She looked at me attentively as I put the letter away in my pocket-book.

"What is the time comes?" she repeated. "Can you speak of the future as if you were certain of it?—certain after what you have heard in Mr. Kyrle's office, after what has happened to you to-day?"

I don't count the time from to-day, Marian. I shall have done to-day is to ask another man to act for me. I count from to-morrow—"

"Why from to-morrow?"

"Because to-morrow I mean to act for myself."

"How?"

"I shall go to Blackwater by the first train, and return, I hope, at night."

"To Blackwater!"

"Yes. I have had time to think since I left Mr. Kyrle. His opinion on one point confirms my own. The most persist to be the last to bring down the date of Laura's journey. The one weak point in the conspiracy, and probably the one chance of proving that she is a living woman, centre in the discovery of that date."

"You mean," said Marian, "the discovery that Laura was not leave Blackwater before the date of her death on the doctor's certificate?"

"Certainly."

"What makes you think it might have been after? Laura can tell us nothing of the time she was in London."

"But the owner of the Asylum told you that she was received there on the thirtieth of June. I doubt Count Fosco's ability to keep her in London, and to keep her insensible to all that was passing around her, more than one night. In that case she must have started on the twenty-ninth, and must have come to London one day after the date of her own death on the doctor's certificate. If we can prove that date we prove our case against Sir Percival and the Count."

"Yes, yes—I see! But how is the proof to be obtained?"

"Mrs. Michelson's narrative has suggested to me two ways of trying to obtain it. One of them is, to mention the doctor, Mr. Dawson—who must know when he resumed his attendance at Blackwater Park after Laura left the house. The other is, to make inquiries at the inn to which Sir Percival drove away by himself at night. We know that his departure followed Laura's, after the lapse of a few hours; and we may get at the date in that way. The attempt is at least worth making—and to-morrow I am determined it shall be made."

"Why not to-day?" I asked. "I look at the worst now, Walter; but I will look at the best if disappointment come to try us—suppose no one can help you at Blackwater?"

"There are two men who can help me in London—Sir Percival and the Count. Innocent people may well forget the date—but they are guilty, and they know it. If I fail every where else, I mean to force a confession out of one or both of them on my own terms."

All the woman flushed up in Marian's face as I spoke.

"Begin with the Count!" she whispered, eagerly. "For my sake begin with the Count."

"Why again, for Laura's sake, where there is the best chance of success," I replied.

The color faded from her face again, and she shook her head sadly.

"Yes," she said, "you are right—it was mean and miserable of me to say that. I try to be patient, Walter, and succeed better now than I did in happier times. But I have a little of my old temper left—and it will get the better of me when I think of the Count."

"His turn will come," I said. "But, remember, there is no weak place in his life that we know of yet." I waited a little to let her recover her self-possession, and then spoke the decisive words to Marian! There is a weak place we both know of in Sir Percival's life—"

"You mean the Secret?"

"Yes, the Secret. It is our only sure hold on him. I can force him from his position of security, I can drag him and his villainy into the face of day by no other means. Whatever the Count may have done, Sir Percival has committed no conspiracy against Laura from another motive besides the motive of gain. You heard him tell the Count that he believed his wife knew enough to ruin him? You heard him say that he was a lost man if the secret of Anne Catherick was known?"

"Yes! yes! I did."

"Well, Marian, when our other resources have failed us I mean to know that secret. My old superstition clings to me even yet. I say again the Woman in White is a living influence in our three lives. The End is appointed; the End is drawing us on—and Anne Catherick, dead in her grave, points the way to it still!"

WHAT-IS A SALAMANDER?

WHAT does the world expect a Salamander to be like? What did the writer anticipate when he hurried off to inspect this creature? Did he imagine that he should find an enormous furnace roaring and blazing in a cage of red-hot bars, and that, standing aloof from this, and peering into the hottest and most central portion of the flame, he would there behold an enormous Red Monster distantly resembling the griffin of heraldry lifting its spined and bat-like wings, and flapping them in burning joy over the heat? If he did not expect to see a characterize the communications of the writer, he must own that there was some such thing in his thoughts. The vile intricate are to blame for this. They have described a creature "that is bred from heat, that lives in the flames, and feeds upon fire as its proper nourishment."

Let us turn from them to the Salamander of the nineteenth century, and of the Zoological Gardens. A tank in a dark corner is substituted for the cage with the red-hot bars, while the furnace is represented by an obscured which, however satisfactory in itself, is something of a surprise when you have expected a fire—in a word, the tank is full of water!

It is full also of eels: of little eels and trumpery minnows, or small gudgeons, which are swimming about, apparently in discomfort, for they keep very near the surface, and some of them are turning up their little white stomachs in the agonies of death. This was all that you could see, except that in the darkest corner of the tank, and under a ledge, there appeared to be a sort of eft, or lizard, of enormous size, brown, blotted, and hideous; in other words, the Gigantic Salamander, the Stobdilis maxima of Japan.

"This animal," the descriptive notice goes on to say, "is the largest specimen of the true amphibians known to exist. . . . It is the most living analogue of the fossil salamander of the tertiary freshwater formation of Oeningen, described by Scheuchzer as a fossil man (Homo diluvii testis), and since called Andreas Scheuchzeri."

Against the earlier and more scientific portion of this description, your mind has nothing to say. He has no objection to make to the announcement that this noisome animal is of "the tertiary freshwater formation of Oeningen," because he has not the remotest idea what that is. To all this sort of thing he is ready to agree; but against the notion of the "fossil man," as a term under any circumstances applicable to this huge and bloated eft, he desires to take instant and indignant exception.

The fossil man of our Museum is a creature about two feet in its extreme length from the end of its most appalling snout to the extremity of its hideous tail. It is covered, in short, in an exaggerated eft; a pestiferous and appalling lizard; a soft and dwarfish crocodile. What is it not that is unclean and fearful? From top to end it is covered, and on its huge and flattened head especially, with blotchy manginess of a diseased and revolting character. And this is your notion, Andrew, of a fossil man, is it? Oh, Andrew, Andrew!

But the Salamander is the culminating point of all delusions, and of none more obviously than that which the Zoological Society seems to have entertained with regard to its species. In their hospitality toward the stranger, this body has filled his tank with little fishes, even to overflowing, yet we read in the Salamander's account of this trite which lived eight months without taking any nourishment whatever. "Indeed," the writer adds, "as many of the kind are known to live all day, during the winter, the loss of their appetite for so long a time is the less surprising."

There never was a case shot made than attributing any fiery properties to the Salamander. It appears to be one of the dumpest and—if the expression is allowable—phlegmatic animals extant. "Salamanders," says Buffon, "are fond of cold, damp places, thick shades, tufted woods, or high mountains, and the banks of streams that run through meadows. . . . It is commonly only when rain is about to fall that it comes forth from its retreat anyhow, as if by a kind of necessity to bathe itself, and to imbibe an element to which it is analogous." The modern, Buffon excepted, have followed the ridiculous tales of the ancients, and as it is difficult to stop when once the bounds of probability are passed, some have gone so far as to think that the most violent fire could be extinguished by the land Salamander. Quacks sold this small lizard, affirming that if thrown into the greatest conflagration it would check its progress." The unhappy beast, too, has been in this respect the subject of many a fiery experiment. Because when it was thrown into the fire, it was sure to burst and to eject its natural fluid in doing so, the Philosophical Transactions—into which these cruelties were first sent, by-the-by, after this specimen, have philosophical transactions than business ones—tell us that this is the natural help by the animal to extinguish the flames.

So much for the Salamander, the largest and ugliest lizard that ever was seen; and in that capacity, and as a zoological curiosity, well worth going to see.

HOT BATHS.—We would call attention to the vapour hot baths not usually found in Water Cures, such as the medicated chemical bath, the hot acid, alkali and salt bath, and the hot douches and sprays in use at the Round Hill Water Cure, in Northampton, Mass. The gentleman's bathing room connected with the establishment have been the past winter re-constructed and thoroughly refitted, and they are now capable of affording a twenty bath people each day in full security—all being a set of Oriental, Turkish, or Russian baths. They are said, in cases of rheumatism, to have restored the weight many pounds in a week. We have all read of the great vigilance of the Turks in avoiding fatal colds, and have explained by the use of the Turkish bath. We congratulate our fellow-citizens that opportunities have under such favorable circumstances as the scientific management of Dr. Halsted insures, for the benefits arising from a thorough medical use of these various baths, can scarcely be overestimated in preventing the evolution from impurities of the blood, local congestions, and the baleful effects of mineral debilitation. Dr. Halsted is the head one of solid merit, and the thorough invigoration of the system which Dr. Halsted knows so well how to induce, we cease to wonder at his success. These baths are of especial value in treating those deep-seated diseases originating in the blood, such as tumors and scrofula in the system; also, in views in the Water Cure Journal, and gout. The Water Cure is open summer and winter. It is crowded with visitors in the warm months, attracted not only by the superior advantages for bathing, health, but by its home comforts, pure mountain air, and the fame of its beautiful scenery. Dr. Halsted receives, however, are made in the cool months.—Springfield Republican.

Important Book for those who Value Health.

Now Ready:

The Avoidable Causes of Disease.

By JOHN ELLIS, M.D.,

Professor of the Principles and Practice of Medicine in the Western Medical College of Cleveland, Ohio.

12mo, 396 pages. Cloth. Price $1.

In this volume, Dr. Ellis explains in a clear, simple manner the various causes of disease, with the conditions, habits, and precautions necessary to the preservation of health. The aim has been to impart practical information, such as will be useful to every one, and to embody the best results, in regard to this important matter, which science has reached. Technicalities have, as far as possible, been avoided, and the book will be found of genuine and permanent value in every family, for adults and children. To parents especially it is commended, as affording timely instruction and counsel. It is a work for the people on topics of vital interest. Published by

FRENCH'S CONICAL WASHING MACHINE.

N.B. Price only $10

Price only Ten Dollars.

One woman, with this simple, compact, durable, portable, efficient, and economical machine, can easily and perfectly do the washing of an ordinary family before breakfast.

This is the only machine that will wash all kinds of clothes perfectly without injury. It has been tested in the laundry of French's Hotel and elsewhere, with all other washing machines making any pretension to novelty, and has, in every instance, performed its work in less than half the time required by any other, and much more thoroughly and satisfactorily.

It will wash a single handkerchief, collar, lace sleeve, six shirts, or all of these articles together, without the necessity of rubbing or boiling.

These results are produced by the constant reaction of the suds, and not by friction of rubbing surfaces. It is admirably adapted for introduction into houses with stationary tubs, as it may be inclosed and connected with the waste and water pipes, and will make an important feature in houses "with all the modern improvements."

In Families, Laundries, Hotels, Boarding-houses, Hospitals, Asylums, Boarding-schools, on Ships and Steamers, and in the Army, it will be found unequaled and indispensable.

This machine may be seen in operation at the laundry of French's Hotel, and at the office, No. 419 Broadway, corner of Canal Street.

PRICE ONLY TEN DOLLARS.

Entire satisfaction given or the money returned.

N. B.—The undersigned, Proprietors, are now prepared to organize agencies for the sale of these machines in all parts of the country, and to supply orders to any extent.

Agents wanted in all parts of the United States.

THORLEY'S FOOD FOR CATTLE.

This artificially prepared Food for animals was invented and introduced to the British people, by the Proprietor, about three years since, and it has now become established as a legitimate article of commerce, its useful character and beneficial effects being generally recognized and admitted. The sale has been constantly and rapidly increasing, not only among agriculturists and breeders of stock, but with the public in general; and there can be no doubt that, as its merits are better understood, it will become an article of universal consumption by all who have an interest in domestic animals.

For Horses it is Indispensable in Promoting and Sustaining all the Animal Functions in Health and Vigor. For Milch Cows it is Invaluable, increasing the Quantity and improving the Quality of Milk. For Beasts nothing can compare with it for Feeding quickly. For Sheep and Hogs, the effects produced in one month will exceed all expectation.

In feeding Domestic Animals, the addition of this food may be attended with a subtraction of other food, to the extent of one-third, thereby rendering its application one of economy; while, at the same time, it materially assists the digestive powers of every animal in extracting a larger amount of nourishment from the ordinary food, which would otherwise be lost, consequent upon the impaired or defective action of those organs.

Sold in cases containing 448 feeds, price $14, and half cases, containing 224 feeds, price $7.

Orders accompanied by remittance promptly executed. Agents wanted for unrepresented cities.

ECONOMY OF SEWING MACHINES.—The WHEELER & WILSON SEWING MACHINE COMPANY has prepared tables showing by actual experiment of four different workers, the time required to stitch each part of a garment by hand, and with their Sewing Machines. The superiority of the work done by the Machine, and the healthfulness of the employment, are advantages quite as great as the saving of time. Subjoined is a summary of several of the tables:

	BY MACHINE. Hours. Min.	BY HAND. Hours. Min.
Gentlemen's Shirts	1 16	14 32
Frock Coats	33	15 25
Satin Vests	1 14	7 10

Sweet's Infallible Liniment is prepared from the recipe of Dr. Stephen Sweet, of Connecticut, the great bone setter, and has been used in his practice for the last twenty years with the most astonishing success. As an external remedy it is without a rival, and will alleviate pain more speedily than any other preparation. For all Rheumatic and Nervous Disorders it is truly infallible, and as a curative for Sores, Wounds, Sprains, Bruises, &c., its soothing, healing and powerful strengthening properties excite the just wonder and astonishment of all who have ever given it a trial. Over four hundred certificates of remarkable cures, performed by it within the last two years attest this fact.

LOST IN THE FOG.

IN TWO CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

IN one of the summer months of the year 185-, application was made to a great London Insurance Company to insure the life of Mr. Andrew Macfarlane, of Raw Material Street, Manchester, for a very heavy sum. Mr. Macfarlane was not a young man, being described by himself as between forty and fifty, and the sum was of such an unusual amount that the Company thought it necessary to use more than ordinary caution; they therefore stipulated upon seeing the gentleman personally, and having him examined by two of their own medical men in their own office in London, in addition to the usual preliminary investigation. Mr. Macfarlane accordingly appeared one morning, looking a most robust and healthy middle-aged gentleman, with a fine, broad, ruddy, close-shaven face, and iron-gray hair; the examination was pronounced satisfactory in the extreme. Mr. Macfarlane was a more than usually healthy person, and the policy was granted without delay.

One morning in November, of the same year, London was shrouded in one of its densest fogs. That combination of smoke and vapor to be met with in its full perfection in no other part of the globe pervaded street and river. Fog had reigned supreme over the metropolis the whole of the previous day, and had become so thick at night that foot-passengers had great difficulty in finding their way along the streets; the crossing of a wide street or square looked like diving into some dark and unexplored expanse, all landmarks were swept away, the lamps were scarce visible one from another; experienced Londoners found themselves turning the wrong corners, and the cabs and other vehicles had no chance of reaching their destination save by adhering to the curbstone.

"GOOD GOD! IT'S POOR MACFARLANE!"

That November morning the newspapers bore witness to the dangers of the previous day in many a lengthy catalogue of accidents. As morning broke the fog seemed likely to rule another day, but as the sun gained strength he brought with him a fresh breeze, and the fog lifting, like a vast curtain, once more disclosed to the persecuted Londoners the features of their lost city.

Light was pretty well established, when a party of river-men were seen carrying the body of a drowned man up the steps of London Bridge. On coming to the top with their ghastly burden, a gentleman in a dark beard and mustaches, who had been watching their movements over the parapet, came up, and looking steadily at the dead man's face, exclaimed,

"Good God! it's poor Macfarlane!"

The men stopped; a crowd was present in an instant, as if by magic; and in scarcely less time the tall and unperturbed hat of a policeman was to be observed, calm and stationary above the swaying multitude.

"Do you identify this body, Sir?"

"I do."

"Your name and address, if you please, Sir?"

"I will go with you to the station, if you please."

"The body will go to the dead-house, Sir; perhaps you would have no objection to go there with me, first, and witness my removal of the valuables on the person of the deceased."

The gentleman accordingly accompanied the party, saw the contents of the pocket removed, and the body examined casually. There were no marks of violence upon it, and there was little doubt that it represented one of the victims of the fog, an opinion pretty freely expressed by the by-standers.

The pockets produced little or nothing leading to identification; a watch, with a chain attached to it, a locket containing hair, and ornamented with a blue cross, a purse with money all in sovereigns, a pocket-handkerchief marked in cipher, and a bunch of keys told little.

The next proceeding was to the station-house; the sergeant on duty heard the facts, took possession of the property, put certain questions, and down the gentleman's name and address—"Mr. Woodley, of Liverpool, now at the Covent Garden Hotel"—and informed him that he would be required at the inquest.

"I shall consider it my duty to attend; but, in the mean time, I must communicate this intelligence to my poor friend's wife; they came to town only the day before yesterday."

"Her attendance will be necessary, Sir."

"Very well; but first I must see how she bears this cruel shock."

At the quest, after the evidence of the finding of the body, Mr. Woodley stepped forward and deposed that he was well acquainted with the deceased, Mr. Macfarlane, of Manchester, that he and his wife had come to London on a visit only a few days previously; that he had seen the deceased—was so dreadfully affected by the shock her nervous system had sustained by this sad event that she was dangerously ill, and totally incapable of giving evidence, of which fact he handed in a doctor's certificate; he held in his hand, he said, the marriage-certificate of the deceased, which he would produce if the jury desired to see it; that he had managed to procure from the distressed lady a list of the articles on Macfarlane's person when he left home yesterday on business, since which time he had not been heard of until witness brought the sad intelligence of his untimely fate.

The divisional surgeon deposed that there were no marks of violence upon the body.

The coroner, in summing up, merely observed to the jury that it was evident this unfortunate person had been precipitated in the Thames; he saw no reason to suppose that he had met his death by any foul play, nor was the supposition of suicide warranted; the unfortunate man had, it appeared, gone out yesterday in the full enjoyment of his usual health, strength, and intellect; they were all aware that of the sad condition of the river Thames by lady, and there appeared to him no necessity for adjourning the inquest for her presence, nothing therefore remained for them but to give a verdict according to the facts.

"Found drowned" was accordingly recorded.

The coroner observed that the body ought to be buried immediately, and ordered it to be given up to Woodley. He then made out a formal order for the registrar the necessary information as to the cause of death and the finding of the jury.

In due time the insurance company received application, on the part of Helen Macfarlane, for payment of the sum insured; a regular assignment of the policy from her late husband was produced, and her claim was further supported by a copy of the entry of the register-general. The company felt some little hesitation at first, and postponement for further information. They desired to see Woodley, but on its being shown that that gentleman had quitted England, after the first examination they felt that they could not dispute the evidence, and paid the money.

CHAPTER II.

IN that wilderness which lies west of Brompton, at the time we speak of there existed a Lilliputian cottage, wherein dwelt George Richardson, clerk, managing and confidential clerk, now junior partner in a merchant's house in the city. One evening in November, 185-, home came George by the bus, and startled his little wife by announcing that he must start on a secret mission to Leghorn the next day, events of importance occurring at which the business had occurred there requiring the presence of one of the partners, and the lot had fallen on him as the junior in respect of age as well as of position in the firm. A steamer was to leave the river the next evening.

"Therefore," said George, "get my things ready, and I will take them with me to the office to-morrow morning, for I shall not have time to return here."

"Shall I not see you again after you leave home to-morrow morning?" asked Bessie Richardson, anxiously.

"No, darling! you must wish me good-by then."

Bessie's face put on a disappointed look.

"Why, you silly girl, the parting must come sooner or later, and why not in the morning as well as the evening?" said he, smoothing her hair caressingly.

Bessie did not see the force of this reasoning. To a woman a good-by is no good-by at all unless it occurs at the very last moment.

However, it could not be helped, it seemed; so the little woman bustled about and got his things to rights, and stood in the little dining-room with the tears welling up into her eyes. The next morning, when the cab drove up to the door, there was a thick fog, and Bessie felt alarmed, as women do at a parting, with a vague, undefined dread of some calamity.

"How soon shall I hear from you, George?"

"In a month, I hope; but it may be six weeks, or even more, so don't be uneasy. I will write, you may be sure, the first opportunity, and I may be back myself before my letter."

"I wish you were not going in this fog."

"Foolish girl!" kissing her. "The steamer won't start in a fog; don't alarm yourself about that. Besides, it's only the morning frost; when the sun gets up it will be bright and clear."

But when, as the day advanced, the fog, instead of clearing, increased in density, and she perceived, that her journey to the City was impracticable, then the reality of the parting first came full upon her. It was their first separation, and the suddenness of the thing, and the sense of the utter uncertainty of the post, and finally the breaking up of her little plan for a final and overwhelming goodby overcame her, and she broke into her room, and was no more seen for several hours.

By afternoon the fog was so thick in the City and on the river that the departure from which the steamer would not start. "However," thought he, "I will have my matters taken down, set the captain, and sleep on board, if necessary, so to ready directly he is able to get under way."

George found it difficult to find his way through the narrow lanes to the river; by-and-by he found the wharf gates, but all beyond was a blank, save where some wherry, with its dingy sail, struggled high and distant, told him of lamps enveloped in the misty cloud. Confident, however, in his knowledge of the place, he felt his way cautiously by the bearings, on he went, till, in a moment, his foot trod only on the empty air, and he fell headlong—a splash—and the dark waters closed over him.—A struggle to the surface—a desperate attempt to strike out in his thick great-coat and water-logged boots, and George Richardson was carried away by the remorseless tide only to be yielded up a corpse.

A month passed away. Bessie was daily expecting the promised letter. The first mail-packets passed the door, or only knocked to bring any others but the looked-for envelope. George would surely be at home himself, and allay her anxiety by his presence in a day or two. Did he not say he might return sooner than he could reach her?

Six weeks, and no letter. Bessie became really anxious; away she went to the senior partner: he was somewhat surprised, but had a line or two adding to her anxiety, he assured her there was yet no cause for alarm. They had expected to hear before this; the steamer, however, had it was quite possible his voyage might have been longer than they calculated. His letter might have miscarried, or he might have been detained by delay: in short, the good old man almost reassured the poor little wife, and she went home more tranquil in her mind than she had been for many days.

Two months had now elapsed, and it could no longer be concealed that there was grave cause for apprehension: Bessie was in a state of fresh excitement on every trifling occasion—to wit, when George travelled by railway—pictured to her mind the most awful accidents, or if he was out of her sight for dinner, felt a calm certainty that something had happened, or if he was late at any hour that nothing could be wrong, in proportion as real causes for alarm increased, inasmuch that as they became absent certainties in her mind what imagination had, so did they diminish to this unreasoning little woman. In fact, she dared not admit the idea into her mind; she resolutely struggled to fantastically clinging to that lightest bubble of hope in her sea of doubt, and resolved that darling George would be restored to her arms some day, and it would not be in Nature or in Providence that one she loved so well should never look upon her face again. So her heart reasoned.

At length, however, arrived the steamer itself without Richardson. It was then ascertained that no one answering his description had sailed in her. His trunk, purposely left undirected in order to maintain the secrecy of his journey, was found on board. The merchants to whom he was now fully convinced that some fatal accident had happened to him. They wrote to his brother, and begged him to break the matter to his sister-in-law, and on their part to leave no stone unturned to clear up the mystery that hung upon her husband's disappearance.

We purposely pass over the horror, the incredulity, and the struggles of hope and despair incident to poor Bessie's mind when the facts broke with full force upon her. The feelings of the bereaved wife must be sacred.

Meanwhile the partners set every engine at work to discover the truth. Detective officers came to and fro, examined and cross-examined with unsuccessful activity, following up the scent like hounds. The facts by degrees unfolded themselves, and it became evident that Richardson must have been drowned that night of the fog on his way to the ship.

But what became of the body? More restlessness of detectives, and further circumstances were elicited of the habits of the deceased. A drowned man had certainly been found the very morning after his disappearance. The body was traced to the inquest, the records of the proceedings looked up, and all doubt removed that the remains there represented as those of Macfarlane were in reality none other than those of poor Richardson. There was no possibility of direct identification at this distance of time, but a record of the articles found on the body (which had been taken off by the coroner) had been preserved at the police-office, and were identified by the wretched wife as the contents of her husband's pockets on the fatal day. But who and where was Woodley? What interest could he have in falsely swearing to the body? Was it a conspiracy or a mistake? More tracing of evidence; and now was found a memorandum in the registry that the insurance company had asked for information concerning the deceased, and received a copy of the entry. This was a fresh clew: a light broke in upon the mystery which had hitherto surrounded the inquiry. The insurance company was communicated with, and, after having investigated the facts, came to the irresistible conclusion that their client Macfarlane had undoubtedly given evidence of his own decease, and was, in the society of Mrs. Mac—who had completely recovered from her indisposition—carving a good slice of the company's capital in some foreign country.

THE SWANS IN THE CENTRAL PARK.

ON May 26th arrived in this city, by the steamer Bavaria, twelve beautiful swans, presented by the city of Hamburg to the city of New York, for the adornment of the water in the Central Park. A more appropriate gift could not have been thought of than a flock of these beautiful birds, the noblest and most dignified of all the water birds, and the most admired of all living adornments for artificial water. On another page will be found a letter from one of the gentlemen who arrived strangers from a sketch by Carpendale, an artist of superior merit in animal drawing.

By an unfortunate accident one of the twelve swans died on the afternoon of Tuesday the 5th. It is supposed that they had swallowed some poison which had been scattered about the rocks in the lake to kill the rats which infest the place. The matter is now undergoing investigation.

The swans have attracted so much attention that it is to be hoped the remaining ones will survive. In the event, the interest their arrival has created is such that the public will consider our Park lake incomplete without these graceful tenants.

The swan is described by naturalists as "a large handsome water-fowl of the order Anseres, family Anatidæ, and sub-family Anserinæ, and is distinguished by the great length of its neck, its graceful movement on the water, and its close, thick, soft plumage, of nearly all the species of which snowy whiteness of the plumage, except when young." Australia has, however, furnished us with a species of black swan.

In England the swan has long been a royal bird; and in former times no one was allowed to keep a "game of swans" who possessed a freehold of the clear yearly value of five marks." When the pin privilege was granted the holder obtained also a "swan mark," which is a private mark cut upon the bills of the young birds to designate their ownership. In the Thames and its swans in those days, before factories blackened its waters, and made it death to fish and fowl. "What a great river is it," says Elsewell, an old author, "for the Lord Mayor to have the conservancy of the noble River Thames! How stately he is attended when he goes to take a view of the river, or a swan-hopping!"

It is as well to know that we must not say a "flock" of swans, but a "herd." The male is called a "Cob," and the female a "Pen." The swan's nest is a great mass of rushes, reeds, flags, etc., pitched on the edge of the water's edge. The "Pen" lays six or seven eggs before she sits. In six weeks the young birds are hatched out; and during this time the cob is assiduously attendant his mate, and, dignified as he is, sometimes condescends even to take the mother's place in the nest. The food of swans consists of aquatic plants and roots, water-insects, and occasionally small fishes.

The Rev. Mr. Morris relates an incident showing that the swan has a remarkable something of that mysterious foreknowledge of the seasons which hunters and naturalists ascribe to squirrels, wolves, and, in fact, most wild animals. A female swan was observed by her owner to be very busy collecting weeds, grass, etc., to raise her nest to an unusual height, and a labored task it was to her neighborhood with half a load of such stuff, with which she mount indignantly, and hauled her nest at least 2½ feet above its usual level. That very night there fell such a tremendous fall of rain which flooded all the neighborhood and did great harm. Men had made no preparation; but the bird had. God had given her an instinctive foresight. Her eggs were safe and dry—but only just above the water.

Queen Victoria has a fine swannery at Windsor Castle, and is said to take great delight in the noble birds. It is to be hoped that luck will attend the five survivors of our city's recently acquired "game," and that they will multiply and increase abundantly.

POLITICAL GAG.

THE Democratic nomination will be made at Baltimore on the 18th instant, and the Presidential campaign of 1860 will then be fairly opened. Two of the parties were already engaged in the contest, and the third will not be far behind. It is our province to survey the field with an impartial eye, and we venture to offer a bit of advice to the combatants which, in the heat of the battle, they will probably entirely forget, but which is nevertheless well worthy attention.

When the young lawyer began his argument with the creation of the world, the Judge interrupted him to say, "Sir, the Court may be presumed to know something." Bear in mind, therefore, gentlemen, that the people—the tribunal to which you all appeal—may be supposed to know something of their own affairs. The great questions are grave and momentous, doubtless, but they are so mainly because the people understand them as well as the orators. They will not believe, for instance, that any slight shock will shiver the Union, because they know that it is always better to bear the ills we have than to fly to those we know nothing about. It is only when ills are perceived to be beyond redress that there is any hope of the success of an appeal to violence. And so long as the dominant race in any country are generally prosperous—so long as their own interests and rights are not felt by them to be invaded—so long they will maintain the status quo. The success of the enthusiastic success (of Garibaldi in Sicily is the conviction of the great mass of the people that he comes to deliver them from an intolerable condition. On the other hand, the cause of the judicious Grady and the Cotton effort in England is the equally strong conviction of the mass of Englishmen that their troubles are remediable by some process less doubtful in its operation than open revolution.

There never was a people who better understood what may be called "political gag" than the American. They go to great mass meetings during the pleasant summer months of a campaign, as they go to theatres and other places of amusement during the winter, to be entertained. The man who can tell the funniest stories in the funniest way is the favorite orator. Banners, torches, music, rallying cries, symbols of every kind increase the good-humored excitement. But the thinking, which really determines the voting, is not done in a mass meeting. It is done by which persuades is not a volley of rich jokes or fine rhetoric. The President is really elected not during the technical campaign, but during the administration of his predecessor. If that administration seem to the people favorable to their interests, his policy is confirmed by the election of a successor who will pursue the same course. If the majority disapprove of that policy, it is changed by their will, despite the best jokes and the most extravagant rhetoric.

Let the orators but remember that; let them bear in mind that the people understand their own interests, and they may spare their throats, their domestic circles, and their wit. And confine themselves to a reasonable statement of their case on whatever side it may be. Then they may plead sincerely to themselves that they have really helped the cause in which they believe, by appealing not to the passions or prejudices but to the common sense of the people.

THE METHODIST CONFERENCE.

THE General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, North, held at Buffalo, closed its five weeks' session on the 4th. The daily newspapers contain full reports of the proceedings of this body. We regret that we can not regard them as profitable reading. Party spirit ran so high, the canvass for offices was so eager, and the managing and leading men as dexterous as in any political convention. Nor were the proceedings throughout characterized by the decorous befitting of a religious synod convocation. In one case, at least, the Bishop was obliged to administer a sharp rebuke to the members for their disorderly conduct. Two subjects of prominent interest came before the Conference—the "Slavery" question and that of "Lay Representation." An attempt was made to abolitionize the Church, by striking the "General Rule" so as to make it prohibit the "holding" as well as the "buying and selling of men, women, or children, with an intention to enslave them." This effort, after failing to receive the votes of two-thirds of the delegates, was lost. The "Progressive party" then directed their efforts to an alteration of the "Chapter on Slavery," which is not held, in Methodist economy, to define the terms of communion. This chapter is therefore regarded as fixing the holding of slaves by individuals in the members of the Church, and requires slaveholding members to grant certain privileges to their slaves. In place of this was substituted the following answer to the question, "What shall be done for the extirpation of slavery?"

"We declare that we are as much as ever convinced of the great evil of slavery. We believe that buying, selling, or holding of human beings, to be used as chattels, is inconsistent with the Golden Rule, and with that Rule in our Discipline which requires all who desire to continue in the Church to 'do no harm, and to avoid evil of every kind.' We therefore affectionately admonish all our preachers and people to keep themselves pure from this great sin, and to use every endeavor by all lawful and Christian means."

This "answer" was practically modified by a resolution declaring that it is merely "advisory," and not statutory; so that there has been as yet no binding rule adopted prohibiting members of the Church from holding slaves.

The subject of "Lay Delegation" was in effect put off till the next Conference, by the adoption of a resolution requiring preachers in charge to submit it, in the first place, to the vote of the male members of the Church over twenty-one years of age; when, with this vote before them, the bishops are to submit the questions to the Annual Conferences of 1862; and these Conferences will inform the Conference of 1864 of the of the clergy, approve of it, then the General Conference of 1864 will consider whether the lay members of the Church shall be represented in its highest judicial body; or whether it shall be, as heretofore, a close corporation, electing its own members, and not amenable to the great body of the Church.

THE LOUNGER.

GARIBALDI.

SINCE the last issue of the Weekly we hear of Garibaldi's arrival in Palermo; and the fall of Messina will hardly be long delayed. This famous Italian chieftain is the most romantic and conspicuous actors of the time. Every thing he does is universally known. The bitterest misfortunes and disappointments of his life are not concealed. He stakes upon the stage of affairs in the full view of the world, and shares, with Victor Emanuel, the enthusiasm of admiration which is lavished upon the Deliverers of Italy. While any part of his country is oppressed, however, the duty of the patriot is not done; and the hunter of the Alps is helping the Sicilians strike for the liberty of which the island has so long been ruthlessly despoiled.

When despots die it is a pity that their race does not die with them. For the taint of despotism in the blood is like insanity, and you can never know where it will betray itself. Old Bomba died a mass of corruption, and the fact of youth pleaded for his succession. But the son is a Bourbon, and the child of his father: and already his reign is as black as his parent's. To resist tyrants is to serve God; and every one nation in this century is bound to endure the crimes of the Naples kings. Whoever has read Gladstone's statement of ten years ago—whoever by personal experience knows any thing, however slight, of the hopeless desolation of despotism which blights Southern Italy—of the tortures and despair of men each one of whom was worth the whole race of Bourbons, will pray that the blow which Garibaldi directs may be there and deadly, and that the Bourbon boy of Naples may reach even a more sudden end of his power than is exerted by his Austrian cousin.

What can the people do? Are not the Neapolitans the most worthless of all nations? Will Garibaldi, and silver them to an anarchy worse than the Bourbon despotism?

These are the questions which will be naturally asked by people who "sit at home at ease."

Well, then, if the people are so wretched, so spiritless, so degraded, what, more than any thing else, has made it so? The Bourbons. What has ruined that loveliest of lands? The Bourbons. What has made Naples a synonym of tyranny? The Bourbons. What is worse than any conscievable anarchy? The Bourbons. For anarchy is a fermentation, and distinctive nature should more than that its present condition should continue. And if anarchy offer equal chances for another despotism—which can not, in the nature of things, be so bad—it also gives the chance of a radical reformation of the government.

Garibaldi is indeed no other renown than that he destroyed the Bourbons. It is even a grander title than that of Liberator of Italy; for it is a liberation of Europe and the world. The history of that House, could it be told in all its dreadful detail, would be probably the blackest story of any family in history—such that they were all personally wicked men, but the system of which they were sometimes the active, sometimes the passive supporters, is the most corroding possible.

Of course the King of Sardinia can not officially commend the invasion, or one of his subjects, of the state of another king. But of course his best applauds, beating with that of the world. And of course his judgment approves, in common with that of Christendom. If our revolutionary war were righteous—which was a protest against a form of government—how religious is this rising of Sicily against the very consuming substance of oppression! And will Tittlebat Titmouse say, as he did in '48, that Europeans are not ready for a change of government? Well, Tittlebat, how soon will the Bourbon make them so? If you take the disease of a nation as argument against resistance to the cause of the disease, your argument is as conclusive as it is absurd. So the old story by the dram's breath used to poison the neighborhood—and therefore the neighborhood ought not to try to slay the dragon. Or, to put it in another way—a man has been crushed to the ground until his legs are withered and he can not walk; therefore he must not try to lift the mass that weighs him down. That is Bourbon logic, Tittlebat, not the common sense of human hearts.

THE "FAIR PLAY" JEWEL.

This celebrated gem has been lately lost in England, and all the light of the Koh-i-noor, another famous diamond, has not been able to reveal it. But the loss is periodical in quarters where its presence is most loudly and incessantly vaunted. The one great argument which is particularly urged for the whole sporting system is, that, at any rate, it promotes fair play. But the truth is, that there is just as little fair play in every department of the sporting world as there is of "honor" among the people who make the loudest claims to it, and who do not hesitate to get drunk, to swindle, to lie, and to defame men and women, yet who flame with a white heat of fury at what they call the [illegible] such a person is no gentleman. [illegible]orting world" ought, in [illegible]rich. It is [illegible] races, gaming-[illegible] if he does [illegible] papers and people are directly encouraging such resorts, under cover of favoring manly development, it is worth while to remind the ingenuous youth that the way to an honorable manliness can no more be shown by the prize-fighter, though he could throw an ox, than it can be by a lobby, a swindler, or a drunkard. All these things and personages are closely related. The old paternal objection to billiards, which to many a reader of these lines will recall in the case of his own father, was not that billiards was a demoralizing amusement, but that, in those days, billiards was the low company and consequent dangerous temptations went with billiards.

How much has the Derby day helped English honor? It is great fun; it is great excitement. As Lord Palmerston is said to have said, and might have said truly, it is the day on which all sorts of England that Parliament shall adjourn over Derby day. But because it is so rooted in the habits of a certain portion of English society, why try to squeeze any moral out of it? People want excitement, and they get it at the race. But there is a demoralized mass of desperate gambling there than there is any where in St. James's Street. The field of the race is a hundred times more so; and than ever Crockford's was. It is a great national holiday, if you choose; and if you and I were in London deserted by all our friends I would pay money a day to go down and see the fun. But I do hope we should have too much sense to expect to find fair play there. We might safely believe the little joker to be under the thimble, where we saw it just now.

As Americans, of course, we go down to bet upon Umpire. We confidently believe him to be the equine Heenan. There are a million of pounds bet—there will be a hundred times more—and people present—there is "no end," as Young England says, of pretty, rosy girls, in white muslin and blue ribbons—we have heard that Lady Palmerston, of Derby, of Rothschild; above all, of Ten Brooeck—all hi! there is hurry, a cloud, a shout, and the Derincin of horses is nowhere. Something is said about steeds; but we honestly "pass." Ha! ha! and, just as Tittlebat, and Brown, and Smith, and Jones, and Robinson are about to reduce our hamper to the same condition, if we happen to have more sympathy than we have gold, Mr. Jesse Ten Brooek! we mutter, in tones of sympathy muffled with sandwich. Why? "poor Ten Brooek?" He has won sixty thousand pounds and another eleven. He came here to make money, not to flatten the American eagle, and he has won it. You and I went in for the patriotic sentiment. We must keep them—we have them still—but Mr. Ten Brooek has his golden guineas. It is all right, apparently. Who blames him? Why if much money is bet upon a horse, he is sure to win; if against him, to lose. It is curious. Did you happen to find that celebrated jewel, Fair Play, at Epsom?

OUT OF TOWN

THE lovely June days admonish the denizen of streets that there are such things as green lanes, and trees, and rural ramble. Summer has fully come; and though we have wished to spend ever meadows and woods and thickets the steps of splendor by which it advances. The change, so long awaited, and so suddenly effected, from winter and early spring—its first cousin of the tender sex—to the heavy luxuriance of summer, is one of the most inspiring and delightful in the year; and which the citizen necessarily loses. For it must be watched day by day. The swelling of buds, the first vivid green of the leaves, the first flowers, the first flowering shrubs—the gradual greening of the grass—the early notes of birds—the soft south wind—the humming of bees—the rising of all the delicate details of renewing life, different every morning and evening—these are the things to observe, if you would know the full charm of June.

Next to these is the ripefulness of the season, as you may see it now. The wheat fields are waving in March, the ringing shrillness of the canary in the sun, have told you what was happening beyond the world of brick and stone; but to imagine or think of the summer tour. Where shall we go, Mary? What shall I do with my fortnight?

Why, enough to employ one's mind where it is so attractive. Yet one thing might be wisely remembered from year to year; and that is, to avoid railway crowds and dust. The intolerable heat, dust, and discomfort should take the place of the inviting heading. Unparalleled speed, safety, and luxury—these are the characteristics of the great roads. Go by water, wherever you can. Go on horseback—in your own conveyance, if you have it. Go by foot, if you will, only go at all if you are tolerably comfortable at home, except for a day here and there, and every year you choose, you will be frightened by the talk about watering-places. There is a great deal of cant in much talk. The precious health of the sick, the delight of every kind, who can not fail to amuse a shrewd observer—with music, flowers, fine equipages, and the well-dressed flutter of a gay crowd, are all pleasures life—where you can have your books, if you want, and amusements of every kind, and a varied wardrobe—hair dye and its accessories are much superior to a hot room in a lonely farm-house, where you have no comfort, no society, no amusement. You don't want to stay there many times a day? Very well; then don't do it, and you will find that you are doing like almost all your countrymen. Nothing easier. Nothing more charming-place, as they are every where else. But the clothes you wear at home are quite good enough to wear at Saratoga or Newport.

If solitude be your object—or brook-fishing or shooting, or life in the woods—turn your back upon people, and may fortune favor you! But remember, while you are hugging yourself in the woods for your such a sensible fellow as to prefer a tent to a hotel, Tom in the hotel is laughing at you for not being with him. "It isn't the fashion to wear tails now," quoth the Fox; "all sensible fellows now shun elbows." "Not at all," rejoinded Reynard; "all sensible fellows cut tails and please themselves."

A WORD WITH "MINDERUS."

"I HAVE seen some very absurd questions answered in your columns. Is not my query as deserving as the least of those?"

Undoubtedly: but they were asked first. If you will refer to the paper, any body gets answered, and yet how many questions are asked of the Lounger, you would not suffer yourself to be annoyed. Every inquiry that has been sent to him he has answered, and the reply has been or will be printed. He has incessantly informed his correspondents that nothing could be more uncertain than the time when they would get a reply, and if they are hurried they should ask elsewhere, although the Lounger is directly willing and glad to gratify them as soon as possible. Nobody can have any kind of claim upon the notice of any paper except to the instant correction of some personal misrepresentation. "Minderus" may depend upon it that this paper is managed in the way which is supposed to be most conducive to its prosperity and objects; and while his impatience is natural, the Lounger says so much to remind him of another view of the case.

THE TWO VILLAGES.

A FRIEND sends the following beautiful poem and asks the name of the author:

Over the river on the hill
Lieth a village white and still:
All around the fruitful valleys
Shiver and whisper in the breeze;
Over it sailing shadows pass
Of soaring hawk and screaming crow,
And mountain grasses, low and sweet,
Grow in the shade of every street.

Over the river under the hill
Another village lieth still:
There I see in the dusky night
Twinkling stars of household light,
Fires that gleam and fade on smithy's door;
Mists that curl on the river shore:
And in the roads no grasses grow
For the wheels that hasten to and fro.

In that village on the hill
Never is sound of smithy or mill:
The hammer and anvil and wbig grass and flowers,
Never a clock to tell the hours;
The marble dawn and the lovely night
You can not enter in hall or hut:
All the villagers lie asleep:
Never a grain for the reaper's reap
Never in dreams to moan or sigh—
Silent, and still, and dumb are they!

In that village under the hill,
When the night is starry and still,
Many a watcher is at prayer
Looks to the other village there,
And weeping and sighing, longs to go
Up to that home of peace below.
Longs to sleep in the forest still,
Whither the weary rest and child,
And beneath, praying, this answer fall,
"Patience! that village shall hold ye all!"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WORDY OF OUR NOSE.—An elderly maiden lady, who aloud to worship the strange signs which denote the Coming of an invention of the Evil One, and quotes, in proof—Punch ob cetera—Isaiah xxxiii. 23.

"YOU DON'T, DON'T YOU?"—"Mister, I say, I don't suppose you don't know of nobody what don't want to work nobody to do nothing, don't you? The answer was, "Yes, I don't."

A physician, who lived in London, visited a lady who resided in Chelsea. After continuing his visits for some time the lady expressed an apprehension that it might be inconvenient for him to come so far on her account. "Oh! by no means!" replied the doctor; "I have another patient in Chelsea, and I always set out hoping to kill two birds with one stone."

An Irish student was once asked what was meant by continuous work. "Why, it means work works," says Paddy, "as a man writes after he is dead."

When Jemima went to school she was asked why the noun and the verb were called "beings." she replied, "it is so very singular that they don't get married."

We always admire the answer of the man, who, when asked how old he was, replied, "Just forty years; but if you count by the fun I've seen, I am at least eighty."

You can easily keep yourself throughout the winter from freezing by getting somebody to let your wine to your neighbors.

AN APPROPRIATE BUILDING.—In the advertisement of a lecture, it is said, "It embraces about sixty rooms."

A lady's home-dress ought to last a long while: she never wears it out.

The orator who deals largely in quotations speaks volumes.

There is a lady in New York so ignorant of all domestic work that she can not even knit her brows.

Boys should be very careful how they steer their likeness, if they would arrive without shipwreck at the Isle of Man.

"I believe, miss, that you think I am as old as Old Time in the Primer?"—Yes, Sir, older: you haven't even a forelock."

If you undertake to flatter don't overdo the thing. If you offer too much incense to a sensible man he will be incensed.

Somebody says that the best way to keep food upon a desolate island, is to build it there.

On a frosty day, what two fish ought we to tie together? —Skates and soles.

Justice is certainly an odd fish: she has only a single pair of scales.

It is exceedingly bad husbandry to harrow up the feelings of your wife.

The poor birds are not a very bold race, and yet a great many of them fly about.

THE SCHOOL OF ADVERSITY.—A ragged school.

THE LITTLE FRENCH IMPERIAL.—The prestige of military honor exercises its sway even over childhood. They say that the little Prince Imperial, having fallen down while running about the garden of the Tuileries, began to cry. "What, *monsieur*pere, are you crying?" said his tutor. "Yes; but don't tell my regiment," replied the baby-colonel.

LANDLADY affectionately. "Mr. Smith, do you not perceive that the first steamboat created much surprise among the fish when it was first launched?" Mr. Smith (sleepily). "I can't say, madam, whether it did or not."

"OH, DEAR!" thought from the way you eyed the fish before you left the room you might spend a fortune on their cookery."

Sarms (the vaticinus villain). "Very likely, marm—but there's my opinion, marm, that this fish left its native element before steamers were invented."

A youthful member of a rifle corps in a Scottish town, on duty at the door of the evening's ball, joyfully told his governor that he had just got his sister a partner for the night. "Indeed!" replied the governor, "and what's he?" "Why, he's a thinkin' gin the French come yo'll hae mair need o' your legs."

A clerk having put some candles in a cellar one day the storekeeper told him that he thought he was taking a place for them, and that they would be in his wanting. "Likely enough," replied the clerk; "for that is the case, we had better put our father there also, and begin it with master in his candle."

A few nights since a young couple were married in Rochester. The bride was a very beautiful girl, and had a husband worthy of so beautiful a sister, who was also unmarried. After the two had been made one, the reverend uniter of hearts and hands, kneeling down and praying fervently, entreated the richest blessings and mercies of Providence on the bride and groom, as well as upon the "surviving sister."

A doting mother of a waggish boy having bottled a lot of cherry brandy, asked him, "Put up by Mrs. Doo." Johnny having discovered the cream on the contents of the cherry bottle, and cream on the bottom of the label, "Put down by Johnny Doo."

A young lady, playing at cards, put down the ace of hearts, observing, "Now, why may I not play hearts?" the gentleman with whom she was playing, trumped it, rejoining, "You see it is my time for a game of other."

Why are the rifle volunteers like Nolans?—Because the last thing he did was to die for his country, and that is the last thing they intend to do.

A hungry man dose right well to eat the egg, for he might starve before it got to be a pullet.

"William, I am described with Miss Million"—"With her personal charms?"—"Yes, purse and all charms."

A Scotchman visiting a church-yard with a friend, pointing to a tombstone, quiet read, said, "This is the spot where I intend being laid, if I'm spared."

The following is said to be one of the longest pauses on record:

An old gentleman, riding over Putney Bridge, turned round to his servant and said,

"Do you like eggs, John?"

"Yes, Sir."

Here the conversation ended. The same gentleman, riding over the same bridge the day beforehand, again turned round, and said,

"How?"

"Poached, Sir," was the answer.

A well-known city officer in Auld Reekie was celebrated for his caustic remarks and wit. He married his maid in Edinburgh, he hired a hearse and carried her to the family burying place in the Highlands. On returning, it is said, with the hearse full of smuggled whisky, and being stopped at the barrier by a fiscal, he said, "Yes, man, there's one hame done. I only took awa the body and brought hame the speerits."

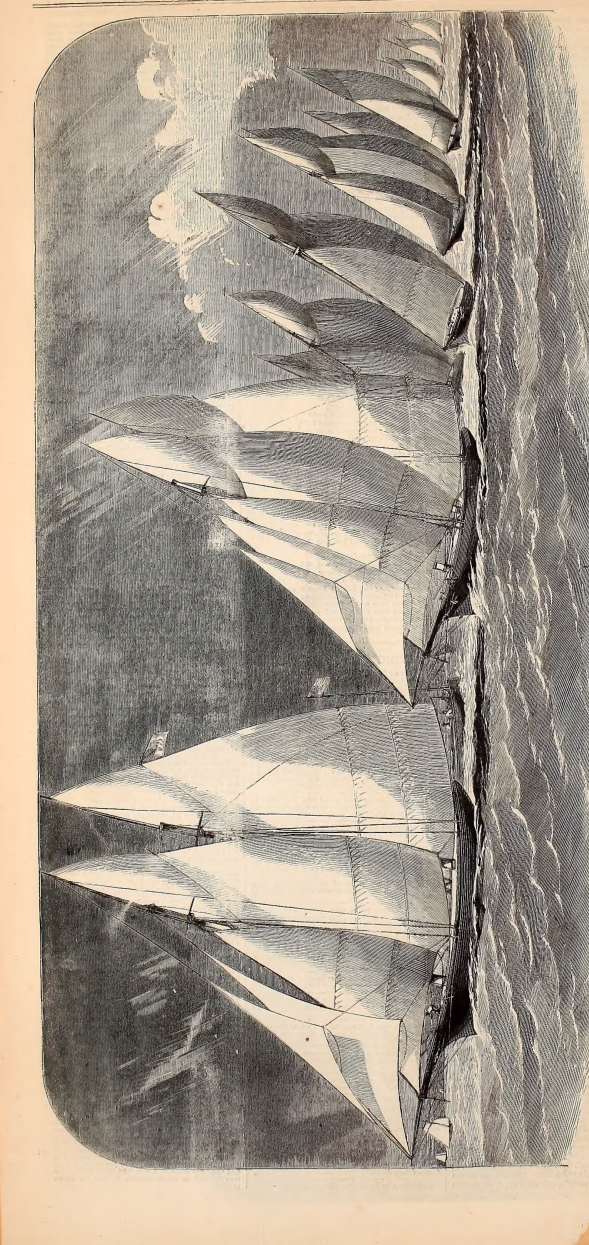
Clerks have lately been playing fast and loose to such an enormous extent with their employers' money that it is extremely difficult to know who can be trusted. We shall hear of the clerk of the weather having embezzled something next. And, indeed, he has taken, probably, for having been in the habit of skimming the milky way, and appropriating the cream to his own use; for how else can he will be convicted of transferring some of the Lyrical tears from the Muses' fountain, and attributing all to any fine person, in order to be "a blaze of a swell," or Literary Star of Masculine Type? We were Saturn, we certainly should count our rings every night, to see that none of them were missing.

Why is the first chicken of a brood like the formant of a ship?—Because it's a little for'ard of the main-hatch.

A story goes that a party of riflemen, having gone somewhat tired of a chapel not a hundred miles from Liverpool, clad in their new uniforms, the officiating minister, who wore the full wig of a wag, took occasion to quote a verse from one of the hymns:

"How proud we are, how fond to show
Our clothes, and call them Lord, not we,
When the poor sheep and silk-worm wore
What we have robbed them for!"

"Fine complexion Mrs. H. has got," said Brown to his friend Stebbins, the artist.



"I know it," replied Stebbins, "she and I buy our colors at the same shop."

A fellow stole Lord Chatham's gouty shoes; his servant, not finding them, began to search for them. "Never mind," said his lordship, "all the harm I wish the rogue is, that the shoes may fit him."

A CLERGYMAN TAKEN IN.—A rather amusing scene occurred to a reverend gentleman who is a popular preacher. He had been to have his portrait taken at a photographer's, and put on his surplice in an ante-room. While seated in the operating-room, however, he was not a little disconcerted on seeing a Circassian beauty to fall enamored of him. The reverend gentleman commenced expressing the pleadings of a broken-hearted girl on being dragged from him, and was consequently in a happy human frailty. The rev. gentleman, as soon as he had recovered from the surprise, took a seat in the bridal carriage proceeding, and ventured to suggest that the veil fell too much across the face. "Will you please show me what you mean?" The rev. gentleman was kind enough to do so. The dash of electricity was already employed: for, to his horror it may be related, if he rose this moment, the popular preacher had been taken in dramatic attitude, with a Circassian slave appearing to him to release her from her thraldom. The rev. gentleman studie jobe, and will, doubtless, never go further.

An old woman received a letter from the post-office. Not knowing how to read, and being anxious to know the contents, supposing it to be from one of her absent sons, she called on a person who lived in the neighbor to her. He accordingly bogrd, and read—"Charleston, June 23, 1860. Dear mother," Then making a full stop to find out what followed on the writing was rather bad, the old lady exclaimed, "Oh! 'tis my poor boy, he's drowned, to-rend."

Some persons in conversation are forever telling you that "you know." At a party, one evening, a question arose between certain individuals as to whether a somewhat dashy person present had said "Yes" or "No" to an interrogatory. One of the particular friends, who was appealed to, said: "He knows, you know, that he don't know, you know, that you know, that he said 'No,' you know." A man who don't know better than he knows" to much, deserves to have his knows breaked.

THE REGATTA OF THE NEW YORK YACHT CLUB.

THE Annual Regatta of the New York Yacht Club took place on the regularly-appointed day, Thursday, June 7. We here give a spirited engraving of the scene. The time our artist has chosen for his sketch is the passing of the Owl's Head stake-boat.

The day opened gloomily for those whose hearts were in the sport. A dull rain and nearly a dead calm gave little promise of an exciting race, or indeed of a race of any kind. But about ten o'clock the rain cleared away, and a breeze sprung up, and the day proved to be one of the finest known in the annals of the Club.

The following yachts entered for the sport:

The scene at Robbin's Reef was quite exciting. The appearance of the Glenpatty leading the squadron called forth rounds of cheers, and as she rounded flags were dipped, guns fired, steam-whistles blown, and great excitement prevailed. The other boats were complimented in turn, especially the Favorita, which, by a timely luff, avoided a tack, and perhaps going about, which might have lost her the race. The progress of the fleet from this point to the Southwest Spit was quite slow, with a light breeze from the S.S.W.

The homestretch was by far the most interesting part of the whole race, and one of the finest contests took place known in the annals of the Club. The wind was blowing what sailors would call a ten-knot breeze. Hand over hand the larger yachts had overhauled their smaller competitors, and were now the cynosure of every eye. The Haze, Favorita, Rebecca, and Restless were ahead, plowing along like mastodons, while the balance of the fleet, scattered about here and there, were following after like hounds after a deer.

From this time until the arrival at the stake-boat the excitement continued undiminished, and especially so during the last mile when the Haze, Favorita, Zinga, and Rebecca lay in a line, almost buried in foam, engaged in one of the closest and most animating races that has ever taken place in our harbor. Cheer after cheer went up as each yacht would careen almost to her combings, shoot ahead under the impetus of the flaw, and then right up again to pursue her way along. This scene continued until the arrival of the yachts at the home-boat, which they rounded in the following order:

classes, taking prizes of $150 each. No less than thirty yachts competed.

The following information, taken from the Herald, will prove of general interest just at this time:

"The total number of yachts at present belonging to the club is only forty-six; but if many had not been disposed of from time to time, to be used as pilot boats or coasters, or for other purposes, the aggregate would be much greater. The total number of yachts of over five tons measurement owned by gentlemen residents in the country, who are not the opportunity or disposition to join a club, is probably not less than five hundred; for there is hardly a river, harbor, or lake within the inland quarters that is not prolific with them.

"The terms of admission to the club are, that each individual shall be proposed by some member of the club, and that on his election he shall pay the sum of $20. Each subsequent annual payment of $10. All yachts in service are required to wear a signal flag; and when joining the Commodore at an anchorage, or leaving the same, the captain must report to the senior officer in command of the squadron. The annual regatta always takes place on the first Thursday in June, when a steamboat is provided by the club for the exclusive use of the members and ladies accompanying them.

"No member can be interested in more than one yacht entered for a regatta, and every yacht contending for a prize must be the bona fide property of a member of the club. A vessel entered as a yacht is required to be deposited with the secretary, which shall be the property of the club, and no person other than a United States naval constructor can copy the same without permission from the owner or builder of the yacht. This privilege is granted to the United States authorities in consideration of an act of Congress which entitles yachts to proceed from port to port of the United States without entering or clearing at the Custom-house.

"In a regatta the allowance of time to the classes above enumerated is as follows: First class, 10 seconds per foot. Second class, 2½ do. do. Third class, 2½ do. do.; and the several yachts are allowed to carry the following complement of men: First class, one for every four tons of her measurement; second class, one for every three and a half tons of her measurement; and the third class, one for every three tons of her measurement, besides which every yacht is required to carry a sextant, a reliable boat-clock, and a first-class lead.

"When on a cruise the officers and members of the club are required to wear a uniform, not unlike that worn in the regular service of the United States."

PALERMO.

We give on page 373 a view of the city of Palermo, of which, according to the most recent advices, as we go to press, Garibaldi had taken triumphant possession, the garrison laying down their arms, and the victorious patriot assuming, for this, the chief city of Sicily, the temporary Dictatorship of the Island.

Palermo is one of the capitals of the Two Sicilies, and a well-fortified city, the possession of which would be of great importance to Garibaldi. It is near another of the battered ports, and strengthened by three forts and some minor works, besides a citadel and a strong castle. It has a population of 200,000; and has figured in revolts, in modern times, twice before this—viz., in 1820 and in 1848.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, June 4, in the Senate, Senator Wilson procured the adoption of a resolution of inquiry into the circumstances of the arrest of Father Lazzara, an Italian patriot, on board an American vessel at Palermo. The Nicaragua Claim Bill was taken up, discussed briefly, slightly amended, and postponed. The Kansas bill being the order of the day, Senator Sumner delivered a speech on the "Barbarism of Slavery."——In the House, the bill appropriating $10,000 for a post-office in Brooklyn was favorably reported from the Senate, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union. A bill authorizing a daily mail service inland between San Francisco and Washington Territory, at a cost not exceeding $100,000 a year, was also reported and referred. Mr. Sherman reported the joint resolution reducing the price of the public printing, and gave notice that he should call it up on Wednesday next, thinking various minor considerations salaried offices was passed.

On Tuesday, June 5, in the Senate, Senator Sumner presented a petition from Lewis Tappan and others, of this City, asking for the release of Thaddeus Hyatt. The Kansas bill was taken up. Senator Green, of Missouri, moved to change the boundary of that Territory, and thus enable it to accomplish Constitution to the wish of the people. The subject was postponed, and the consideration of the Kansas bill was resumed, when the amendment reimbursing the several States for advances made to the National Government in the War of 1812 was discussed at length. Without further action, the Senate adjourned over to Monday. In the House, the bill for the survey of the Red River was passed. The bill providing for the return and support of the captured Africans was discussed and passed by a vote of 112 yeas to 85. The resolution from the Committee on Elections relative to the contest between Messrs. Blair and Broadhead, for the seat from the First Congressional District of Missouri, was next taken up, but no action was had thereon.

On Wednesday, June 6, in the Senate, the Homestead Land bill was read a third time and passed. The Army Appropriation bill was taken up, but no action was had thereon before adjournment.——In the House, the consideration of the Disputed Contested Elections was resumed, but no action was taken on the subject. A resolution was adopted for the appointment of a committee of seven to visit the Legislatures of Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas next year to ascertain the views of the Red River raft by levying tolls on boats navigating that river.

On Thursday, June 7, in the Senate, the effort to pass the bill approving the claim of Arthur Edwards over the Executive was renewed, and finally defeated. Senator Bright, of Indiana, moved a resolution that the Senate adjourn to meet on the 16th inst. Senator Bigler moved to substitute June 27 for June 18. The resolution was adopted without amendment.——By 27. Senator Wade desired to take up the bill for the admission of Kansas. By a close vote, 27 yeas and 28 nays, the Senate refused to consider the bill. The Army bill was then discussed and amended; the amendment with regard to reimbursing the States for interest upon advances made during the war of 1812 occupying the rest of the day, without action being had.——In the House nothing of importance was done.

On Friday, June 8, in the Senate, Mr. Green, of Missouri, rep. ted adversely to the admission of the Territory of Kansas. The bill to carry into effect the Ashburton treaties was passed. The remainder of the session was occupied with private bills.——In the House, the Missouri contested election case was disposed of, by a vote of 114 against 59 against the claim of Mr. Barrett. Mr. Foster was sworn in, and took his seat. Mr. Hickman called up his resolution from the Committee of Ways, reporting against the claim of the President, in his message of March 26, to be exempted from any penalty. After some debate the resolution was adopted, on vote—Ayes 116, Noes 73.

HON. JOHN BELL ACCEPTS.

In his letter of acceptance, Mr. Bell says: "The Constitution, the Union, and the Enforcement of Laws pledges from those whom they deem worthy of the highest confidence and honor. The Constitution recognizes that the utmost guaranty of a man's future usefulness and ability to his country is the confidence of his political station to which he may be chosen, is to be found in the plain history of his previous life. I refer, therefore, to the pledge implied in my acceptance of the nomination of the National Union Convention, that I would, if I be elected, I will not depart from the spirit and tenor of my past life and conduct in the administration of the Government, a double force from the consideration that none is required from me."

MR. EVERETT ACCEPTS.

The Hon. Edward Everett has written a letter accepting the nomination of the "Union" party for the Vice-Presidency. He says:

"I am

"In yielding, at length, to the earnest solicitations which have been addressed to me from the most enlightened sources in almost every part of the Union, I make a grateful sacrifice of individual feeling to what I deem a public duty. It has been urged upon me, and I have not been able to resist the argument, that if I have fallen upon times which call upon all good citizens, at whatever cost of personal feeling, to contribute their share, however humble, to the public service.

"I am altogether at a loss to form a conception, without note or comment, the Convention, as it seems to me, presents a very plain and simple duty to other citizens, was thought of in the earlier days of the Republic.

"The candidates of the Convention are presented by the Union Convention is every way worthy of confidence and support. Their names are a sufficient guaranty for the association with him in the public service.

"Deeply penetrated as the Convention has not put it in my power to pay an equally candid and emphatic tribute to some other names which have been before the country, but feeling it a duty to give the desired proof of sympathy with their principles and objects, I have thought it of brotherly concord between the different sections of our happy country.

"I remain, dear Sir, sincerely yours,

"EDWARD EVERETT."

SINGULAR SUICIDE.

A singular suicide was committed near Lawtenceburg, Indiana, last week. The Register says: "Among the cases of which appears to have been depression produced by the report of a fall in the price of hogs. He went to the river from a trance, believed to be death for a time by all who were about him, but he has been in a state of coma ever since all his family who were dead, and learned that all would go down to the grave. This apprehension, coming from a dying, almost a dead, brother, seems to have destroyed the poor fellow's reason. He has acted strangely for several days afterward, and finally disappeared on Sunday week before last. He was not missed till the Saturday following, when two men in search of some neighboring stock found his body floating in the river to a pole which crossed a deep ravine. The sick brother died the same week of typhoid fever."

TOUGH TIMES AT WASHOE.

The silver should be abundant in the newly-discovered Washoe mines is evident from the following: "Rich rock of from 15 to 25 cents per pound; pork, 25 cents; sugar, 60 cents; candles, 75 cents per pound; flour, $50 per barrel; beans, $250 per 100 pounds; bacon, 45 cents per pound. Board is $20 per week, and poor at that at the best. Gold per ton, and scarce.

A miner, who no doubt portrays from experience, gets off the following:

"On the hills of dreary Washoe—
Washoe, that has no charms—
Where it lays in chunks as big as Lumps of chalk, and 'pockets' bigger—
On the hills and in the valleys,
By the fire and in the shade,
Mong the sand-hills and in the sage brush,
In their nests and in their beds,
Are the men that couldn't wait till
Spring had come and summer passed.
Round their fires they sit and shiver,
Shiver, shiver, and slowly freeze,
With their toes stuck in the ashes,
With their heads against the chimney,
With their noses smitten and sore,
With their cheeks as red as a beacon;
To the blaze their pants extending,
With the ash and the cinder blown,
Falling, falling on their hair and
On their whiskers, red and matted,
Thicker, faster falling, falling,
Till their heads are covered over.
Till their whiskers will are whitened.

FASTEST TIME RECORDED.

The grand trotting match between Flora Temple and George M. Patchen for $1000, best three in five, came off on the 5th inst. at the Union course, and resulted in favor of Flora Temple, who is still entitled to be called the "queen of the turf." Patchen is a good horse for opponent, but even herself, and made the quickest time on record. In the first mile performed the animal was driven by the mare last season, which was the season of her decay, the latter winning the heat in 2:19¼, displaying one heat at Kalamazoo, Michigan, where, upon a short course, she is said to have made the mile in 2:18. The following is the time made:

	1 mile	½ mile	¼ mile	¼ mile
	M. S.	M. S.	M. S.	M. S.
First heat	2:19¼	1:11	0:36	0:18
Second heat	2:20¼	1:11¼	—	0:18
Third heat	2:21	1:11¼	—	0:18

TRAGEDY AT VICKSBURG.

The Vicksburg Sun gives an account of a terrible affair which occurred in that City on Friday, May 25th:

"A few years ago Mr. Lafayette Lee was married to a young lady of the name of Fleming, who resided for some time at the residence of his wife's father. In a short time Lee commenced treating his wife rudely, dissatisfied, and treated his young wife unkindly. A temporary separation took place, during which time Mrs. Lee remained at her father's house until a reconciliation was effected. Lee, a few months ago, went to Mississippi for the purpose of buying school. He was successful, and finally returned to this county, and established the existence of Mr. Flowers (who was a relative). Mr. Flowers purchased a large plantation of his house to Lee and his wife, also accepted them. Mrs. F. frequently spoke to Lee concerning his conduct that Lee treated his wife roughly, and remonstrated with him, and urged him to treat her kindly. Lee disregarded his family, proffering to assault those who made the effort.

"On Thursday last Mrs. Lee expressed her anxiety to see her mother, and she left for the home of the child to obtain conveyance. Mr. Flowers informed her that his carriage was at her service for that purpose whenever she wished it. Lee remarked that she should not go, and threatened to kill her if she did so. Having been repeatedly threatened by him in a like manner, she did not place much confidence in his threats. Friday the subject was again alluded to, and Lee persisted in his threats. Shortly after, while Mr. and Mrs. Flowers and Mr. and Mrs. Lee were together in the drawing-room, the report of a pistol was heard, and Mrs. Lee fell mortally wounded, exclaiming that she was shot. Mr. F. immediately caught her and laid his head upon her breast, but expired. Lee now advanced and fired again at his wife and once at Mr. Flowers. After the third shot had sent Mrs. Lee to the floor, supported by the left arm of Mr. Flowers, Lee, with a pistol in his right hand, and a bowie-knife, fired five times over his shoulder at Mr. Flowers. Each ball took effect in the back of the head, the right temple—one near the middle of the forehead—one near the mouth. Lee fell, and died instantly. Mr. Flowers lived a few minutes.

"The deceased, Mrs. Lee, was a lady of the most dangerous character. The husband just above the right breast, passing through it, to the waist, and coming out next to the spine. At last accounts she was in a most critical condition.

"The conduct of Mr. Flowers in this unfortunate affair has elicited the fullest commendation from the community."

THE CENSUS AMONG THE FACTORIES.

Mr. Jos. C. G. Kennedy has written a letter describing the tables which he has arranged for the use of the enumerators. The information to be asked of manufactories are set forth as follows:

The nature of the business, quantity of law, has been prepared as a record of the operations of productive industry for the census of 1860. For the year ending on the last day of June, 1860, enumerators fourteen columns, with headings as nearly as practicable, to be filled with every variety of manufacture. The first column is designed to include the name of the firm, person, company, or individual producing articles to the value of $500 per annum. The second column is designed to show the nature of the business, manufacture, or product. The third column includes the capital actually invested in real estate and personal estate in the business. The various raw materials used, the quantity, kind, and cost, or estimated value, are represented in columns four, five, and six. In connection with the capital of motive power, machinery, structure, or resource. If the motive power be steam, the number of horses' power is to be inserted. In furnaces the number of fires; and for fabrics the number of looms, spindles, and other machines. An eighth and nine are recorded the number of male and female hands employed in the business. The enumerators freely are set down in columns ten and eleven; while in columns twelve and thirteen the average cost the quantities, kinds, and values of all kinds of manufactured articles.

HICKS, THE PIRATE, CONFESSES.

Albert W. Hicks, the pirate, the murderer of the captain and crew of the sloop E. A. Johnson, has made a full confession. We publish it in full below. It is City Prison:

The admissions were made in course of a conversation with a gentlemen who has been unremitting in his attentions to the wretch. This statement is brief:

He quoted first remarked:

"Hicks, I have been told a history of the manner in which Captain Burr and the Watts boys were murdered, but I should like to have done between the hours of 11 o'clock at night and 1 in the morning."

So," replied Hicks: "they killed them between 8 and 9 o'clock, and I would be done at 11."

"What do you mean by that?" rejoined his questioner. "Burr was alive and Jones on board the sloop, and you were one of the four. I am surprised at you, for I had always given you credit for having nothing further to do with you if you took no part in the murder."

"But Jones and Burr were," said Hicks, with a fiendish smile. "The deed was done between 8 and 9 o'clock, and I and the devil kept telling me over them for some time. I called Burr to the helm, and he was the chance. I struck him with the first of my intentions I dealt him the young man Watts. He fell on deck, and I had a tremendous blow on the other, which he could kill him to repeat, but the second time before I could kill him. Meantime the noise and scuffling woke up the old man Watts, who was in the cabin, and he got on deck and struck him. He wasn't so hard to dispatch as the first one."

Q. "What sort of a weapon did you use?"

A. "A tomahawk or hand-spike?"

This question Hicks could not be induced to answer, thereby implying that it was a heavy instrument. His manner and subsequent remarks conveyed the impression to the mind of the interrogator that no axe was the weapon he had used.

CAPTAIN BURR.

Hicks resumed. "After I had finished the boys, I went to the cabin to look for the captain. Burr had swung upon deck. He asked what the matter was, and I struck at him. He ran down the companion-way, and attempted to grapple me, and it was a long time before I could overpower him. He begged for life, but Hicks, nothing daunted, said:

"No! the resistance of the Captain accounts for the marks of the terrible struggle in the cabin; the wood-work was cut with the axe, and there was a great quantity of blood about."

To this statement Hicks assented, and the gentleman went on.

"But there were bloody finger-marks on the gunwale, and you must have thrown one of them overboard before you left the sloop. Was it the captain's body that you chopped his finger off?"

"No, sir," replied Hicks, all been dead worse than an hour when I pitched them over," said Hicks. He then said: "By the way, Captain, the sharks has been fearful; is it true?"

"I believe so," was the reply.

"Well, I don't; you see, when all this happened we were in the Gulf Stream, and I thought that the sharks' graves should be deep—very deep."

It was then asked why the bodies could have been alone as he was on the vessel, with nothing to be seen but the rocks and the sea, and the waters around him, while his sagacious, murdered by his hand, lay mutilated and bloody on the deck.

"Oh!" said he, "it makes me shudder now, but then I did not think of it. I had a bottle of rum by me; I drank and drank, but soon I was sobered me."

OTHER MURDERS.

Some further confessions were made, and Hicks stated that he participated in the mutiny and murders on board the ship Sarah, in 1857. He pretended, at the time, to know something also of the murder of the Captain and crew of the schooner Sydney Sherman, attributed to some years ago, and the scuttling of the vessel, for which the negro Wm. Brown was executed at White Plains.

HICKS'S RIVERS.

The following verses dictated by Hicks were written down by the reporter:

I slipped on board the Schalvin,
As you may understand,
And both my pockets filled with Ammo,
Captain Kennie to command.

We arrived in that country
Without undue delay,
When Fielding came on board
And I caused to that day!

He first persuaded us
To do the direful crime;
We could then have prevented it,
If we'd begun in time.

I stained my hands in human blood,
And for what? I do not know;
I shot the blood of innocence,
For which I have to die.

THE "SALADIN" MYSTERY.

The vessel of this name, here spoken of, was stranded, in the month of June, 1854, laden with grains, and having on board a quantity of gold in bars, on the Southern coast of Nova Scotia, near the Gut of Canso. After a few days, the small number of the crew (seven), and other circumstances, excited suspicions of foul play in reference to the wreck, and all the hands being arrested by the authorities, were brought to Halifax, where they were subsequently tried before a special commission, when four of them were convicted of one of the most atrocious deeds of murder and piracy ever recorded in the annals of crime. That Hicks was one of the men on board this ill-fated ship seems more than probable from his statement; but whether he was aware of the intended atrocity, or one of the men who borrow with terror for their lives, he alone can explain. It will be seen by the narrative that the master Fielding, who inhabited the cabin, was murdered, and the vessel and cargo destroyed by the guilty men when he had served into the condition described in the earlier murders.

THE STORY OF THE "SALADIN."

When the Saladin was about leaving Valparaiso, Captain Fielding, whose vessel had been overloaded for a breach of the revenue laws of the country, applied to Captain Hickmott for a passage to England for himself and his son; and they were taken on board as cabin passengers. Shortly after getting to sea Fielding unconsciously spoke to the next unfavorably of Captain M'Kenzie, told them of the valuable cargo there was on board, and questioned them as to their courage and resolution, if they should attempt to act in disregard of commands. All this disclosure with them was separately, he never suspecting that any of the crew could be bribed.

He finally told them—still speaking to the same confidential person—that he was not at a time—and that he was about to destroy the officers and take the ship out of the hands of the captain, and that he had an advantage of better join them, or his own life would be in danger. In this disinterested manner he succeeded in bribing them, one after another, into a mutiny, before they were aware of his intentions. He then waited for a favorable opportunity, which soon arrived, when the first mate, who had been left in charge of the vessel, left the cabin, leaving the engineer in charge with him of a sufficient number to carry them into effect. He then went on deck, and, with the assistance of those who were in the plot, bring the prisoners, with the exception of the carpenter and Collins, who was on watch, and consequently all being on deck together, they had no difficulty in securing the whole into execution.

THE PLOT OF THE MUTINEERS.

The night of the 13th of April was first proposed for the tragedy, but one of the mutineers not being in his watch on deck, the execution was then deferred, being sufficient in that hardihood which alone prepares the murderer for the unparalleled deed of blood that was played. Previous to the next night Fielding had got upon the quarter-deck, and without notice his danger, had exited their fears, inflamed their cupidity, and got them fully prepared for the work of blood.

The mate's watch, including all the mutineers, was called on deck, and Fielding pretending that he was irritated by an argument which he had with Captain Hickmott, ordered the latter to be ironed with this unsuspecting mate, who repeatedly asked him why he did with the intention of getting him on deck to be evaded, and still remained on deck. Finally, it now being near 12 o'clock, the mate was ordered to go below at the helm and told him to steer as well as he could, and that he (Fielding) would be down in a spell on the lookout. Here there was a favorable opportunity for them, and their whole plan was arranged in the cabin, the mate and in fiendish security in hates, that half of the crew who were on deck were preparing below for the destruction, and the only object that was in their way had now laid down in security, and was soon in eternity.

This opportunity they but too well improved. The work of death was accomplished by striking at the axe, and, its darkness and silence, approaching the sleeping victim, they struck at it in the dark. The struggle was immediately suspended, and, without the least noise, they threw the unconscious body into the sea.

THE WORK OF DEATH.

They then ran next to kill the Captain, and Jones and Burr were also murdered in the same manner that corpse; but the sleeping man's dog was keeping watch for his master, and his barking brought him to his senses. Jones was then asleep, and made the same fate. Then the mate, Burr, and the other lad were murdered in their berths, and the vessel and cargo destroyed.

THE MURDER OF THE CAPTAIN.

Captain Hickmott, who had been left in charge, first awoke from his sleep, and, on coming on deck, found the mate at the helm, and Fielding, Jones, and Burr on the lookout forward. He asked the mate why he did not call him, and he replied that he was ordered not to do so. Hickmott then went forward to Fielding, and asked him said he would get rid of Carr and Galloway when they got near the land, by giving them a dose of poison, and alleged that they must have the crew still further reduced. This Johnson did not approve of, and mentioned it to his comrades, who also considered them all to feel sea sickness. Their suspicions were increased by their accidentally discovering that he had secreted two pistols and some ammunition, and a large carving-knife. This they thought had been with him, and in a conversation he had had he would have murdered them, if he was having the cabin professedly with that intent; they, however, took hold of him and prevented him having got hold of his fire kept him; and on some other occasion, when he was in a passion, he deliberately came to the determination to do it, and tied him hand and foot, and, unfortunately to say, the young boy, who had taken no part in the transaction, was tied also. In this state they were confined to the cabin floor all night.

"In the morning the sea set, it would appear, was liberated, for he was afterward found on the forward part of the deck. On the master Fielding coming on deck he had his feet untied, and was brought on deck, and made to bear the examination respecting what he had to do done with him, the result of which examination was that they should have him secured, and this was accordingly done; and Carr and Galloway were made to assist in doing it. The poor little boy was forward at the time, and, notwithstanding his piteous prayers for mercy and his screams of delight, he was thrown overboard.

We have had to omit many incidents in these hurried details, but we believe the foregoing will be found a faithful and accurate outline.

THE LAST LETTER OF CAPTAIN BURR TO HIS WIFE.

An every thing connected with this mysterious and bloody affair must prove to be of public interest, we republish the extract from the last letter of Aaron Burr, in which he speaks of William Johnson as a boisterous, furious fellow, from Count Island, previous to the departure of the St. A. Johnson on her ill-fated voyage:

"The man William Johnson, who lives in New York, is a monster also. He sent me his most vile scrawl while we were at Keyport, without telling, while I was ashore. He is a good boat; can turn his hand to almost any thing. He is a ship-carpenter, he says, and has got tools of his trade. He understands navigation a boat, only is not a very good helmsman to steer the sloop into a harbor, but understands what is necessary, and can keep well enough other ways. It requires a man that has been used to sailing and steering to be a good steerer fast. We often got in company with vessels that are coasters, and it requires a nice helmsman to get in, requires my skill more. Smith is a good helmsman clear by the wind. I don't think Green is much of a hand. I will write the first chance after we get in Virginia. Should we have a chance we are going from Boston to see if we can get a boat there. That is about five miles short of the Naphouskeak River, which boats where it is. I have nothing more at present. Would like to see you very much.

"Your affectionate husband ever,
"A. BURR."

THE JAPANESE TAKE LEAVE.

Our Japanese visitors have at length taken leave of President Buchanan, and are on their way to Perth. At the last ceremonial audience the Brit Embassador read, quite in a whisper, the following address to the Queen, which were translated by Manners in Dutch to Mr. Portman, and repeated by Mr. Portman to the Japanese:

"The exchange of the ratification of the treaty having taken place, and the time of our departure having arrived, we have come to take leave of your Excellency, and to return you sentiment hearty thanks for the kindness we have received from your Excellency, and for the very kind treatment we have met with in Washington. We will be submitted by your Excellency to the Tycoon, who will be greatly pleased by it, and who will always entertain a friendship and a sincere and friendly relations so happily established between the two countries.

The President answered thus:

"The wishes of these distinguished Commissioners from the Tycoon has been a very propitious and agreeable event to my administration. It is a fortunate event, which I trust will unite the two nations together in bonds of friendship throughout all time. The conduct of the Commissioners has met my entire approbation, and the Tycoon could not have selected any of his dominions any representatives who could have more entertained the favorable of the Government of the United States. I have caused the Secretary of State to present to each of the Commissioners a token of my regard, and to the Tycoon, stating my opinion of the manner in which they have performed their business. A copy of that letter will be placed in their hands before their departure.

I wish you a very agreeable time during the remainder of your residence in the United States, with a safe and happy return to your own country, under the flag of the American Union.

I desire, for myself, to present to each of the Commissioners a gold medal, struck at the Mint, in commemoration of their arrival and services in this country."

There have been several presents prepared for his Imperial Majesty the Tycoon, which will be sent to your lodgings in the course of the day."

THE GOLD MEDALS.

The gold medals spoken of were then delivered to the Embassadors. They were inclosed in red morocco boxes, on which are the same inscriptions." Presented by the President of the United States to the Embassadors from Japan." The medals are about three inches in diameter, and half an inch thick. Upon one side is the profile head of Mr. Buchanan in high relief; upon the other the following words are engraved:

COMMEMORATION OF THE
FIRST EMBASSY FROM JAPAN
TO THE
UNITED STATES,
1860.

Mr. Case then delivered to Naroun Genoju a set of Audubon's work, inclosed in a morocco case, with a request "To his Majesty the Tycoon of Japan," remarking that similar volumes had been sent by this Government to the Queen of England, and by her received with gratification.

It mentioned that other presents, of books and mechanical works, a steam-engine, etc., were now intended for the Tycoon and some for the Commissioners themselves; upon the course of propitiation, the nature of which is only to put in their keeping. Last of all, he produced twenty silver and fifty bronze medals, one of each to be issued as those given by the President to the three Princes, which he explained were intended for the officers and servants of the Embassy, to be distributed as the superiors should decide.

FIRE-WORKS EXPLOSION.

The pyrotechnic establishment of the Messrs. Hadfield, situated in East Williamsburgh, Newtown, Queens County, L. I., was blown up on June 8th. Two men, Mr. Charles Hadfield, one of the proprietors, and an assistant, Jacob Craig, were instantly killed. Mr. [illegible] the proprietors, and a man [illegible] wounded; and about [illegible] The [illegible] seven of [illegible] and [illegible] explosion was filling a "star rocket" he accidentally set fire to the composition. The roof of the building was blown fifty feet into the air. Sixty kegs of powder in an adjoining building also exploded.

MAIL STEAMER IN COLLISION.

The Cunard mail steamer Canada, which left Boston for Liverpool on the 16th of May, arrived at Queenstown on the 27th of that month. When passing the Banks of Newfoundland, during a dense fog, she came in collision with the brig Ocean Pearl, of London, from Cadiz, bound to St. John's, Newfoundland, with a cargo of salt. The brig sank in a few minutes, and her crew were all saved by boats from the Canada, and arrived in that vessel at Queenstown.

PERSONAL.

The Paris Academy of Sciences has elected a successor to Alexander von Humboldt. The election will have been put up for the election, among whom were Liebig, Wohler, Brewster, Agassiz, Marchand, and Dr. Hayes, of the last the choice fell on Ehrenburg, the companion of Humboldt in his Siberian expedition.

Professor Jan Geele, one of the most eminent Belgian and Dutch poets, died at Amsterdam on May 1.

Lisbon has erected a monument in honor of Camoens. Professor Ticknor, of Boston College, has gone to England to spend the summer months.

A London letter-writer says that Mr. Ten Brook won £60,000 on the great Derby ten, in which his horse Under Sea was beaten. Although he won the largest sum on the betting, but in the race he came out the seventh.

Judge Peter S. Daniel of the United States Supreme Court, who died in Richmond on Thursday morning, was born at "Over's Neck," in Stafford County, Virginia, on the 24th of April, 1784. During his life he occupied many positions of importance and responsibility. When he had just reached his 21st year, he was chosen to represent his native county in the Virginia Legislature, and after serving two terms was elected a member of the Executive Council, in which he held a seat which he held for upward of twenty years. After leaving the Council he was appointed Attorney-General, afterward Judge of the Federal Court, and was subsequently appointed by President Van Buren to a seat on the bench of the United States Supreme Court. He occupied this position at the time of his decease.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

In the House of Commons on the 24th, on the motion of Lord Palmerston, a committee was appointed to inspect the journals of the House of Lords for any proceedings upon the question of the bill repealing the paper duty. The Committee subsequently reported, pro forma, that they had found no such proceedings. The bill in question, and Lord Palmerston then gave notice that he would move for the appointment of a Committee to search for precedents.

Lord John Russell stated in reply to an inquiry by Mr. Kinglake, that Government had throughout supported the second reading of the measure before the Committee of the Great Powers, and would continue to do so until the Turkish evacuation was effected.

Mr. Laing moved for a vote of credit on account of the civil contingencies. Although he had made strong opposition, was agreed to. The Opposition members generally refrained from voting, but consented of proceeding in a regular way with the estimates, and it is supposed that their objection to the vote of credit on the abolition of the Reform bill until the estimates are passed, and thereby kill the measure for the present year. The Times says that the above proceedings have virtually decided the abandonment of the bill, although it is said some time may elapse before the measure is finally given up.

On the 25th, in the House of Commons, the resolution of Mr. Laing, to abolish the paper duty, was carried. Lord Palmerston denounced it in the strongest terms as contrary to a government of finance.

THE DERBY DAY.

The event of the week in England was the great race, Derby day proved a disappointment. The betting was very badly beaten. The defeat of Umpire was a great disappointment to the backers of the bill, although a number with much confidence upon being enabled to carry the measure through the House of Lords by the help of Americans. Prior to the race the owner of Nutbourne lodged an objection against Umpire, on the ground that the horse was not of the age described. Mr. Merry was warmly congratulated on the success of Thormanby, the horse that he won, on both since, upward of £70,000.

The value of the Derby stakes, the money to be paid to the second horse, the judge, and toward expenses £6,600.

Umpire was seventh in the race. Thormanby was heavily backed, and his victory was hailed with a tremendous cheer. Nutbourne was the favorite, and Umpire was the favorite. The Prince present, and was received with the universal disappointment this much-vaunted American's race! Among the Americans present were some of the most influential partizans by his course, overdone generosity, and fearful gambling propensities. The recently startling contrast to the blooming looks of Thormanby, Vandal, Wizard, Umpire, Nutbourne, Thormanby, Horror, Cape Flyaway, Malmstone, and Beiram among the horses, and Mr. Merry, one of the most prejudiced admirers of the American system of training that there is in England, and a determined opponent of that of the old school, so far as the preparation of a Derby horse is concerned. Mr. Merry's faith in Mr. Brook's stable has proved in less important engagements. The market is in favor of Thormanby, and Umpire is declining; and although nothing could exceed Indian magnificence as a racer, the public are not inclined to put position in the Ring was so strong that instead of leaving off first favorite, as many anticipated, he was sent to 7 and 7 to 1, and would, undoubtedly, have retrograded still further if the start had been delayed much longer. It was, Thormanby, who was in such tremendous form at last that he could not be kept from the front, and Umpire (who was likewise as firm as his warmest supporters could wish), gave the lead to Thormanby and Nutbourne also took directly on his heels. A good start was effected, and the three coming round Tattenham corner together, broke down badly, which immediately caused attention to be directed to Mr. Merry's horse, who was second in the front, and showed his bright orange colors in no premises. Thormanby was not extended in the race, and Merry; but it was hard in comparison with the tremendous "cut up" Umpire had received in the race. Nutbourne of the former had scarcely subsided, as Snowden was seen to be "lifted" upon his horse's back and taken to the home; and from this point he was beaten, and only obtained the second position by a length.

THE CHAMPIONS AT THE DERBY.

"Not the least attractive feature of the stand and racecourse were the two champions, Sayers and Heenan! They were both dressed after the most approved mode of Derby costume. Heenan could not suppress his rising national sympathies, and consequently backed Umpire to win him £1000. He was, however, heartily disgusted with the upshot, nor did he fail to give full expression to his feelings of disappointment. We cannot say that they have been the 'observed of all observers,' and it is a question whether the acquaintance of the blue ribbon of the Turf obtained the greater share of attention. We hear that, feeling their own inexperience in business, they have placed their affairs in the hands of Messrs. Howes & Cushing of the American Circus, under whose charge they intend making this grand tour of the United Kingdom with their bats; and we have not the slightest doubt that, if their cards are well played, they will reap a rich harvest. The ceremony of presenting the new belts is to take place on Wednesday evening next, at Cremorne Gardens, London, which have been specially fitted up for the occasion. There will, on this evening, be no sparring; and indeed the only manner in which the Champions will be brought to the entertainment will be on the occasion of the presentation of the belts and the subsequent display of the new exhibition will be of a popular and entertaining kind. After they have completed their tour in the provinces, they will go together to the United States, where, notwithstanding the rapacity, and the natural love of battle, we are sure both will be received with open arms."

THE "GREAT EASTERN" ADVERTISED.

The following notice has been issued, and is exciting public in a poster, only sixteen inches long, and of the following absurd proportions:

BARRY AND THE PUGILISTS.

Mr. BARRY is again in London, after an absence of several months, and is the subject of much talk. It is now known that he was to exhibit the extraordinary powers in the possession of a mesmeric subject for the entertainment to be crowded on Monday evening with persons of all classes and ranks. The leading theme "observed of all observers," Heenan and Tom Sayers, who sat together in a private box in the dress circle. Barry, however, seemed to be as much delighted and astonished at the achievements of the Prize Ring of the crowded audience. Mr. Barry issues boxes with a humanity which has called forth the admiration of the Committee of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, who, only last week, presented him with a most valuable testimonial. Last evening this quality, combined with coolness and courage, was displayed by Barry in a manner in a marked manner by Mr. Barry, in the mode in which he sorts for the safety of the lives of persons committed we have ever seen. He tested his skill successfully without, and in the face of a large crowd, and then proceeded to the present owner. Mr. Case, of a cavalry regiment, in crossing the Alps, had trouble, and at one time a dangerous to approach in any way that she could not safely, and the animal, in fact, was in a state of fright and his audience that, in his opinion, she was eight years old, but, notwithstanding the strength of his skill, and it was to be still further demonstrated on a thoroughbred horse, which he would ride over hurdles, apparently perfectly uncontrollable, biting at every one that approached him, and which he had managed by sight alone, and that would not suffer himself to be bridled except by the person who had trained him. Mr. Barry's friends, alive, and on his arrival at the railway station knocked down by the crowd, and the horse he bred; and in taking him into the ring at the Alhambra nearly broke the arm of a man who got in the way, and knocked down a fore-foot. Mr. Barry, notwithstanding, succeeded after a considerable struggle in mounting the animal, and in rendering him as tractable as a lamb. This feat, which was the most remarkable of the whole performance, was not in silence with the utmost surprise, was greeted at the close with the most enthusiastic cheers, and Mr. Barry called for twice to receive an ovation of cheers. GENERAL VIEW OF THE CENTRAL PARK.

On pages 376 and 377 we present to our readers a fine view of the Park, which is now, and will be more and more, the chief pride and best comfort of all New York. It is already the resort of thousands of citizens, and a place which no stranger visiting the city will henceforth fail to see. Every day new improvements are being made—new provisions for the comfort and pleasure of visitors. Of course the Park itself is the best thing in this part of the island, but Mr. Olmsted, the superintendent, or architect-in-chief, whose singular ability and fitness for his position are made daily more apparent, has recently made some suggestions in which we are all interested. Last year, during a rapid foreign tour for the restoration of his health, he saw with a wise eye the famous Continental parks, and he observed that in all of them proper provision was made for eating and drinking.

It is clear enough that the Central Park is to be "the country," and the only "country" which many of our citizens will see during the summer. Mothers will go there with their families to pass the day, and already, before Mr. Olmsted went away last summer, the portion next to the habit of coming to the Park bringing with them baskets of provisions. He proposes the erection of a suitable eating, or public-club-house, or cafe, or restaurant, or whatever name may be most suitable, in which there shall be rooms of every kind and size for convenient lunching, dining, smoking, dressing, bathing—rooms for the sale of newspapers, magazines, and other garden literature, surrounding which shall be a space of turf covered with tables under trees for the purposes of a cafe in the pleasant weather. Some other capital idea hints he suggests the keeping of a few cows, as in St. James's Park in London, to furnish fresh milk.

Then for the use of small boats and a boatman; some to ply from point to point like omnibuses, others to be upon call, with established rates of fare. And for the children, vehicles neat, strong, and convenient, to be drawn by one horse and to carry two or four persons; the boats and carriages to be owned by the Park, and subject to the immediate supervision of its officers.

These suggestions are full of good sense, for they tend to make the Park available in every way for every body. They are entirely consonant with the spirit of the enterprise, and will, beyond doubt, be effectively adopted.

As the spectator stands upon a chiselled crag at the extreme southern entry more at will and wisely, stream and lawn, of the great Central Park—The Ramble—he is reminded of the charming story in the "Arabian Nights," where the wandering Prince, entranced by the loveliness of the lake with the enchanted fishes, reflectively inquires "if such magnificence can exist in the close vicinity of the great city and the inhabitants thereof remain in ignorance of its delights and splendor?"

What should exist in the Eastern genii could chisel fine foreground rock into rugged grandeur, and compel the drooping softness of its breathing foliage?

See how that flinty mountain, horrent with massive crags and festooned with climbing forests, flings its reflected image into the misty mirror at its base, wrinkled by the rush of the foaming cataract! And how the rustling lake seals round that enamelled wilderness and that tangled forest of mighty dwarfishness! What bustling cliffs and tumbling torrents lie beyond! Beneath that silver fountain the fascinating but lost spirit of the waters, Undine, might discover herself to her Christian husband, the good knight Huldbrand!

What awful solitudes and mystic fastnesses are mimicked there! Rip Van Winkle might doze away a lifetime in those dreary wilds, or goodness knows might revel in their grim recesses. There they are gathered on the emerald sward beyond—the flowery sprite of this magic region—circling in the gusts of that fairy music which floats through the enchanted atmosphere, the very Sibyl of its necromancy. Trembling strain echoes from the forest, fringing the golden waters beyond, and wimples by that lofty tower, standing like the spectral guide of the Hartz mountains on the utmost peaks around it; the whispering melody glides along the uncertain dewy distances which have the "mighty Hudson," until it expires in the purple remoteness of the heights of Harlem and the pearly-painted towers of hills beyond. It is a truly lovely scene, wondrous in its delicate detail and splendid spread of glade and leafy woodland—a sylvan miracle, teaming with powers of romantic levitation and dripping fountains of clearest crystal—a worthy jewel in the crown of the Queen of the Atlantic.

A STORY OF NIAGARA.

"FROM that rock a man was precipitated by his brother. He went over the falls, Sir."

It sounded terrible, with the thunder of the cataract in our ears. "I never heard the story," I said.

"Very few have, but it's true for all that; and I know the particulars perhaps better than any man living. I heard them from the murderer himself."

I started.

"He was a lunatic in — Asylum, in New York, of which I am known. I am head physician. I'll tell you all about it over a hot brandy-toddy at the International when you have had enough of this drenching. Shall we go?"

I agreed; and twenty minutes afterward, in the room which we jointly occupied, beside a cheery wood fire, rendered doubly acceptable by the hour and the dampness of the season, the stormy night shut out, the voice of the cataract forming an appropriate accompaniment to the narrative, the stimulant alluded to by the Doctor, and the sedative of cigars at hand, he imparted to me the particulars forming the ground-work of the following story:

There were resident in the city of New York two brothers, of wealthy family and Puritan ancestry, whom I shall designate by their biblical names of Mark and Silas, the first the elder-born. They had left their native State of Connecticut, where they had been brought up in strictness and comparative seclusion, when nearly arrived at manhood, to assume positions in the rich mercantile house of their maternal uncle, with the expectation of ultimately succeeding him in the control of it, for he was a bachelor and childless, and seemed his brother's two lads fond of his own. Probably nothing less would have induced their parents to part with them. They were, as said, wealthy, and of old New England stock; and their creed, one of the severest ever adopted by mortals, made them averse to exposing their sons to the assumed temptations which lie outside the bounds of parental restraint. This reason had kept the young men from business until Mark was twenty, Silas two years younger.

Two brothers possessing a general resemblance in physique and in minor points of character, yet so radically different in its essential components, could scarcely be imagined. Both fair-haired and gray-eyed, possessing a spice of that regularity of feature commonly observable in American faces, the elder was, in disposition as in appearance, the impersonation of sedate coolness, affectionate good-nature; the younger, of shy, serious, almost feminine delicacy and sensitiveness. That constitutional timidity which the severest rule by the peculiar training to which they had been subjected.

It was severely repressive and rigorously Puritan. Descended from that ancestry which is the granite of New England character—a race which absolutely lives in the saving of its endeavors, its routine of daily life, even to the minutest particular, as though every act of their existence depended to rely, child-like, on the divine beneficence implied in the title, "Our Father which art in heaven," that, in the words of their pastor, they were accustomed to rate the task "of reconciling the most tremendous facts of sin and evil, present and eternal, with those conceptions of infinite love and mercy implanted in their own strong natures enabled them so vividly to realize;" thus descended, the father of Mark and Silas was evidently the man selected by God to mould his sons in the fashion of his own sombre individuality. And maternal affection effected little with modification of their parent's rule. The mother did not see through her husband's eyes, she shared his belief, and would have considered any interference with it as a dereliction of her Christian duties, perhaps sinful.

Mark, the elder, suffered least. His was a simple, honest nature, whose lack of depth, and healthy tendencies toward the sunny side of existence were the best of protection against the gloom around him. They only affected him temporarily: they surrounded him, but never struck inward. He received the faith with the rest, and even prohibitive aspect, as something presumably necessary, but inherently antagonistic to human happiness. Without reasoning upon it, he had accepted himself as little about them as possible. He eagerly embraced whatever pleasures lay in his way; was manner-bound and conventional to a fair border, and would have domineered over him but that Silas's sensitiveness made the act brutal, while his affectionate nature rendered it impossible.

Naturally studious and thoughtful, Silas preferred poring over a book to out-of-door pleasures, for such social intercourse as his father's position afforded. Not that he disdained the latter, for he was impressionable and appreciative; but an unconquerable bashfulness, belonging to a highly nervous organization, made him shy and self-distrustful in company. He was, consequently, considered peculiarly ignored by Mark, had virtually possessed the younger man's healthy intellectual existence. Mark temporarily assumed the office of protection to a mind forever brooding on things eternal.

His taste for reading found no more wholesome aliment than the religious and theological divines of the last generation—a literature justly characterized as "altogether unique" and terrible. Devouring these in the solitude of his own mental food, accepting their testimony, at first, without question, Silas's existence from his boyish days had been overshadowed by the awful fact—that of eternal perdition. Too timid to arrogate to himself that miraculous change of heart without experiencing which no human being can enter under the just sentence of a wrathful God, he suffered horribly, suffered to a degree of intensity eye cannot behold in a description. At time his inevitable reaction came, producing at first repulsion and revolt, then scepticism of the Deity himself, the evil spirit in the parable, he journeyed through dry places without finding rest: presently embarking on the wreckers of the Dead Sea of unbelief with no better pilots than Paine and Voltaire, he read their works in secret and fancied himself an infidel. From the extreme of religious concentration to negation is neither an uncommon nor an unnatural transition: Silas made it with fear and trembling; the history of his mind, as given only after a long struggle, the miserable particulars of which may be imagined. Perhaps it never entirely relinquished its hold upon him.

Both the brothers hailed their emancipation from the restraints of home with satisfaction, the greater because they entered upon a life connected the very converse of it. Though a nominal professor of the faith, Mark was by nature the most genial of rich old bachelors. He went to the theatre, read novels, and gave dinner parties, declining on all occasions to surround himself with young and mirthful faces. His secret sympathy for his nephews had made him stipulate for their change of residence as the price of his testamentary favor, while his judgment indicated the necessity of qualifying them for their future career. The removal was only accomplished after lengthy negotiation, and, as aforesaid, when Mark and Silas had nearly attained manhood.

In their uncle's house they enjoyed an amount of personal freedom and consideration at once novel and delightful, and naturally made themselves amends for old repression after their separate fashions. Mark, always his uncle's favorite, became a general one; his good looks, good-nature, and healthy appetite for pleasure secured him a welcome every where. Silas, too shy to mix in society, yet commanded and appreciated intellectual gratification. Three years of town residence converted the elder brother into a dashing, free-handed, and universally popular New Yorker; the younger into a student of fastidious, serious, and sensitive gentleman. They loved each other fraternally, Mark displaying his affection with a spice of big-brotherly authority, but respecting his mental pre-eminence; Silas with an admiration of his elder's executive ability, which was unbounded and even enjoyed such harmless manifestations of it.

Such were the brothers' mutual relations when their uncle's death opened up new instances, one the innocent cause of the crime foreshadowed in the introduction to this narrative.

An old schoolmate and friend of their uncle came to New York with his only daughter, returning from two years of European travel. He was the owner of a flourishing cotton-plantation, and, arriving in the month of June, willingly postponed his departure for the South until the summer's heat should have abated, accepting in the mean time the hearty old bachelor's hospitality, and residing with him on a tour to the watering-places. This project was, doubtless, the occasion of considerably agreeable to the old gentleman; she had been a child-pet of his, and time had only developed her beauty and attractiveness.

She was a tall, black-haired girl, with great dark eyes, deep-toned, as to intellect and feelings were in genial flow, sparkled with a brown splendor at once dazzling and beautiful, but could look grave and kind under circumstances. Just eighteen, possessing one of the sweetest of contralto voices, highly educated, a little self-conscious and imperious, but no more so than her wealth, beauty and accomplishments seemed to warrant, foreign travel and intercourse with European society had refined away what too demonstrative a disposition which is not uncommon in Southern belles, replacing it with the perfect ease of high breeding. Both the brothers fell in love with her.

That she should look with favor upon a young, gallant, handsome suitor like Mark, prospectively rich, and versed in society, was no wonder. He had the surface qualities which attract women and more. She never suspected the passion of the younger brother.

His shyness had always kept him in the background. He had never even attempted a strong secret attraction toward it. He was now brought into daily communion with a girl of rare beauty, refinement, and intellect, whose high-souled womanliness approached his ideal conception of the sex, whose character bore the test of his speculative and analytical mind. He loved her at once passionately and hopelessly.

He never told her of it; he never intended to do so. From the first he had mistrusted himself, and would have augured only miserable and ridiculous failure as the certain result of any attempt presumably so unsuited to his style of character. Yet—a curious but natural anomaly—his passion revealed to him the depth and superiority of his own nature—a depth and superiority hitherto altogether undreamt of. Nothing idea of competing for her favor—with no distinct apprehension of Mark's success—he read a variety of the deepest speculations—his affection, from its concentrament, was emotional by design and intuition. These passions preyed on his heart, no one suspecting. The fire raged the fiercer for repression. If he hoped to extinguish it, a chance word, a look of hers made it blaze afresh. He thought of her ceaselessly; his beauty haunted him: unable to tear himself away from the influence of her presence, he continued recklessly drinking in the sweet poison which had already tainted his life. It is in the nature of such morbid passions to feed on themselves progressively, and to deceive their entertainers. Had Silas spoken no tragedy might have occurred.

The brothers, with their uncle made the rounds of the watering-places with their guests. They went to Newport, to Nahant, to Saratoga, and finally to Niagara. Never a confirmed to the fair Louisianian delighted his uncle; he described nothing better than the marriage of his two favorite, his right hand and his left declared himself blessed! Though a dashing, self-confident fellow, love had taught him humility, and he shrank from all but the little village bordering the great cataract he had found no eligible opportunity. She was a recognized belle, an heiress, and, as such, sought by hosts of admirers. At Niagara the desired occasion presented itself. Evil chance made the youngest brother a guest at the hotel.

Walking one August day, at sunset, in the woods of Goat Island, Silas beheld, in the path before him, two figures approaching earnestly. Stung by suspicion and jealousy to the perpetration of a meanness for which he loathed himself even while acting upon it, he slunk among the trees watching and following them. They went to the arbor which overlooks the foot-bridge leading to the Terrapin Tower and the cataract. This arbor is not latticed, but constructed of boards, hence the wretched listener, as he paused behind it, remained unobserved by those within. Indeed they thought little of him, of the world, or of any thing but each other's happiness. Mark had proposed, had been accepted.

How he spent the next three hours will never be known. He raved in after-years of the rush and roar of the rapids, of the moonlight on the water, the thunder of the cataract, and always of her and his brother, frequently misquoting the crime which then was uncommitted. It wanted an hour of midnight when he found himself at the foot of the Terrapin Tower, leaning on the handrail of the bridge, looking down at the Horse-shoe Fall. The night was very beautiful, and a pale lunar rainbow, like the ghost of a solar one, flickered and quivered and waned, now distinct, now indefinable, over the vortex below.

Presently he heard and recognized approaching footsteps, but did not turn his head until a hand was laid upon his shoulder and Mark stood beside him.

He had come to seek him. Flushed with happiness, possessed by a delicious unrest which made sleep impossible, on his fair companion's entering for the night he had inquired for his brother, and finding him at the hotel, returned to Goat Island. The place was a favorite haunt of Silas's nocturnally—it suited his disposition.

Mark was excitant, talkative; he admired the scene, rallied his brother on his liking for solitude, laughed, and clapped him on the shoulder. A sense of triumph, of exultation, had possessed his first glow of passionate devotion, and, like all men of sanguine temperament, he yearned for a friend to whom he could confide his secret. Silas knew this and what was coming, but dreaded the disclosure with a fear indescribable in its intensity—a fear, perhaps, the prophetic of the final result. As if to avoid it by a change of position, he strolled toward the platform of the tower, and reluctantly dropped from it to the rocks below. Mark followed him.

Very soon he came. With all his high-strung enthusiasm of an ardent nature, fired by success, Mark spoke of his happiness and of the future of love and prosperity before him, praising the goodness and loveliness of his chosen wife. His words were tender enough; but in place of the delicious humility characterizing the highest order of adoration of man for woman—for which makes it akin to religion in its infinitesimal estimate of the value of self, and consequently of the desired object—there was the mere transport of passion. Silas, listening with a sickened heart, contrasted it with that with which he loved her. He felt, with a pang of unutterable misery, how immeasurably higher he had rated her—how much lower his own pretensions.

He must have attempted at congratulating his brother, the manner of which might have excited surprise had the latter's high spirits admitted of any thing but the appropriation of his own felicity. Then Mark began to speak of her regard and respect for Silas, adding, jestingly, that she had professed to regret that, were his brother not the inevitable old bachelor, he should have been invited to congratulate him in the character of wife, and thus losing a wife in a sister-in-law.

The words were spoken idly, out of sheer lightness of heart, but fired Silas's brain and made him stagger as with vertigo. Might that have been? could he have won her? was he a wretched fool who had let the prize from him by his own act of avowing himself? It was all over now, and here was Mark erect and triumphant. He had leaped on a green bank at the verge of the cataract and was defying the cataract, declaring that he had dear cause to love life now—that he had never lived in sooth.

Then a dreadful temptation came into Silas's heart. Had he resisted it for one moment—had he paused to reflect, to repel the idea? Recall that urged him on, he might have conquered. But he did not. He set his teeth and a face in which passion, culminating into insanity, burned, had blanched to an awful whiteness, he rushed forward and, grasping his brother's shoulder, dashed at it. He was done in a second. Mark had no time to cry out before he found himself struggling in the horrible swift, smooth water and the current setting toward the edge of the cataract, but a few yards distance.

As he must over, his desperate grasp detained him momentarily on the very verge of the Fall, and the moonlight struck full on his countenance. Silas, still in the frenzy of his passion, gazed upon it. That look haunted him till his death-hour. So much of youth, and hope and strong life precipitated into sudden and fearful death—surprise, and agony, and a dreadful blending of shocked affection, summoning up all the fraternity of their past lives, and already spanning with it the future's contingencies—these and a thousand unutterable things were in that look. But for an instant; in another only the shudder of his own breast, answering like the voice of avenging God in the ear of the fratricide.

He was never suspected. No eyes but his had witnessed the deed, no heart distrusted him. The search for Mark's disappearance, the inquiry, the inquiry and search, the discovery and recognition of his body after many days' immersion, the general conclusion that he had stumbled into the rapids and been carried over the Fall by accident—all this the murderer endured and seemed to share, with much real grief, remorse, and compassion only those whose souls have received the black baptism of similar guilt can conceive. His misery was so great as to excite general remark and sympathy. She, who supposed it the counterpart of her own affliction—whose horror at the presumed cause of Mark's death could not be told—attempted to comfort him. When her drowned lover's body was committed to the earth Silas lay on a sick bed, ill of a fever, and raving.

They sent for his mother, from Connecticut, to nurse him—to watch over the expected daughter-in-law. Had delirium overtaken their patient he might have revealed his dreadful secret; but it never occurred, and if his words wandered to the subject of his brother's death, it was attributed to grief and mental prostration. When the summer ended, in accordance with the advice of his physician and the desire of his relatives, he accompanied her and her father to Louisiana. Change of scene, a few idle words, which had [illegible] crime, which he [illegible] vived, and he [illegible] succeeded the keen anguish attendant on the wreck of her hopes, and she inclined, at first pityingly and then tenderly, to the brother who seemed to mourn less so, whose affection for her appeared to grow up out of his grave. For he loved her still with a guilty, morbid passion, craving possession of that which had tempted him.

His uncle's decease by apoplexy, while it increased the sympathy of his Louisiana friends, made him a wealthy man. Her father favored his suit, and by early summer she returned to New York his wife once more. If she accepted him from a tender regard rather than any warmer feeling, she gave him all the affection she had to bestow, and in time came to love him dearly. Grave in aspect, exquisitely kind and considerate to all about her, her natures ennobled and purified by trial, her sorrow gradually transformed into a new duties and responsibilities opened upon her. She was all unconscious of the terrible tragedy in progress at her side.

Men thought her husband of singularly sombre, unhappy disposition that, apparently possessed of all that is desirable in life, his countenance and behavior should indicate so little appreciation of it. He was prosperous in business, honored and respected by his fellows, blessed with a fair and good woman to wife and obedient children, he had seemingly nothing to cloud his happiness but the recollection of a calamitous accident which the lapse of years might be supposed to have eradicated; yet no one could deny that in his face and over all him. It was never cheerful, even when turned to those he loved most. For a tremendous retribution was gathering slowly around him like a great and ever-increasing darkness—a darkness in which the light of reason waned and sank, and finally went out in utter despair and chaos. The terrible details, imperfectly derived from his subsequent ravings, can here be only faintly indicated.

It began in a slight change in his crime. The mental excitement and reaction of feeling succeeding the murder had produced sickness, and for every one remorse, affording him no rest or remission. He thought of the dead, in all its particulars of time and circumstance, with unspeakable misery impossible to be shaken off or lightened. If the body of his drowned brother had been continually before him, the sense of company for his daily walks, interposing its ghastly presence at his board, laying its drenched face on his pillow, and staring at him from every dark corner and nook of the night with that piteous, appealing look he remembered so well, he could not have been more constantly haunted. And this was to be varied only by the irrevocableness of the past. It seemed of all things horrible that there should be no possibility of undoing the deed.

Neither the cares of business nor the affection of his wife and children sufficed to afford him more than temporary relief. At times he distrusted their notice, and made wretched attempts at the appearance of gayety, which only deepened his unsuspected and habitual gloom. During the first years of their union she attributed it to grief at his brother's death, and exerted her earnest sympathy and kindness to win his confession of his sin, but effecting any mitigation of his misery, her health and spirits suffered. She began to fear for his sanity.

If he had been of coarser organization he might have rushed into dissipation; but his nature revolted from gross indulgences, and it was rendered additionally morbid and sensitive by guilt. Then, too, he loved her always. That was why he hid his secret. The fear of losing her—though her possession never gave him a tranquil moment—affected him in every relation of life, was the thought of the shameful death to which the confession of his crime might have exposed him. This withheld him also from the alternative of suicide—this, and a conviction that death would separate them forever; for his religious training had succumbed beneath the tremendous assaults of conscience, and he had returned to his first fear. He believed himself damned.

How dreadfully that idea took possession of him, to the exclusion of what little hope had lurked latent within him, his own imagination may conceive but not depict. Hour after hour, day after day, and night after night he pondered on it, always standing on the same spot—the verge of his inevitable destiny. His remorse, he thought, was not repentance: that involved confession and the acceptation of punishment, which he could not bring himself to undergo. So there remained for him, in the words of Scripture, nothing but "a fearful looking forward to judgment." His brother would confront him at the Great Day: she would know all then, and be caught up into heaven; and he would go away into torment. No hope, no forgiveness through all eternity!

This idea generated and culminated. He stood by the bedside of his dying father with no other thought than that he should suddenly consign the fratricide to deserved perdition who would be aware of his crime. He heard of his mother's death without a tear. In his home, on the mart, at church, he was a mere shadow and dread. He was tempted to proclaim his guilt aloud in crowded places, even to a shrinking avoidance of his kind, even of his wife and children. One of the latter resembled his murdered uncle in countenance and manner. His father was afraid of the boy; he would watch him secretly, slinking away when noticed. He almost dreaded that the child's face or words would indicate some preternatural knowledge of the deed.

Presently he began to mistake the fancies of his guilt-oppressed brain for realities. He would sit staring at the door as if he expected something to enter; would suppose he heard his brother's voice calling to him. But he, at this time, impelled by [illegible] imagination, make a journey in the [illegible] some of his crimes? His [illegible] needs, and he was [illegible] on a supposed [illegible]s tragedy [illegible]

One night in mid-summer, when the rain beat heavily on the roof and the thunder rolled and crashed overhead, he overwhelming apprehension of the impending end of the world he told her all. WALTER HARTRIGHT'S NARRATIVE CONTINUED.

V.

THE story of my first inquiries in Hampshire is soon told.

My early departure from London enabled me to reach Mr. Dawson's house in the forenoon. Our interview, so far as the object of my visit was concerned, led to no satisfactory result. Mr. Dawson's head was plowed when he had resumed his attendance on Miss Halcombe at Blackwater Park; but it was not possible to undertake back from the wife with any exactness, without such help from Mrs. Michelson as I knew she was unable to afford. She could not say from memory (who, in similar cases, ever can?) how many days had elapsed between the arrival of the Doctor's communication to Limmeridge and the previous departure of Lady Glyde. She was almost certain of having mentioned the circumstance of the departure to Miss Halcombe on the day after it happened—but then she was no more able to fix the date of the day on which this discovery took place than to fix the date of the day before, when Lady Glyde had left for London. Neither could she calculate, with any nearer approach to exactness, the time that had passed from the departure of her mistress to the period when the undated letter from Madame Fosco arrived. Lastly, as if to complete the series of difficulties, the Doctor himself, having been ill at the time, had omitted to make his usual entry of his visit in the day-book: and when the gardener from Blackwater Park had called on him to deliver Mrs. Michelson's message.

Hopeless of obtaining assistance from Mr. Dawson, I resolved to trust to myself alone to establish the date of Sir Percival's arrival at Knowlesbury. It seemed like a fatality! When I reached Knowlesbury, I found that every one of the hotel at the station had gradually absorbed the business; and the old inn (which we knew to be the inn at which Sir Percival had slept) had not been closed about two months since. The proprietor had left the town with all his goods and chattels, and no one knew where he had gone. I positively ascertain from any one. The four people of whom I inquired gave me four different accounts of his movements. It was not easy to get Knowlesbury.

There was still some hours to spare before the last train left for London; and I drove back again in a fly from the Knowlesbury station to Blackwater Park, with the intention of again questioning the gardener and the person who kept the lodge. If they, too, proved unable to assist me, my resources for the present were at an end, and I might return to town.

I dismissed the fly a mile distant from the park, and, proceeding on foot, encountered the driver, proceeded by myself to the house. As I turned into the lane from the high road I saw a man with a carpet-bag on his shoulder walking slowly, on the way to the lodge. He was a little man, dressed in shabby black, and wearing a remarkably large hat. I took no further on now (it was possible to judge) for a lawyer's clerk, and stopped at once to widen the distance between us. He had evidently come to the house on out of sight without looking back. When I entered through the gates myself, I felt a little more intelligent, and I managed to lead her into speaking of the manner of Sir Percival's departure, and of the time when it took place. She remembered her master calling her out of bed, and remembered his telling her afterwards of swearing; but the date at which the occurrence happened was, as she honestly acknowledged, quite beyond her.

On leaving the lodge I saw the gardener at work not far off. When I first addressed him he looked at me rather distrustfully; but on my using Mrs. Michelson's name, with a civil reference to himself, he entered into conversation readily enough. There is no need to describe what passed between us: it ended, as all my other attempts to discover the date had ended. The gardener knew that his master had driven away, at night, "some time in July, the last fortnight or the last ten days in the month"—and knew no more.

While we were speaking together I saw the man in black, with the large hat, come out from the house and stand at some little distance observing us.

Certain suspicions of his errand at Blackwater Park had already crossed my mind. They were now strengthened by the gardener's inability (or unwillingness) to tell me who the man was; and I determined to clear up the way before me, if possible, by speaking to him. The plainest question I could put, as a stranger, would be to inquire if the person in question were to be shown to visitors. I walked up to the man at once, and accosted him in those words.

His look and manner unmistakably betrayed that he knew who I was, and that he wanted to irritate me into quarreling with him. His reply was insolent enough to have answered the purpose, if I had been less determined to control myself. As it was, I met him with the most resolute politeness; apologized for my unintentional intrusion (which he called a "trespass"), and left the grounds. It was exactly as I suspected. The recognition of me, when Left Mr. Kyrle's office, had been evidently communicated to Sir Percival Glyde, and the man in black had been sent to the Park, in anticipation of my making inquiries at the house or in the neighborhood. If I had given him the least chance of lodging any sort of legal complaint against me, the interference of the local magistrate would no doubt have put a speedy end to account as a clog on my proceedings, and a means of separating me from Marian and Laura for some days at least.

I was pursued and watched on my way from Blackwater Park to the station, exactly as I had been watched in London the day before. But I could not help that—could not care, and I have never found out since, whether I was really followed on this occasion or not. The man in black might have had his own reasons for giving me at his disposal of which I was not aware; but I certainly saw nothing of him, in his own person, either on the way to the station or afterward on my arrival at the London terminus in the evening. I reached Gower Street on foot, taking the precaution, before I approached our own door, of walking round by the loneliest street in the neighborhood, first reconnoitering and looking back more than once over the open square behind me. I had first learned to use this stratagem against suspected rivals in the wilds of Central America—and now I was practicing it again with the same purpose and with even greater caution, in the streets of civilized London!

Nothing had happened to alarm Marian during my absence. She asked eagerly what success I had had in Hampshire. When I told her, she could not conceal her surprise at the indifference with which I spoke of the failure of my investigations at first.

The truth was that the ill success of my inquiries had in no sense daunted me. I had passed three days out of the seven of duty, and I had expected nothing from them. In the state of my mind at that time it was almost a relief to me to know that the task I had now narrowed to a trial of strength between myself and Sir Percival Glyde. The further I advanced the more I weighed itself all along with my other and better motives; and I confess it was a satisfaction to me to feel that the personal one was the only one left—of serving Laura's cause was to fasten my hold firmly on the villain who had married her. And I declare honestly, that I was not quite enough to keep my motives above the reach of this mixture of revenge. But I can honestly say that no base or selfish feeling of the change in her from her former self made the one interest of my love as warm in its tenderness and compassion, which her father or her brother might have felt, and which I felt, God knows, in my inmost heart. All hopes looked to further on now than to the day of her recovery. There, till she was strong again and happy again—there, till she could look at me as she had once looked, and speak to me as she had once spoken—the future of my happiest thoughts and my dearest wishes ended.

These words are written under no prompting of idle self-contemplation. Passages in this narrative are necessary which will set the minds of others in judgment on my conduct. It is right that the best and the worst of me should be fairly balanced before that time.

On the morning after my return from Hampshire I took Marian up stairs into my working-room, and there laid before her the plan that I had matured in the watches of the night, and the available point in the life of Sir Percival Glyde.

The way to the Secret lay through the mystery, hitherto impenetrable to all of us, of the Woman in White. The approach to that, in its turn, might be gained by obtaining the assistance of Anne Catherick's mother; and the only ascertainable means of prevailing on Mrs. Catherick to do so was to speak in the matter dependent on the chances of my discovering local particulars and family particulars, first of all, from Mrs. Clements. I had thought the subject over carefully, and I felt certain that the new inquiries could only begin, to any purpose, by my placing myself in communication with the faithful friend and protectress of Anne Catherick.

The first difficulty, then, was to find Mrs. Clements.

I was indebted to Marian's quick perception for meeting this necessity at once by the best and simplest means. She proposed to write to the farm near Limmeridge (Todd's Corner), to inquire whether Mrs. Clements had communicated with Mrs. Todd during the past few months. How Mrs. Clements had been separated from Anne it was impossible for us to say; but that separation once effected, it would certainly occur to Mrs. Clements to inquire after the missing woman in the neighborhood of all others to which she was known to be most attached—the neighborhood of Limmeridge. I saw directly that Marian's proposal offered us a means of success, and she wrote to Mrs. Todd accordingly by that day's post.

While we were waiting for the reply I made myself master of all the information Marian could afford on the subject of Sir Percival's family, and of his early life. She could only speak on these topics from hearsay, but she was reasonably certain of the truth of what little she had to tell.

Sir Percival was an only child. His father, Sir Felix Glyde, had suffered, from his birth, under a painful and incurable deformity, and had shunned all society from his earliest years. His sole happiness was in the enjoyment of money; and he had married a lady with tastes similar to his own, who was said to be a most accomplished musician. He inherited the deformity of his father while still a young man. Neither he nor his wife, after taking possession, made advances of any sort toward the society of the neighborhood, and no one endeavored to compel them into abandoning their reserve, with the one disastrous exception of the rector of the parish.

The rector was the worst of all innocent misfortunes—a clever, over-zealous man. He had heard that Sir Felix had left Cambridge with the character of being little better than a revolutionist in politics and an infidel in religion; and he arrived conscientiously at the conclusion that it was his bounden duty to summon the lord of the manor to the nearest sound view entertained in the parish church. Sir Felix fiercely resented the clergyman's well-meant but ill-directed interference, by keeping him so grossly and publicly that the families in the neighborhood sent letters of indignant remonstrance to the Park; and the rector remarks on the Baronet's property expressed their opinion as strongly as they dared. The baronet, who had no country tastes of any kind, and no attachment or to estate or to any one living on it, declared that society at Blackwater should never have a second chance of annoying him, and left the parish from that moment. After a short residence in London he and his wife departed for the Continent, and never returned to England again. They lived part of the time in France and part in Germany—principally in the latter country, in the strict retirement which the morbid sense of his own personal deformity had made a necessity to Sir Felix himself. Their only child had been born abroad, and had been educated there by private tutors. His mother was the first of his parents whom he lost. His father died about a few years after her, either in 1829 or 1830. Sir Percival had been in England, as a young man, once or twice before that time, but his acquaintance with the late Mr. Fairlie did not begin till after the time of his father's death. They were nearly of the same age, although Sir Percival was seldom, or never, at Limmeridge House in those days. Mr. Frederick Fairlie might have met him once or twice in Mr. Philip Fairlie's company, but he could have known little of him at that or any other time. Sir Percival's only intimate friend in the Fairlie family had been Laura's father.

These were all the particulars that I could gain from Marian. They suggested nothing which was useful to my present purpose; but I noted them down carefully, in the event of their proving to be of importance as any future period.

Mrs. Todd's reply (addressed, by our own wish, to a post-office at some distance from us) had arrived at its destination when I went to Limmeridge. By some chances, which were all against us hitherto, turned, from this moment, in our favor. Mrs. Todd's letter contained the first item of information of which I was in search.

Mrs. Clements, it appeared, had (as we had conjectured) written to Todd's Corner, asking pardon, in the first place, for the abrupt manner in which she had left Limmeridge, and thanks for the farm-house (on the morning after I had met the Woman in White in Limmeridge churchyard); and then informing Mrs. Todd of Anne's disappearance, and entreating that she would cause inquiries to be made in the neighborhood, on the chance that the fugitive might have strayed back to Limmeridge. In making this request Mrs. Clements had been careful to add to it the address at which she might always be heard of, and that address Todd now transmitted to Marian. It was in London, and within half an hour's walk of our own lodging.

In the words of the proverb, I was resolved to let the grass grow under my feet. The next morning I set forth to seek an interview with Mrs. Clements. This was my first step forward in the investigation. The issue of the desperate attempt to which I now stood committed begins here.

VI.

The address communicated by Mrs. Todd took me to a lodging-house situated in a respectable street near the Gray's Inn Road.

When I knocked the door was opened by Mrs. Clements herself. She did not appear to remember me, and asked what my business was. I recalled to her our meeting in Limmeridge church-yard, at the close of my interview there with the Woman in White, taking special care to remind her that I was the person who assisted Anne Catherick (as Anne had herself declared) to escape the pursuit from the Asylum. This was my only claim to the confidence of Mrs. Clements. She remembered the circumstance the moment I spoke of it, and asked me into the parlor in the greatest anxiety to know if I had brought her any news of Anne.

It was impossible for me to tell her the whole truth without at the same time entering into particulars on the subject of the conspiracy, which it would have been dangerous to confide to a stranger. I could only abstain most carefully from raising any false hopes, and then explain that the object of my visit was to discover the persons who were really responsible for Anne's disappearance. I even added, so as to exonerate myself from any after-reproach of my own conscience, that I entertained not the least hope of being able to trace her; that I believed we should never see her alive again; and that my main interest in the affair was to bring to punishment two men whom I suspected to be concerned in luring her away, and as whose hands I and some dear friends of mine had suffered a grievous wrong. With this explanation I left it to Mrs. Clements to say whether any interest in the matter (whatever difference there might be in the motives which actuated us) was not the same; and whether she felt any reluctance to forward my object by giving me such information on the subject of my inquiries as she happened to possess.

The poor woman was at first too much confused and agitated to understand thoroughly what I said to her. She could only reply that I was welcome to any thing she could tell me in return for the kindness I had shown to Anne. But as she was not very quick and ready, at the best of times, in talking to strangers, she would beg me to put her in the right way, and to say where I wished her to begin. Knowing by experience that the plainest narrative attainable from persons who are not accustomed to arrange their ideas is the narrative which goes far enough back at the beginning to avoid all misstatements of retrospection in its course, I asked Mrs. Clements to tell me first what had happened after she had left Limmeridge; and so, by watchful questioning, carried her on from point to point till we reached the period of Anne's disappearance.

The substance of the information which I thus obtained was as follows:

On leaving the farm at Todd's Corner Mrs. Clements and Anne had traveled that day as far as Derby, and had remained there a week on Anne's account. They had then gone on to London, and had lived in the lodging occupied by Mrs. Clements at that time for a month or more, when circumstances connected with this house and the landlord had obliged them to change their quarters. Anne's terror of being discovered in London or its neighborhood, whenever they ventured to walk out, had gradually communicated itself to Mrs. Clements, and she had determined on removing to one of the most out-of-the-way places in England, to the town of Clerimont, in Lincolnshire, where her deceased husband had passed all his early life. His relatives were respectable people settled in the town; they had always treated Mrs. Clements with great kindness; and she thought it impossible to do better than go there and take the advice of her husband's friends. Anne would not hear of returning to her mother at Welmingham, because she had been removed to the Asylum from that place, and because Sir Percival would be certain to go back there and find her again. There was serious weight in this objection, and Mrs. Clements felt that it was best to leave it removed.

At Grimsby the first serious symptoms of illness had shown themselves in Anne. They appeared soon after the news of Lady Glyde's marriage had been made public in the newspapers, and had reached her through that medium.

The medical man who was sent for to attend the sick woman discovered at once that she was suffering from a serious affection of the heart. The illness lasted long, left her very weak, and returned at intervals, though with mitigated severity, again and again. They remained at Grimsby in consequence all through the first half of the year; and before they might properly able have staid much longer but for the sudden resolution which Anne took at this time to venture back to Hampshire for the purpose of obtaining a private interview with Lady Glyde.

Mrs. Clements did all in her power to oppose the execution of this desperate and unreasonable project. No explanation of her motives was offered by Anne, except that she believed the day of her death was not far off, and that she had something on her mind which must be communicated to Lady Glyde, at any risk, in secret. Her resolution to accomplish this purpose was so firmly settled that she declared her intention of going to Hampshire by herself if Mrs. Clements felt any unwillingness to go with her. The doctor, on being consulted, was of opinion that serious opposition to her wishes would, in all probability, produce another and perhaps a fatal fit of illness; and Mrs. Clements, under this alarming prediction of results, and once more, with sad forebodings of trouble and danger to come, allowed Anne Catherick to have her own way.

On the journey from London to Hampshire Mrs. Clements discovered that one of their fellow-passengers was well acquainted with the neighborhood of Blackwater, and could give her all the information she needed on the subject of localities. In this way she found out that the only place they could go to which was not dangerously near to Blackwater Park was a large village called Sandon. The distance here from Blackwater Park was between three and four miles; and when Anne came back again Anne had walked on each occasion when she had appeared in the neighborhood of the lake.

For the few days during which they were at Sandon without being discovered they had lived a little away from the village, in the cottage of a decent widow woman who had a bedroom to let, and whose discreet silence Mrs. Clements had done her best to secure for the first week at least. She had also tried hard to induce Anne to be content with writing to Lady Glyde in the first instance. But the receipt of the warning contained in the anonymous letter sent to Limmeridge had made Anne resolute to speak this time, and nothing could shake her resolution to go on her errand alone.

Mrs. Clements nevertheless followed her privately on each occasion when she went to the lake, without, however, venturing near enough to the boat-house to be discovered in the first place there. When Anne returned for the last time from the dangerous neighborhood, the fatigue of walking, day after day, distances which were far too great for her strength, added to the exhausting effect of the agitation from which she had suffered during the whole time which Mrs. Clements had dreaded all along. The old pain over the heart and the other symptoms of the disease had returned upon her, and Anne was confined to her bed in the cottage.

In this emergency the first necessity, as Mrs. Clements knew by experience, was to endeavor to quiet Anne's anxiety of mind; and for this purpose the good woman declared she was ready to the like to try if she could find Lady Glyde (who would be sure, as Anne said, to be her daily walk to the boat-house), and prevail on her to come back privately to the cottage here boat-house. On reaching the outskirts of the plantation Mrs. Clements encountered not Lady Glyde, but a tall, stout, elderly gentleman with a book in his hand—in other words, Count Fosco.

The Count, after looking at her very attentively for a moment, asked if she expected to see any one in that place; and added, before she could reply, that he was waiting there with a message from Lady Glyde, but that he was not quite certain whether the person then before him answered the description of the person with whom he was desired to communicate. Upon this Mrs. Clements at once confided her errand to him, and entreated that he would help to allay Anne's anxiety by trusting his message to her. The Count most readily and kindly complied with her request. The message, he said, was a most important one. Lady Glyde entreated Anne and her good friend to return immediately to London, as she felt certain that Sir Percival would discover them if they remained any longer in the neighborhood of Blackwater. She was herself going to London in a short time, and if Mrs. Clements and Anne would go there first, and would let her know what their address was, they should hear from her and see her as a fortnight or less. The Count added that he had already attempted to give a friendly warning to Anne herself, but that she had been too much startled by seeing him at all to understand what he said to her. He was a stranger to let him approach and speak to her.

To this Mrs. Clements replied in the greatest alarm and distress, that she asked nothing better than to take Anne safely to London; but that she had not the least hope of removing her from the dangerous neighborhood, as she lay ill in her bed at that moment. The Count inquired if Mrs. Clements had sent for medical advice; and hearing that she had hitherto hesitated to do so, from the fear of making their position publicly known in the village, informed her that he was himself a medical man, and that he would go back with her, if she pleased, and see what could be done for Anne. Mrs. Clements (feeling a natural confidence in the Count, as a person trusted with a secret message from Lady Glyde) gratefully accepted the offer, and they went back together to the cottage.

Anne was awake when they got there. The Count started at the sight of her (evidently from astonishment at her resemblance to Lady Glyde). Mrs. Clements supposed that he was only shocked to see how ill she was. He would not allow her to be awakened; he was contented with putting questions to Mrs. Clements about her symptoms, with looking at her, and with lightly touching her pulse. Sandon was a large village, and one of the widow's old druggists shop in it; and thither the Count went to write his prescription for the medicine which he made up. He brought it back himself, and told Mrs. Clement that the medicine was a powerful stimulant, and that it would certainly give Anne strength to get up and bear the fatigue of a journey to London of only a few hours. The remedy was to be administered at stated times on that day and on the day after. On the third day she would be well enough to travel; and he would himself escort Mrs. Clements at the Blackwater station, and to see them off by the mid-day train. If they did not appear he would understand that Anne was worse, and would proceed at once to the cottage.

As events turned out, however, no such emergency as this arose. The medicine had an extraordinary effect on Anne, and the good results of it were helped by the assurance Mrs. Clements was able to give her that she would soon see Lady Glyde in London. At the appointed day and time (when they had not heard from the Count by a week in Hampshire altogether) they arrived at the station. The Count was waiting there for them, and was followed by an elderly lady, who appeared to be going to travel by the train to London also. He most kindly assisted them, and put them into the carriage himself, begging Mrs. Clements not to forget to send her address to Lady Glyde. The elderly lady got in at the same compartment, and they did not notice what became of her on reaching the London terminus. Mrs. Clements secured comfortable lodgings in a quiet neighborhood, and then wrote, as she had engaged to do, to inform Lady Glyde of the address.

A little more than a fortnight passed, and no answer came.

At the end of that time a lady (the same elderly lady whom they had seen at the station) called at the house, and said that she came from Lady Glyde, who was then at a hotel in London, and who wished to see Mrs. Clements for the purpose of arranging a private interview with Anne. Mrs. Clements expressed her willingness (Anne being present at the time, and entering into the plan) to forward the object in view, especially as she was not required to be away from the house for more than half an hour at the most. She and the elderly lady (clearly Madame Fosco) then left in the cab. The lady stopped the cab, after it had driven some distance, at a shop, before they got to the hotel, and begged Mrs. Clements to wait for her for a few minutes, while she made a purchase that had been forgotten. She never appeared again.

After waiting some time Mrs. Clements became alarmed, and ordered the coachman to drive back to her lodgings. When she got there, after an absence of rather more than half an hour, Anne was gone.

The only information to be obtained from the people of the house was derived from the servant who waited on the lodgers. She had opened the door to a boy from the street, who had left a letter for "the young woman who lived on the second floor" (the part of the house which Mrs. Clements occupied). The servant had delivered the letter, had then gone down stairs, and five minutes afterward had observed Anne open the front door and go out dressed in her bonnet and shawl. She had probably taken the letter with her, for it was not to be found, and it was therefore impossible to tell what inducement had been offered to make her leave the house. It must have been a strong one, for she would never stir out alone in London of her own accord. If Mrs. Clements had not known this by experience, nothing would have induced her to go away in the cab, even for so short a time as half an hour only.

As soon as she could collect her thoughts the first idea that naturally occurred to Mrs. Clements was to go and make inquiries at the Asylum, to which she dreaded that Anne had been taken back.

She went there the next day—having been informed of the locality in which the house was situated by Anne herself. The answer she received (her application having, in all probability, been made a day or two before the false Anne Catherick had really been consigned to safe keeping in the Asylum) was, that no such person had been brought back there. She had then written to Mrs. Catherick, at Welmingham, to know if she had seen or heard any thing of her daughter, and had received an answer in the negative. After that reply had reached he she was at the end of her resources, and per fectly ignorant where else to inquire, or what else to do. From that time to this she had remained in total ignorance of the cause of Anne's disappearance, and of the end of Anne's story.

A SHARK! A SHARK!

It is rather better than fifteen years since I left Liverpool in the good ship Wellington. She was a poor tub of a thing, could neither "run" nor "beat," and she stunk of molasses enough to knock you down, and swarmed with cockroaches into the bargain. She was, in short, "a sugar ship" bound to Jamaica.

We had six passengers on board: two young men of the name of Perkins, going out as bookkeepers; Mrs. Bedford and a daughter just grown up; a young man of the name of Andrews, and myself.

Mrs. Bedford was the wife of a merchant in Kingston; Arthur Andrews was an ensign in the —th, at that time in Jamaica; and I was coming out here as book-keeper at Smiling Valley, where I have been ever since.

Ellen Bedford was a beautiful girl—tall, graceful, and lady-like. It is scarcely necessary to say that we four young men were all charmed with her the first day she made her appearance on deck, which was not till after the pilot had subsided. In this she was quite right, I think; no amount of personal charms could stand their ground against the ravages of sea-sickness.

We were all ready to jump down each other's throats a dozen times a day, as to who should sit by her at dinner, at breakfast, at supper; who should accompany her in her walk on deck; who should fetch her work, her book, et cetera, et cetera. We could not all be continually with her, as we each wanted to be; and as for any one having his right, or rather, what he considered his right, it wasn't thought of: we were all far too selfish for that.

So things went on for nearly a month—Mrs. Bedford always smiling, and civil to all of us. She was so much obliged for the use we made of her dear daughter," she said; especially civil and polite she was to me, and to the two Perkins: to Arthur Andrews she scarcely spoke, so little indeed that I quite felt for him sometimes; for he was as attentive to Ellen as we were, and deserved, I thought, quite as much praise from the old lady. He, however, did not seem to feel the neglect in the least. Ha! ha! what a blind fool I was, to be sure!

We had made a capital passage, considering the old tub we were in, so far; but now the wind failed us altogether, and for six days we never had steerage way on the ship. Round and round on her head she slowly swung, according to the currents, but never a foot did she forge ahead for six days. Have you ever been becalmed for a week in 68° W. long., and between 18° and 20° N. lat.?—in short, off the Island of St. Domingo or Hayti? If you have, then you possibly remember how the sun r all awnings at defiance; how it beat through ev thing, and turned up every thing; how the pi stuck to your feet as you walked the deck, in s of "wet swabs" and buckets of water; how y were forced below when the sun was vertic grilling heat be too great for human n withstand, and when you took long day, "of darkness" was as refreshing to the eyes as ever was draught of water to a thirsty soul.

It was on just such a night as I have faintly and most imperfectly attempted to describe that we were all assembled upon the deck of the Wellington. Mrs. Bedford was knitting: she could knit as well by moonlight as by candle-light, or, for the matter of that, without any light at all, I believe. Her usual smile of content was on her "take it easy" countenance. That term suits to exactly the expression of her placid face that I can not but use it. Ellen was talking and laughing with Robert and James Perkins. Arthur Andrews was leaning over the side, "whistling for a wind;" and I was looking at Ellen under the pleasing delusion that no one saw me. Presently I arose and strolled toward the spot where Andrews was standing, still whistling, apparently with an unoccupied mind and a heart at ease. Arthur Andrews was dark, tall, and handsome; he was also clever and agreeable. To none of these advantages could either of the Perkinses or myself lay the slightest claim. I was not the hard-grained chap in these days that I am now; sun and sorrow have burned and seamed my face since then; but I was never a beauty or a wit; and as to the two Perkinses, they were both of them thick-set, uncouth fellows, and as stupid as owls—worse, for they were always giggling, which owls are not. It was, therefore, not surprising that at first starting Arthur should have distanced us all hollow. Ellen evidently and unmistakably liked him best; how could she help it? He had it all his own way: we three blockheads still fluttering about her like moths round a candle. It's an old, threadbare simile, I know, but there is no better one invented that I ever heard of.

"What are you looking at, Arthur?" I said.

"Sharks," he replied; "don't you see them?"

I saw there was something moving in the water close to the side of the vessel, but I could not see what it was: I said so.

"Look more attentively and you will see their fins and tails—there! there! can't you see them now?"

His exclamations brought the others to his side, all except Ellen—where was she? Ha! I caught sight of the skirt of her white dress as she disappeared below. My heart beat loud and fast; now was my time, when they were all watching the sharks.

I hurried down the companion-ladder; I turned my head as I descended, hoping that I had managed to slip away unperceived. Ellen had gone to her cabin, no doubt; I must wait. Presently I heard her cabin door open, and footsteps approaching; it was too dark to distinguish features, but the figure was enough. She came quite close to me; she was going on deck again.

"Ellen," I whispered.

"Who's there? Is that you, Arthur?" she said, softly.

Oh, fool that I was, not even then to have my eyes opened.

I was preparing to follow her, when a hand was laid on my shoulder. I started violently.

"Who is that?" I cried.

"Gordon," said a voice in my ear which at once I knew was Arthur's, "I have seen your attention to Ellen, and it is only frank to tell you that she is engaged to me. For reasons unnecessary to explain to you, we thought it advisable to keep our ...t present."

...ny feelings on this ...ll, and all my ...o Arthur ...any thing. But his generous spirit had attached me to him, and I felt that he had acted kindly as well as frankly in telling me how matters stood. I needed not to explain to him that if I had given him any uneasiness it was unconsciously on my part. The warm grasp of his hand knit me the more to him in true friendship.

I had no heart to go on deck again that night, so I turned in.

Early in the morning Arthur came, and, in his usual frank way, without taking any notice of what had passed the previous night, asked if I would come and have a bathe, as he had got leave to go out in the Captain's gig. Too glad to show that no ill-feeling toward him remained, I said, "All right; I will follow you on deck directly." When I reached the deck, towel in hand, I found Arthur trying to persuade the mate of the watch to let him have the Captain's gig. It seems that though the Captain had told Arthur he might take his gig, he had not spoken to the mate on the subject.

"Captain Parks has given strict orders to the men not to bathe on any account whatever; and right enough too, for the sea is alive with sharks," I heard the mate say.

"Well, well, we won't bathe, then," replied Arthur, impatiently; "but as we are up we might as well have a pull; perhaps we might 'turn a turtle.' Oh! here is Gordon. Banks says we shall be devoured by sharks if we bathe, so we had best give that up, but it's a splendid morning for a pull —what do you say?"

"I should like a pull, of all things."

"I leave you both behind you, then," said Banks, who was a 'cute Yorkshireman; "you can turn a turtle without towels, I expect."

Arthur laughed, shucked his towel on to the capstan, and looking over the side and saying, "The oars are in the gig, I see; come along, Gordon," he lowered himself into the boat. I placed my towel alongside of his and followed him; but I could not joke and be merry as he could: I was sad at heart, and I suppose showed it by my countenance; for Banks observed, as he cast off the painter, "I don't think Mr. Gordon seems as fond of turtle-turning as you are, Mr. Andrews; he looks as solemn as a judge passing sentence of death." I don't suppose that remark improved my appearance. I did not speak; neither did Arthur, who was busily employed shipping the tiller, and perhaps did not hear it. "Will you steer, or shall I?" he said, without looking up. "You," I replied; "I never steer straight."

He showed off from the ship; I drew a pair of sculls out from the bottom of the boat and pulled over the calm, placid surface of the sleeping sea.

We talk of "stillness" on land; but no one can realize the true meaning of the word who has not experienced the stillness of the sea. It was too early for any one to be stirring on board the Wellington: the watch was slumbering on the deck; the mate alone showed signs of vitality, though not very demonstrative signs; for he was standing motionless by the capstan with out towels in his hand. Not a ripple broke the superfect stillness: the dash of my sculls turning in the row-locks and dipping in the water, alone broke the silence which reigned above, beneath, around us. By this time the eastern heard was ruddy with the approach of day—ruddy, ay, bloody was the more appropriate term: the whole eastern horizon glowed with a deep, red, sanguine hue, such as I had never seen before. And now the sun rises above the sea-line, blinding me with a flood of golden light.

When we were close to the ship, returning from an hour's pull, in stepping over the "thwart" I stumbled against a loose "stretcher;" tried to recover my balance, stumbled still worse, caught my foot in the coils of the "painter," and was pitched head-foremost into the sea, clutching the gun'ale as I went over, and pretty nearly upsetting the boat. When I rose to the surface, and again caught hold of the gun'ale, I saw Arthur in the same predicament as myself, on the other side of the gig.

"A pretty mess you have made of it," he said, as he wiped the salt-water out of his eyes with the back of his hand. "Come, climb back again while I steady her; as soon as you are in, do the like for me, and I'll follow you."

I soon managed to get back into the boat, Arthur hanging on the other side to keep her on an even keel: that accomplished, I sat upon the starboard gun'ale. "Now, then! in with you," I said; "remember there are sharks in these seas."

The words were scarcely out of my mouth when I saw the fin of a shark above the water, not ten yards from the boat. It was not stationary, but darting with terrible swiftness straight at Arthur.

"Jump in!" I shouted, "jump!—a shark is coming at you!"

He raised himself instantly as high out of the water as he could; his body was already on a level with the gun'ale—another moment and he would be safe—but that moment was denied him. I saw his danger, but I could not help him. Had I quitted my place to pull him in, he would have fallen back into the sea, and I must have followed him. On came the shark like a flash of lightning. I saw his white belly, as he turned to seize his victim. I saw his open jaws. I saw his cruel gleaming teeth as he raised his terrible head out of the water. A cry of agony, a look of despair, and Arthur is torn from his hold; I start forward just in time to save myself from falling in on the other side. Never, never shall I forget that last despairing look as he was drawn down beneath the surface, grasping frantically at the air, struggling hard for life, but struggling in vain.

And now a scene was enacted, if possible still more dreadful than that of his death. The sea was suddenly alive with sharks; the water boiled and foamed as they darted hither and thither, fighting for their food. At the side of the ship stood Ellen, pale and motionless, while her beloved Arthur was being torn to pieces and devoured before her eyes. True, she could not see the actual tragedy which was going on beneath the waves; but she had beheld him torn from the boat, and the rushing of the voracious animals to and fro in the smooth water told its own hideous tale. Pale, motionless, and speechless she stood, till the horrible repast was over, and the sea ceased to be agitated by the fierce cannibals of the deep; then, without a word, or even a groan, she fell as though she were shot. We had all been so horrified and awe-struck by the dreadful scene we were witnessing, that no one had the presence of mind to remove her from the harrowing sight: she saw it all.

She died raving mad before sunset that day.

SHAH NOSHIRWAN, KING OF PERSIA.

IN Persia, in olden time, lived a great king.
Whose name was Shah Noshirwan:
'Twas his custom, whenever he heard a good thing.
To say, "Zeh!" and his treasurer then would fling
A purse to the fortunate man.

This king, when out hunting on one fine day,
Saw an aged man planting trees:
He rode up, and said, "Wish your hair as gray,
Don't you think you are throwing your time away?
You'll never eat food from these!"

"For threescore years I have eaten sweet food
From trees that I did not sow;
And would it not be base ingratitude
If I took no thought of posterity's good,
And paid not the debt I owe?"

"Zeh, zeh!" said the king; and the treasurer straight
To the old man a purse doth throw.
"See, see! for good works it is never too late;
God hath given me fruit without needing to wait,
Before all my trees are sown."

"Zeh, zeh!" once again: ere the word was said,
Another purse flew on its way.
"Till God pierced the crown on your Majesty's head,
Was such a strange thing ever heard of, or read,
As to reap two crops in one day?"

"Zeh, zeh!" yet again, and a third full purse
To the old man's hand falls nigh;
But the king in his heart's frank drives his spurs,
Nor waits for more answer in prose or in verse—
Let the wit of that old man, so prompt, so terse,
Should drain his full treasury dry.

CHAPTER XX.

BUSINESS.

THE business which Captain Brand alluded to when he was about to partake of breakfast with his friend the Padre, was, in the first instance, to arrange some matters in the way of payment of debts to his compadre, Don Ignacio Sanchez, Commander of the Colonial Guarda Costa felucca Ponchita.

Accordingly, when he rose from table, and after a whispered dialogue and reports as to the state of affairs in and around the Den and Island from the men at the signal-stations, he summoned Pedillo. When that worthy appeared below the veranda—for he it remembered that Captain Brand never permitted the inferior officials of his hand to pollute his apartments, without perhaps, as in the case of his deceased subordinate, Master Gibbs, it was on urgent business—Captain Brand ordered his gig manned.

Pedillo threw up his hand in token of assent, and walked down to the brink of the basin to execute the command. Then, after a few minutes, Captain Brand lit a cigar, dismissed the Padre, put on his fine white Panama straw-hat, unlocked a strong cabinet with a secret drawer, glanced over a paper before him, and making a rapid calculation, fine white Panama straw-hat, unlocked a strong cabinet with a secret drawer, glanced over a paper before him, and making a rapid calculation, fine white Panama straw-hat, unlocked a strong cabinet with a secret drawer, glanced over a paper before him, and making a rapid calculation, fine white Panama straw-hat, unlocked a strong cabinet with a secret drawer, glanced over a paper before him, and making a rapid calculation, a heavy bag of doubloons and left the house in charge of Babette. The Captain always told his guests that his fellows had such love and respect for him that he rarely locked up his property, and never placed a guard at his door. The truth was, that his fellow-scoundrels, miscreants, and villains as they were—stood in such fear and dread of their leader that they were glad to keep out of his way. Moreover, he never boasted or made any display before them, living, on shipboard as on shore, by himself, but always ready and terrible when the moment came for striking or seizing his crew, too, with the most rigid impartiality, adhering strictly to his promises and compacts with them, and never overlooking an offense.

So Captain Brand left his dwelling in charge of his dumb housekeeper, Babette, and tripping down the rope ladder from the piazza, in a clean suit of brown linen and straw slippers, his headless face shaded by his broad-rimmed hat from the sun, and the bag of gold on his arm, he jauntily walked toward the cove.

"Ah! good-morning, my Doctor! Glad to meet you! How are the sick? Doing well, I hope?"

"Quite well, Sir; but I was about to call upon you in relation to the conversation we had last evening, and—"

"Pardon me, Monsieur le Docteur, but I have been very busy this morning, and am now going to see Don Ignacio on matters of importance—here the elegant Pirate took the cigar from his thin lips and held it daintily between his thumb and forefinger in the air—"but not now, Monsieur, I am very sorry to miss your visit. But," he added, with one of his usual smiles, "I shall be at leisure this afternoon, and will be cool of the evening we can take a stroll. What say you?"

The Doctor nodded.

"Apropos, Doctour, suppose we have a little game of cards afterward at your quarters? I never permit gaming in mine, you know. The Padre will not object; and I am confident our companion, the Teufel, will be delight—"

"As you please, Captain," replied the medico, with a cold, indifferent air and averted face. "I will join you in the promenade, and I shall be ready to receive you in the evening."

"Hasta luego, amigo!" said Captain Brand, as he again stuck his cigar between his teeth, waved his hand in adieu, and walked to his boat.

"You don't love me, Doctor," thought the Pirate; "I don't fear you, Captain," thought the Doctor.

It was a touch of high art the way this notorious pirate pitched the bag of gold toward his coxswain, crying, "Catch that, Pedillo!" and then the sharp, pellish manner in which he watched about the beach and held up his trousers, so that he might not even get his slippers damp. Had that silver bag been solid lead he could not have cared if his feet had been soaked in it. And then, too, the little exclamation of joy when he finally entered into the stern-sheets and sat down beneath the awning, while he stretched his smooth brown-linen legs out on the cushions.

Oh, it was clearly a touch of high piratical art.

"The old Centipede is looking a little rusty after her late cruise, Pedillo!" throwing his head back to evoke a curl of smoke, and which his cold eyes like a rattle of icy hail at the coxswain. "But I am glad Pedro took your place—puff, puff—that knife-stab prevented you, of course"—puff—" and we shall have her all tight and trig again in a day or two."

"Si, Señor," said Pedillo, respectfully; "and how goes Señor Gibbs, Capitano?"

The Captain rolled his eyes again at the coxswain, and replied, carelessly, "Why, Pedillo, our friend Gibbs came to see me when the Centipede had arrived, but almost before"—puff—"he had given me an account of his unfortunate cruise he fell down in a fit. The fact is, however"—puff, puff—"that, what with hard drinking and inflammation which set in on the stump of his lost leg, he has been in a very bad way"—puff—"quite in a dangerous condition indeed, requiring all my old Babette's care and attention"—puff—"but this morning the good Padre went to see him, and he told me a while ago that he left him without fever, and altogether tranquil."

Pedillo's wry mustaches twirled of themselves.

Meanwhile the boat skimmed lightly over the basin, and as the Captain ceased speaking she ran alongside of the felucca. Don Ignacio, with his bright sword-eye in full battle-array, and with a cigarrito between his wrinkled lips, was on the deck of that vessel to receive his visitor; and as he saw the coxswain follow his supposed via a weighty bag under his arm, his glimmering orb became brighter, if possible—as if it was piercing through the thick canvas of the bag, and counting, once by ounce, the contents—and putting out his forefinger, it was grasped cordially by the white hand of Captain Brand.

"Como se va? How goes it with my compadre? Stomach and head all clear after our long dinner of yesterday?"

The compadre said that his head was particularly clear that morning, and as for his stomach he had not yet inquired; but if the Capitano had any doubts as to the former proposition, he had better step below and decide for himself! In accordance with this ambiguous invitation the visitor and commander disappeared down a small scuttle in the after part of the fiscara, where was a low, stifling hole of a cabin, dank with stale tobacco smoke, and smelling swiftly of rats and roaches. There was a little round table in the middle, and on one side was a single berth, with some dirty bedding, which had not been cleaned, apparently, since the vessel was built. Light was shed from a skylight above.

Captain Brand gave a sniff of disgust as he entered this floating sanctum of Don Ignacio; but without remark seated himself on a canvas stool, and waved a perfumed cambric kerchief before his nose.

Commander Sanchez, catching the inspiration, merely observed that it was a little close certainly, and not so specious as the superb cabin of the schooner, and that sometimes, when lying in a calm off the lee side of Cuba it was hot enough to melt the tail off a brass monkey; but yet it was his duty, and he did not particularly mind it. Hereupon Captain Brand requested Don Ignacio to produce his papers, and they were presently laid upon the table. For a few minutes the Pirate was employed in running his cold eyes over the accounts—making pencil-notes on the margins, and comparing them with a memorandum he took from his pocket; but at last he threw himself back and exclaimed,

"Caramba, my dear friend, Don Ignacio, at the Havana, is correct to a real—three hundred and twelve doubloons and eight hard dollars. Ours, however, is correct to a maravedi—one double commissions charged here and there; all losses on sales charged to me, and all profits credited to you."

Don Ignacio spread out the palms of both his hands toward his companion, as if to exercise such unjust charges from his brain.

"O si, si, compadre! it is as I state, and you know it is true; but, nevertheless, a few dozens of ounces more or less of gold is of no importance, say, to make short work, I am ready to pay. But," said Captain Brand, laying a hand on the heavy bag of money beside him, "I am not quite ready to cancel my debts in hard cash here on the spot, yet, as I am bound on a long cruise—a thirteen only knows where—I would prefer to keep the gold and pay you in something else."

Don Ignacio threw back his head and shut his eye like a parrot on the Captain, waiting to hear further.

"What have I on hand besides gold? Well there are a few bales of Mexican cochineal and some cases of French silks, which you can have at a fair market value; besides, I to all that collection of silver table-service, which you can take by weight; and, besides, lots of rare furniture, which you may have for a song upon—all together much more than enough to pay Monezo and you both. What say you, compadre? it is a bargain or shall I speak myself with me, and run the chance of disposing of it on the Spanish Main?"

It was a long time before the greedy old Spaniard could make up his mind whether to receive his pay in cash or merchandize; surveyed, or take more bulky matter, with the hope of making double the money by the operation. Finally, however, his avaricious nature got the ascendence, and he accepted the last proposition, with the understanding that the articles should be transferred to shore with all convenient dispatch.

"Ah!" said Captain Brand, with another sniff of disgust, as he spat on the dirty floor of the cabin, "I am glad to get rid of you for I wouldn't remain another hour in this filthy hole for all the money—you have cheated me out of you old rascal."

He said the last portion of this sentence to himself, as he emerged from the cuddy.

"But listen, mine friend," continued, as they both reached the deck. "You will give me duplicate receipts on the part of Señor Moreno, so that I can present them to him on the next port I visit. And, by-the-way, suppose you come on shore this afternoon for a stroll, and in the evening we will have a little game at monte —eh?"

"Cierto! certainly!" returned the commander of the felucca; when Captain Brand, with his bag of gold intact under his arm, got into his boat, and was pulled to the shore.

CHAPTER XXI.

TREASURE.

It was long past noon when the Pirate returned to his island home, and the day was hot, for the sea-breeze had not made, and the tropical sun was pouring down its burning rays until the sand was roasting as in a furnace; the very rocks throwing off a tremulous heat into the next air, and the lagoon almost boiling under the fiery influence. The sailors, with aching heads and parched mouths, were reclining in their grass hammocks beneath the sheds; and save the watchful vigilance of the men at the lookouts and batteries, all was quiet and wrapped in repose. Captain Brand, however, was as cool as a cucumber; and regardless of the heat, and indifferent about siesta, he drew the contains of the saloon, and took some active exercise. First, however, he desired his faithful Babette to get out some refreshments, and open the contents of his splendid wardrobe. This operation was performed under the critical eye of Captain Brand himself, who, in his peculiarly lent his aid by stowing away, here and there, his cascades, trinkets, and ornaments—those which had been presented to him by the unfortunate people who had the ill luck to make his acquaintance in the course of his late midnight forays on shore. Then the Captain opened and rummaged cabinets, bureaux, and bookcases—making liberal presents to his trusty housekeeper; and turning from that occupation, he had all of his table furniture spread before him, when he made careful examination of the value of the silver, and china, and glass. This concluded, Captain Brand ordered Babette to furnish him a slight repast; and while he came out he bore heavy burdens in his muscular arms, all of which he laid conveniently near the trap in the floor. Then letting the hatch swing softly down, he lowered the heavy articles by the silk rope, as he had Master Gibbs, though not so suddenly; going down himself as nimbly as a rat after them. In the vault beneath, Captain Brand struck a light and set fire to a torch, which blazed out lurid-ly, and illumined the dark excavation and passages like day. Going slowly on, with his burden in his arms, by the path by which he visited the Padre, he came to the outer door, which opened into the fosse in the crag; and after depositing his load there he was raised, and he passed out. Once outside, he felt his way cautiously, stepping over the stagnant pools for a breath, and guarding his head from the jagged rocks above; and then, lighting his way over the stones and along the trunks of the snake and lizard. Where the narrow fissure seemed to end by a wall of natural rock, the Pirate rolled aside a large stone and put his face, and scrambling away the sand, a large copper lock was displayed, in which, after pushing aside the cover, he inserted a key and turned a spring, and it opened. Then, exerting all the force of his powerful muscles, a section of the unhewn rock yielded to the effort, and rose like a vertical door slung by a massive hinge at the top. Placing the large stone at the entrance so as to prevent the slab falling to its place, the Captain stood the torch within the opening, and went back for his burden; then he entered and squeezed himself with it into a small excavated, uneven chamber, where he sat down.

"Now," he communed the Pirate with himself, "but a safe place to lay up a penny for a rainy day! Let me see. These two bags of doubloons are mine, and the one my Gibbs brought me, with those three there of guineas, and those sacks of dollars, will make about ten thousand pounds. That will make me a handsome egg when I retire from the profession and return to Europe, where I will have forgotten all my boyish follies by that time."

Captain Brand alluded to forging his father's name, and other little peccadilloes of a similar nature.

"And I may be elected to Parliament—who knows? It is the ambition of a risk, perhaps, to leave all this pretty coin here; but then it's a greater risk to carry it in the schooner"—he argued further with himself—"and then, again, there does not decay pure metal. But," thought Captain Brand, "suppose somebody should discover this hiding-place of mine? It is not very probable, for no soul besides myself knows of it, and even the very man who made the door did not know what it was intended; besides, he died and was buried long ago."

Captain Brand had forgotten, in this connection, that the man who cut out the stone chamber and door, and fashioned the hinge and lock, took too much sugar in his coffee morning and the job was finished, and died in horrible convulsions before night. Oh yes, that incident had entirely escaped the memory!

Captain Brand having now thoroughly reasoned the matter out, gave each of the bags lying on the floor a kick to get a responsive echo from the coin; and then creeping out of the treasure chamber, he withdrew the torch, removed the stone and the heavy slab fell again into its place. Then clasping the lock, covering it over with sand, and rolling back the stone, he seized the torch quickly returned to the vault beneath his saloon. There, putting out the torch by rubbing it against the stone pavement with the sole of his foot, he was straight, streaming through the loopholes around, he passed to one side and began removing the ocean of rugs, mats, and cushions, that, near to the strongly-barred portcullis door, which opened toward the sea, covered a trap-opening. In a hard work, but Captain Brand seemed to enjoy it; and even after he had arranged the packages between the bars of the portcullis he engaged in a task he began again. Going to the farther corner of the vault, he stopped before a strong mahogany chest, and opening his pockets, he filled it unlocked and threw it wide open. It was no black as night inside, floored and lined with wood, and filled with a choking atmosphere of charcoal and sulphur. Pulling out the walls were some fifty or a hundred small barrels with copper hoops and covered in the sea-locks in the word "Powder." Unmindful of the odor and the rather combustible nature of his cargo, Captain Brand proceeded to unseal his work, and rolled a large number of the little barrels toward the open chest, the merchandise already there, saying to himself the while,

"I think that will about fill the Centipede's magazine, and I cannot make a proper disposition of the remainder."

Hereupon Captain Brand, actively bent upon the judicious disposal of his treasures, rolled out a dozen or two more of the little barrels. Strange to say, among the very few articles that lines were not scattered about him, but casually left of Señor Moreno, was this highly useful material of powder; and he therefore set much store by it. And it was with a sigh that the Pirate stood the little barrels on their ends in a line across the great vault of the building, beneath kitchen, bedrooms, and saloon, and especially beside the square upright stanchions on which the interior of the building rested. Not contented with this, he took a copper hammer and knocked in all the heads of the little barrels, and then, with a scoop of the same metal, he dipped out large quantities of the black material and poured thick trains of it from barrel to barrel, sometimes capsizing one, but always particularly cautious not to drop a grain of it beneath his grass slippers and the pavement. Then he took a piece of match-rope, and sticking one end deep into a barrel, he just poked the other end out of a loophole, to be in readiness whenever Captain Brand should deem proper to touch the lighted end with fire.

"There," said Captain Brand, "that piece of rope will burn about thirty or forty minutes, and then stand clear from under!"

Ascending the hatchway again with the agility of a cat, he clambered up and secured the trap, and in ten minutes afterward he was busily attired in a nice pair of India pajammers, a grass cloth jacket and vest, and a panama hat, with cigar-case, nick-nacks in his pockets—and seated at table, where his busy housekeeper had placed a broiled chicken and a bottle of old Bordeaux before him.

The Washboard Entirely Dispensed with.

The Cataract Washing Machine.

Simple, economical, durable, and can not get out of order. No poisoning fluids or acids required — nothing but soap and water.

From 60 to 70 per cent. saved in clothing, time, and labor.

Description.

It consists of a metal cylinder, with cleats on the inner surface, and an interior cylinder of wood, with cleats. There is a space of from six to eight inches between the two cylinders. One crank turns both cylinders at the same time in opposite directions, rapidly exciting a suds, forcing the water through the clothes, and effectually removing the dirt.

Advantages.

This machine dispenses entirely with the washboard. The action of the water cleans the clothes, consequently there is no wear of fabric. The saving of clothing, and the saving of time and labor are equally remarkable. The machine is simple in construction and management —a child can use it. It is well made, of galvanized iron, and is very durable. It will wash the finest as well as the coarsest fabrics—a single small piece, or a quantity of clothing. For flannels, comforts, blankets, and difficult things for the laundress to manage, its operation is astonishing, as it thoroughly cleans them, with no possibility of shrinkage.

Parent.—No. 1,812; No. 2,814; No. 3,816.

Machines can be seen in operation at No. 494 Broadway, east side, above Broome Street.

Ladies and gentlemen are invited to call and examine it, or send in a letter, send your dirty clothes and test it.

N.B. Price only $10.

Price only Ten Dollars.

Price only Ten Dollars.

This simple, compact, durable, economical, portable, and efficient machine will easily, certainly, and perfectly perform the work of twelve women.

It can not get out of order, and may be worked efficiently by a child, washing laces, and every variety of soiled clothes, without wear or injury. It has been worked in the laundry of French's Hotel and elsewhere, with all other washing machines making any pretension to novelty, and has, in every instance, performed its work in less than half the time required by any other, and much more thoroughly and satisfactorily.

It will wash a single handkerchief, collar, lace sleeve, six shirts, or all of these articles together, without the necessity of soaking or boiling.

These results are produced by the constant reaction of the suds, and not by friction of rubbing machines. It is admirably adapted for introduction into houses with stationary tubs, as it may be inclosed and connected with the waste and water-pipes, and will make an important feature in having "with all the modern improvements."

In the Family, Laundry, Hotels, Boarding-Houses, Hospitals, Asylums, Boarding-Schools, on Ships and Steamers, and in the Army, it will be found unequaled and indispensable.

It may be worked singly or in number by any steady motive power.

This machine may be seen in operation at the laundry of French's Hotel, and at the depot, No. 419 Broome, corner of Canal St., and at No. 319 Fulton St., Brooklyn.

PRICE ONLY TEN DOLLARS.

THE PATEK WATCH.

In view of the fact that individuals are known to be preparing to impose upon the American public an inferior imitation of this

UNRIVALED LADIES' WATCH,

Messrs. Patek, Philippe & Co.,

of Geneva, Switzerland, the manufacturers of the Patek Watch, have recently requested

Messrs. TIFFANY & Co., 559 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, their sole Agents in this city and State, to exercise purchasers of this counterfeit. The spurious article is closely copied in the original style of ornamentation, and bears engraved upon its cap a forged trade-mark, either Patek & Co., Patek, Philippe & Co., Charles Patek, or Alexandre Patek. The genuine is engraved with the name of Tiffany & Co., in addition to Patek, Philippe & Co., and is invariably accompanied by a certificate signed by the manufacturers, and other counterfeits, this attempted imitation is known unworthy copy in externals alone before; but it is known that the parties to this fraud are even going to the extent of forging Mr. Patek's own certificate and signature, the purchaser of a Patek Watch can only be sure of its genuineness by obtaining it of the authorized and sole agents, Tiffany & Co.

STEINWAY & SONS' PATENT OVERSTRUNG GRANDS,
AND SQUARE PIANOS

Are now considered the best Pianos manufactured.

1. Opinion of nearly all the greatest and most prominent Musicians and Artists regarding these Instruments.

The undersigned, having personally examined and practically tested the improvement in Grand Pianos invented by H. STEINWAY, in which the covered strings are overstrung above those remaining, do hereby certify:

1. That as a result of the said improvement the volume of the Piano is greatly improved in quality, quantity, and power.

2. The sound by Steinway's improvement is much more even, less harsh, stronger, and much better prolonged, than that realized in any other Piano with which we are acquainted.

3. The undersigned regard the improvement of Mr. Steinway as most novel, ingenious, and important. No Piano of similar construction has ever been known or used, so far as the undersigned know or believe.

"That the business of Gift Enterprise can be made a legitimate one—that it can be conducted fairly and honorably, doing justice to all parties, is not an absurdity, but a reality that has been demonstrated plainly. True, we know of but one man who has mastered it—but only persistently, but has won the confidence of the public, and the conviction we have arrived at that it is owing solely to the fact that he it the only one of them who has dealt honorably and fairly by his patrons. Certain it is that no man could conduct a business unfairly the length of time he has, without one word of complaint being uttered against him, by the hundreds of thousands who have been the recipients of favors at his hands. We refer, of course, to Mr. GEO. G. EVANS, 439 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

INSURRECTION IN SICILY.

THE "DERBY DAY."

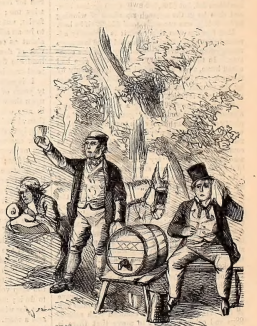
ON page 388 our readers will find a spirited sketch of the great race on Epsom Downs, whose annual recurrence gives all London a holiday.

Epsom, the town in whose vicinity the race takes place, lies fifteen miles southwest of London, and was once noted as a watering-place. From the waters of the springs found here were first manufactured the celebrated "Epsom salts," dear to costive humanity. The springs are no longer a fashionable centre, and the neighborhood is now noted only for its race-course.

The races take place during the week preceding Whitsuntide, and the "Derby" stakes are run for always on Wednesday. In this one race centres the main interest. The others draw but minor crowds; but to see "the Derby" nearly half a million of Londoners rush out in every kind of conveyance and in all imaginable styles. The grand stand on the race-course, erected some thirty years ago, holds nearly eight thousand persons.

The race for the Derby stakes was first instituted at Epsom, in the year 1780, and was won by Sir Charles Bunbury's Diomed. This horse was subsequently imported into the United States, and from him have descended some of the best horses that ever trod the turf. Sir Archy, Timoleon, Boston, Lexington, and Lecomte all trace their blood back to Diomed; and now, after a lapse of eighty years, we see his lineal descendant, Umpire, contending for the same stake which he (Diomed) won in the first year of its establishment. But the value of the stake is immensely increased since that time; for in 1780 there were but thirty-six subscribers and nine starters for the race, while in 1860 there were 225 subscribers and thirty starters. The conditions of the race remain unchanged, with the exception of the weights carried; these were originally 112 pounds for colts, and 109 for fillies. The subscription to the stake is $250 each, half forfeit; for three-year old colts, 119 pounds, and fillies, 114 pounds; the owner of the second horse to receive 100 sovereigns out of the stakes; the winner to pay 100 sovereigns toward the police and regulations of the course, and 50 sovereigns to the judge; distance, one mile and a half.

The stake is worth £6300; but from that sum must be deducted the winner's own stake, 100 sovereigns for second horse, 100 sovereigns for police expenses, and £10 for the judge: thus reducing its clear value to £6050.



The pace this year was pretty good throughout, and three seconds quicker than last year. Thormanby, the winner, is a chestnut horse, of doubtful parentage, being by Melbourne, or Wiuthound, out of Alice Hawthorn, and the property of Mr. James Merry, a Scottish gentleman of immense fortune. He has been a stanch patron of the turf for upward of twenty years, but this is the first time he ever succeeded in his great object of winning the "Blue Ribbon of the Turf." He won the Great St. Leger in 1858 with Sunbeam, and has also carried off many other important races with his large stable of racers. Last year Thormanby started fourteen times, and won nine races, beating good horses. Exceedingly popular on the turf, it is no wonder that Mr. Merry's success was hailed with immense cheering by the assembled thousands who witnessed the race. He has steadily and pluckily supported his horse in the betting throughout the winter, and his winnings must consequently be enormous. His liberality to his trainers and jockeys is a matter of notoriety; and he has been known to make a present of 1000 guineas to one of the latter when he won the Doncaster St. Leger.

AUNT SALLY.

CRINOLINE ON STILTS.

The Derby this year had a peculiar interest for Americans, in consequence of Mr. Ten Broeck having an American-bred horse, Umpire, engaged in it. Umpire is a chestnut colt by Lecomte out of Alice Carneal by imported Sarpedon, out of Rowena by Sumpter, and was bred on the farm of A. Keene Richards, Esq., Georgetown, Kentucky. He was purchased by Mr. Ten Broeck as a yearling, and sent over to England last spring to be trained in his stable at Newmarket. His first appearance on the turf was at the Newmarket Craven meeting for a £50 plate, in which race he was not placed. He next ran in a match for 100 sovereigns with the Earl of Hawley's Zwang, in which he was beaten by a head. At the Goodwood meeting in July he won the nursery stakes, one mile, beating a field of twenty-one horses, by seven lengths. He continued his victorious career by winning the Clevelands stakes and Zetland biennial stakes, at Stockton-on-Tees, beating good fields. These performances, joined to his racing-like form, caused him to become the first favorite for the Derby. Indeed, such was his mature appearance, that, after winning at Goodwood, the owner of the second horse objected to his receiving the stakes, on the ground of his being a three-year-old. This objection was referred to the Jockey Club, the tribunal of all racing disputes, and Mr. Ten Broeck produced such convincing evidence of its falsity, that the decision was in favor of Umpire being the age represented. By the trainers at Newmarket he was pronounced a "Derby horse all over," and some idea may be formed of the high estimate entertained of his racing qualities, from the fact that he was backed to win the Derby for upward of a million of dollars. The Americans bet freely and heavily on him, and a good deal of money was sent from New York to invest on him for this race. Mr. Ten Broeck, it is said, backed him before Goodwood at the odds of one hundred to one, for the sum of $5000, thus standing to win half a million of dollars on the issue of his success. But the golden rule of racing men is, always "to win and not lose," and this object is obtained by the process termed "hedging." Thus when Umpire became a favorite, and was freely backed by the public at five to one, Mr. Ten Broeck could, and doubtless did, lay $100,000 to $20,000 against him, and thus be in the agreeable position of winning $400,000 if he was successful, and $13,000 if he lost.

Had Umpire won this race, it is generally admitted that the betting-ring would have lost more money than it ever lost on any previous occasion. In the winner, Thormanby, they also had a bad horse, as he was backed heavily, not only by the owner, and ran up upward of $350,000—and also by the general public, with whom he has always been a great favorite.

The race, however, is only a part of the day's amusements. Every body "goes in for fun," and plenty of sharps and flats come together in various ways. All the favorite sports are shown on the preceding page. The "Three-Card Trick" is common to our own race-courses. The gentleman who displays the "tu" try your luck" may be seen in duplicate not a dozen steps from our New York City Hall, and in curious proximity to the Hall of Sir. Leonard, where such unconscious blisters have often "tried their lungs." "Leger" takes the place of "Trick Sir," with us; and so far as our experience goes, the market price of "shocks" (of the electric kind) is higher here than in the mother country. "Climbing on Stilts" has not yet been imported, and we do not believe this part of the show would succeed with Americans, even though the inevitable bagpipes were appended. But why will not some one set up an American "Aunt Sally?" It seems, from our cut, a most innocent amusement, and its popularity in England—where stair parliament men, noble dukes and earls, grave judges, and stout elderly gentlemen take their shy at the black cotton pellet, in common with schoolboys and cabmen—seems to prove that there is really pleasure and excitement in it.

"Aunt Sally" is the effigy of a black wench, set up on a stick, with a pipe in her mouth. The player pays a penny for the privilege of slyly giving a given number of wooden billets at this pipe. If they miss they are laughed at. For every hit they are rewarded with a little wooden doll, which it seems to be the fashion to carry temporarily stuck in the hat ribbon, and to offer to your friends on the way home at night.

What degree of proficiency is needed to strike the pipe from Aunt Sally's mouth is not mentioned. But as very large and short-sighted young dukes could, by perseverance, fill his hat-ribbon with the wooden dolls, beginners may take courage.

THE JUNE MONTH.

The waning of the sweet May moon
Jung's leading face discloses,
Her apron filled with butter-cups,
Her bosom red with roses.

The blossom and the bursting bud
Are woven in her tresses,
And every plant that fans her cheek
Comes laden with caresses.

The birdies leave the open plains
And seek the hazel covers—
Some months were made for married life,
But June was meant for lovers!

Perhaps you've seen a little maid
With lips like rare-ripe cherries—
We're going down the meadow-path
This afternoon for berries.

I'll tell you more about the walk
Before the summer closes;
So fill a cup to laughing June,
And wreathe its brim with roses!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 23, 1860.

RAILROAD HOMICIDES.

TWO little children walking upon the railroad track near Newark, New Jersey, the other day, were run over by the train, and one of them at least was instantly killed. The train was stopped, and the engineer with his passengers, and they acquitted the engineer of all blame. It appeared that the children suddenly emerged upon the road, and were struck before the train could be stopped. Of course the brakes were instantly applied, and so strongly that there was a perceptible shock in the cars. Who was to blame? There are accidents which, however melancholy, are unavoidable. Was this one of them?

We grant that the engineer was not to blame. If a tree had suddenly fallen across the track, under the same circumstances, it is clear that the train must have rushed on. The children appeared so unexpectedly as the thing now, and he could not help himself—or them. Were the children in fault? It can not be pretended, for they were mere children. No; the accident was among those which should be made impossible, by legally compelling all railroad companies carefully to fence in their tracks. There is nothing clearer than that heavy damages ought to be awarded in such a case, except that they will not be. A man who has dog a deg in his front yard, and a puppy at night in the doorshgfare, and leaves it at night without a lantern, is unquestionably guilty of homicide if another man falls in and is killed; and a railroad company, upon whose track it is proved that children can climb up and suddenly appear upon the embankment, is equally responsible for the manslaughter. It is equally criminal. Railroad companies in this country run for luck. Perhaps they do in other countries too; but our business is with our own faults, not those of other people. It has come to be an affair of calculation; and as it is found about as easy, and rather cheaper, to run the risk of damages, the company, all over the land are flagrantly careless of fencing and of road-crossings.

It is rather a melancholy result of some ninety years of national existence that human life, upon the whole, offers more in this country than in any other, and yet that it is cheaper here than elsewhere. And in the case which looks simply to the preservation of life can be unitemay or excessive. Nuisances are abated by lawsuits—swearing of witnesses, &c. Life is legally forbidden; and a bill introduced into our last Legislature to control the erection and occupation of tenement-houses was a measure demanded by humanity, and opposed by selfishness. Fortunately, it failed to become a law. It is certainly proper to watch jealously any interference of the law with private property; but the due security of the original rights of the citizen, among which life is the first, is the paramount duty of the State. It is doubtless expensive to fence all railroad tracks throughout, but a company which can not afford to do it can not afford to have a track; and as no company will take the step voluntarily they should be compelled to do it; and wherever the line of fence is broken, for whatever purpose, there should be a gate and a man. It is the demand of humanity and common sense, and experience daily confirms its necessity.

THE LORDS AND COMMONS.

Or all decent, dignified, and dull bodies the English House of Lords is probably chief, except when Lord Brougham finishes his broad sense to the people of this country, or Lord Derby turns a polished period. But the House of Lords is just now making itself heard, and so much that the people, in these days, and in listening to listen, and even to reply. Mr. Gladstone, in his budget, proposed to abolish the excise duty on paper—a tax which fell heavily upon a certain class, and was of course injurious to cheap literature—and to replace it by a penny in the pound upon the income tax. The measure passed the Commons; but the Lords threaten to disagree. The Commons are indignant, because, by the English Constitution, they are the originators of supplies; and as although a bill of taxation must be sanctioned by the Lords, the Commons hold that the sanction is a matter of course. The feeling is increased by the fact that the Lords have already approved the increased income tax, which was only a substitute for the paper duty.

The consequence of this movement is indignation meetings in the large cities of England, at which, of course, the whole position, character, and necessity of the House of Lords will be vehemently discussed. A body of hereditary legislators is, in its very nature, a dangerous body; and when they are brought into direct collision with the immediate representatives of the great mass of the people, upon a question which involves every man's pocket, they will be criticised with all the rigor of modern political philosophy. As might be supposed Mr. Bright leads the charge. He has already put himself upon the record in the question of Lords against Commons. He regards the Peers as a body sometimes ornamental, sometimes not, but always expensive and useless. The Upper House should certainly take care that it does not force the people of England to consider whether Mr. Bright's opinion may not be correct.

OUR VISITORS AND OURSELVES.

THERE are undoubtedly gentlemen and ladies in America, but what a pity that the Japanese will never know it! They have seen some, probably, during their visit here, but they could not know them in the multitude. They know the gentleman who smashed his hat over their eyes in Baltimore; the lady who filled up the window in Philadelphia; the shouting, staring, insulting mob which has dogged them every where. Perhaps the Baltimore gentleman was drunk. But what right have we to allow drunken men to insult strangers and guests? Suppose Mr. Dallas in England, or Mr. Faulkner in France, or Mr. Appleton, who is going to Russia, to be treated in those countries as we have treated the Japanese. We might not go to war about it, but we should seriously say that they were not yet sufficiently civilized to have embassadors sent to them.

The whole part of the whole thing is that we speak of the Japanese as if they were barbarians and savages. But we have yet to read of the moment during these proceedings in which the Japanese gentlemen have not been quite as dignified, intelligent, and well-bred as any gentlemen in any country or time. The barbarism and the savagery have been entirely upon our part; and it is a fair question whether the princes will not return with a profound regret that Japan has so far foregone her ancient traditions as to open her doors to the desolating influx of Western civilization.

The poor men have been carted about our noisy streets, and exposed during mid-summer sun. They have seen the Battery, the Park, Trinity Church, the St. Nicholas Hotel, Grace Church, Union Place, the Statue of Washington, the Cooper Institute, and the Bowery. They have been blinded and deafened by a pageant utterly destitute of any thing which appeals to the imagination—and which is to a true pageant what the beating of a tom-tom is to music. It is to be hoped they will leave town before Mr. Hecksy arrives. It would be a pity to have two great ovations conflicting with each other.

"THE WORLD."

THE new daily morning newspaper of which so much has been said, and whose issue was awaited with general curiosity, has at last appeared. It is a handsome sheet, rather larger than the similar journals, and in typographical complexion closely resembling the Tribune.

Those who are familiar with the workings of the newspaper world, and some who are not, know what a large outlay of capital, and what incessant effort, tact, ability, and experience are necessary in the conduct of a daily metropolitan sheet of the claims and scope of the World. They also know that the profits of such a paper are not derived from the sale of the copies, but from the advertisements. It is pleasant, therefore, to observe that the new enterprise starts with well-filled advertising columns; and we assume the policy of reasonable charges, we see no reason to apprehend that those columns will be soon stripped.

Of the literary merit of a new morning paper, and of its ultimate success without materially injuring any paper now existing, we have little doubt, if it be only wisely conducted. The field for such competition is an omnibus—there is always room for one more, provided he knows how to keep his seat. Of course it is an animated struggle for the next few days; and in this country, a paper must understand what audience it means to address; and the sagacity of an editor is proved by the accuracy of his estimation of the number and power of that audience.

The World starts on its ground fairly. It proposes to give the news as news, not as material for grotesque comment; to discuss all questions of public interest from the Christian point of view; and, in general, to seek rather to lead than to follow public opinion. Its price is very small. One cent for a copy of such a paper seems incredible. But we do the proprietors the justice to believe that they have not undertaken the matter without careful consideration of that and all other points.

The welcome of fellow-toil into the ranks, and wish it a long and prosperous career.

THE LOUNGER.

A LITTLE JOURNEY AT HOME.

THE other morning the Lounger made an "uncommercial" journey. It was not in unknown countries, and yet it was a journey of exploration and discovery. His route lay through the Bowery and the Third Avenue to Thirteenth Street, where he left the car in which, with a friend bent upon the same purpose, he had accomplished so much of the distance; and turning into Thirteenth Street East they coasted along the area railings until they reached Number 137. The house looks like a thousand other houses in New York; just as San Salvador looked like a hundred other islands that Columbus had seen. A comely maid was sweeping the hot sidewalk in front; a strawberry woman, the selling out with her fragrant store that she had the fruit to sell, and a dust wagon jogged by jerking out petulant little rings from a bell that had long lain behind the driver's seat. No. 137 East Thirteenth Street is a pleasant, handsome house in a pleasant, handsome part of the street, and we range the hall cheerfully, chatting of many things, but carefully saying very little of what we had come to see.

No, it was not a dentist's; it was not a celebrated surgeon's; it was not a fashionable "medical man;" it was not a convenient clergyman's, who was about to unite the Lounger and his friend (whose sex, it will be observed, has not yet been mentioned) in the holy bonds of matrimony. No, it was what in many guesses you would scarcely guess. Did you know that about one in every six hundred children is born imbecile? We had come to see a school for idiot children. You think it not a very pleasant business for the fresh June morning? But if the loveliest morning of the divine coming be that it makes the wilderness bloom and the desert rejoice, what will you say of that advent of divine light which irradiates the hitherto blank desert of a human soul with knowledge? We all love to read about and very natural admiration of the heroic men who explore what seem inaccessible mountain heights, who pierce the polar mysteries, and visit the wild scenes where dwell savages. Whoever attempts an apparently impossible victory over the impediments of outward nature is commended for our wonder and respect. But what we say, then, of him who believes that he can throw a ray of light across the dense darkness of intellectual gloom, and will you say of that ferv pealed to our sympathy for his loss, patting the place where it belonged and vaguely trying to say how. They are almost all and always dumb, making the sound which is produced by holding the tongues passive in the mouth. In every manner, therefore, Mr. Richards seeks to cultivate the muscles of the mouth and throat by direct vocal gymnastics, "barring" with the tongue and lips, thrusting the tongue out and moving it about, and by inoculation. Most of these unfortunates are fed upon milk and food that requires the mere motion to be swallowed. It is a habit, of course, which only increases the difficulty.

One of the brightest boys in the little school is Johnny, and also one of the most hopeless. He has a partial paralysis, and chores, or St. Vitus's dance. He is about thirteen years. His mouth, which in lungs is incessantly and spasmodically moving, and his chin is constantly twitching so that he wears a thick bib which is frequently changed. But his dark eyes are full of intelligence; and, if I may use such a word, he seemed to have more intellectual interest and coherency than any of the children. He spelled the words of one syllable nimbly, upon the board with the sliding block letters, although his poor little arms and hands twisted and struggled sadly. When he had done his task he looked for approval, and laughed as if he enjoyed his success. He could make no articulate sound; but he pointed to the shirt collar of Mr. Richards, as if meaning something, and when Mr. R. asked him if his mamma would make him some collars when he stopped drooling, he pointed to his own neck, and laughed with delight at the joke.

Addy, the oldest girl, took me about the room and showed me the pictures of animals in which she chiefly delights. Then she read lines of one-syllabled words, "the cow is in the barn," which she pronounced slowly and with great effort. Mr. Richards told her to spell the line at the board. She went as far as "the cow," and could go no further. She studied all the time she was doing it, but not idiotically, and occasionally, with an air of expression, said something that had a vague and shadowy resemblance to familiar words.

Half of these poor children are physically disested, and I do not forget the thin, pale, sad faces and withered little hands of one girl, about eleven years old, who is weakened by a daily epileptic attack, and moves slowly about, bent like a woman of ninety. But during the three hours that we remained with them they were as quiet as eight children as you can any where see. Charley, indeed, was continually doing something—looking into Johnny's mouth, getting up and urging a more active sympathy in the bow business—evidently wanting to do something all the time. But it was all gentle, and the children seemed to be no malice. There were no efforts at attack or defense, except once when Charley came too far within Johnny's lines, upon which Johnny resisted. But a firm, loud word from Mr. Richards cleared the difficulty in a moment. Both children stopped, and Johnny looked at Charley beyond the bib of the bow. And when I remembered that these innocents, so cheerful, so childishly merry and naturally quiet, were little hells, shouted, screamed, raged, were a hundred-fold worse than little beasts but a few years since, I could scarcely see the use of it help feeling the justice of what Mr. Richards said, that he did not dare to set any limit to their possible improvement. The difficulty with them seems to be but a cataract over the mind. They are intellectually blind. But as patience and tenderness and skill can teach the blind to read the sense of eye, and if it can not restore full sight, can yet give a glimmering sense of light, so the same treatment, infinitely more delicate and tender, infinitely faithful and skilful, may lift the shadow from these souls, so that, at the very least, they may catch some wavering sense of the divine love and beauty. And in all the exquisite detail of creation, where even the tips of bees' wings and feet have their kindly office to perform in fructifying the whole process, is there any thing more beautiful than that some are shut in blind and anxious to gather the lambs which seemed mere senseless stocks and stones, and were utterly outcast and disregarded, into the warm and loving Father's fold?

It is a journey which we shall make again, and report to the reader.

A STATESMAN.

K. asks what constitutes a statesman? Can we better define him than as a man who comprehends the great principles of national progress, and understands the methods by which the results of those principles may be wisely accomplished? The word, of course, may have a very arbitrary meaning when it is to. Talleyrand and Metternich may be called great statesmen; but if we do so, there are two classes of governors, each of which is superior to these men, for whom we have no word left—such, for instance, as Napoleon Bonaparte and Edmund Burke. Bonaparte had the perception and the executive power, and did something more than hold on, which was the peculiar work of Talleyrand and Metternich; and Burke had profound political instincts, but little practical administrative power.

To speak frankly, there is no entirely satisfactory statesman in history. The profoundest statesmanship must have all its policy upon human fraternity, not upon what is called patriotism, or exclusive devotion to a part of the world and its populait suited the rest of the world. Thus, as a rule, from the North, or the manufacturing section, they have strongly favored protection; from the South, or the producing section, they have urged free trade. That is to say, statesmanship is generally understood to mean the sharpest look-out for Number One. Do you say, "Of course; so it has always been, and so it always will be." Exactly; and therefore I say no historical statesman is altogether satisfactory. But you see at once, if we ask each other, "What is statesmanship?" Number One? Did Benedict Arnold do it when he made his bargain, or Nathan Hale, when he regretted he had but one life to give to his country; or Arnold von Winkelried, when he drew the sheaf of deadly spears into his own breast? Why, then, we find that a man lives for his neighbor alone, the more broad he gets the better; but if not, then he must discover what else it is that he lives by. Do you say that William Pitt was a great statesman because he preserved to England the trial of her system of constitutional government, which was attacked by despotism from without? I say, so far he was. But he could be truly great only as he was disinterested, and he was not always so far and as far as he could, without risking the whole. Did he do that? If he did, he was a great statesman.

A DIFFERENCE.

APROPOS of Earl Derby's late speech upon American affairs, in which his lordship stated that we were about falling into anarchy, "an Englishman, who has lived a few years in America," sends the Lounger the following sensible and admirable remarks:

"An English statesman regards the English government as above or superior to the English people; existing as a fruit or result of the efforts of the whole country. And the English conservatives, as a body, have the same idea. Between them they put it and polish it and hold it up for admiration.

"It is admirable. We all know that there are no imperfections in it.

"An American citizen regards government as a necessary evil; entirely inferior to himself, and his servant; to be kept in control, and to be tolerated because it is necessary, and by to that point only.

"The American government does not require any fine-drawn statesmanship or political finesse; and here it differs entirely from all European powers. The country has no wrangling alliances. It is not surrounded and crowded by other powers all envious of its growth. It has a continent to expand over. And when it has expanded as far as it has, and what is doing its work, is man's strength and energy, called out by his own selfish will and not by the power of government."

DICKENS'S LAST.

The reader of the Weekly may have observed a series of papers by Dickens, published in these columns in advance from the All the Year Round, called "The Uncommercial Traveler." They are perfect specimens of Dickens's style, as showing full—upon the little events of the author's daily experience; including such subjects as a visit to the scene of a railway accident, an imaginary tour through Europe, as he seats himself for a moment in a traveling carriage; a visit to a poorhouse for old men, and a visit to a Liverpool work-house, where the returned soldiers from the Crimea were treated; to some of the old parish churches of London; to the pretty sketches made upon the habits of animals and birds in the poorer quarters of London, etc., etc. The sketches are not long; but they are full of the humanity of Dickens, the accuracy of observation, the quick sympathy, the broad human humor, and the humanity which belong to Dickens. The writer has the sharpest satire upon red tape and the Circumlocution Office; upon the vanity of wealth in a lady's sour because Dickens found something to laugh at; and condemn even in our sacred selves, let us remember that he has the power to publicly severe upon nothing as upon what he considers the sins and absurdities of England. In his day there has been no man so powerful to expel prevailing error as former than he. For the first grand step in a reform is to show the real character of the thing you wish to alter. The popularity pleads against itself and crime convicts itself.

To a man like Dickens, London, of course, offers an endless variety of curious research. His mind and body are constantly on the alert. He goes to see and judge for himself. He is not content to read and peers into every venerable retreat, every dusty and cobwebbed building, or institution, or system, and tells us intriguing tale of what he finds. There is a peculiar charm in these journeys of an unconmercial traveler which every reader will be glad to share.

THE ABBOTT MUSEUM.

THE famous Egyptian collection of the late Dr. Abbott has at length been secured to this city. The subscription was taken in hand by many of the wealthiest citizens, and the thirty thousand dollars has been raised under the auspices of the Historical Society. This museum was collected by Dr. Abbott during his residence of many years in Cairo. He went thither originally in the service of Mehemet Ali, and after retiring from his position under that Pasha remained in the country, in which the American visitor, at any time during the dozen years before his death, will not fail to recall his frank, genial friendliness and simplicity. Dr. Abbott adopted the Oriental costume, preferred Eastern life, and married in Egypt. He was always there to hear of any new discoveries or interesting researches; he had friends among all the dragomans and agents, and was constantly accumulating certain treasure, among the most curious of the ring of Cheops, found in the great Ghizeh.

The Abbott collection is a positive addition to the real wealth of New York. The sum of thirty thousand dollars has not lately been more wisely expended.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

HELICON has so overflowed into the Lounger's Letter-box that he wishes to say (if the melodious waiter will allow) that he shall hereafter make no mention of the verses which are sent to him and declined. "What do you mean by such good enough to be shared by the public he will print when he can. The Lounger kindly thanks the many unknown friends who have chosen him as their godfather before the public; and he regrets that he is obliged to decline to say even those few words which it is always agreeable to an author to hear, although they may be words of refusal.

LOVE'S TENDENCY.

THESE little verses recall the strain of Charles Lamb's "To Hester," without in the least imitating them:

> She is not rich, she is not learned,
> She is not known for beauty;
> This, and this only is discerned—
> She loves me truly.
>
> She is her mother's staff and joy,
> Her image too—a matron
> Youthful and fair, though grown—
> And I her patron,
>
> Sending her little gifts, of book
> And flower and fruit, and she > Repays the courtesy by a look
> Which seems less lonely.
>
> Thus favors, of her life a part,
> Become to me a precious treasure:
> Already feels the mother's heart
> And the love-pleasure.
>
> Above its rock aspires the vine,
> Its youthful tendrils greeting
> Yon neighboring vine whose branches fine
> Await its meeting.
>
> And from its bold rose storm nor stroke
> The vine can wrench or sever;
> It dies in love, and falls the oak,
> Twined round forever.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

NO MATTER NOW!—A party of belated gentlemen, about a certain hour, began to think of home and their wives' displeasure, and urged departure. "Never mind," said one of the party, "displeasure now will make no difference; my wife is as mad now as she can be."

"John, I saw your cousin Isaac a few weeks ago, and he had just received a bill, which cost a most horrible gash in his sum."—"Ah, poor fellow, what did he fall on?"—"Why, I forget exactly; but it rather strikes me he fell on Tuesday morning."

"Why, Jimmy," said one professional beggar to another, "you're going to have a holiday, I see."—"Yes, I'm a thing taken its character from the way in which we view it. Thus, when Dr. Spooner dined with a friend who had three brothers-in-law, and they got into a row at the table, vesting in throwing the soup in each other's faces, the father turned to the doctor with the simple remark, 'Boys will be lively, Sir.'"

A schoolmaster was one day questioning a class, and asked how many senses there were. "Seven, Sir," said a little fellow, with great confidence, drawing himself up in his trousers pockets. "Seven!" said his master. "Well, taste is one; feeling, two; smelling, three; two ears, five; and two eyes make seven."

Buttons are sometimes made to do duty for which they were not originally intended when the contribution box is passed round in a country place-of-worship. Such was the custom as follows: "My Christian friends, a collection will be made for the benefit of the heathen in the Sandwich Islands. And here I wish to warn those of you who put in buttons instead of the proper coin that after the service down the crypt, which, while it has an effect in deceiving the poor heathen, is of no use of those articles for coin, nevertheless renders them totally useless for business."

WHAT ALLED HIM?

A late number of the Albion has a good anecdote of a man who rarely failed to get to bed late and sober, and did so but on the one occasion which follows. Upon his being charged by a friend that he never went to bed sober, he indignantly denied the charge, and gave the following as the particular night in point:

"Pretty much as usual I got into bed, my wife said,

"'Why, husband, what is the matter with you? You act strangely.'

"'There's nothing the matter with me,' said I; 'something ails you.'

"'Why, husband,' she said, she; 'you don't act natural at all. Shan't I get up and get something for you?'

"'No,' said I, 'don't get up, my dear,' and arose by the bedside to look at me, shading the light with her hand, 'for I know there was something strange about you,' said she; 'you are sober!'

"Now this I took as a high compliment to my self-control, and said, 'Well, my wife will swear to it, so don't you slander me any more by saying that I haven't been to bed sober in six months, 'cause I have.'"

At the March term of the Montgomery (Alabama) Court, Solomon, a negro, charged with horse-stealing, was tried upon a charge of an assault and battery. He was a slave, and his counsel, a white attorney, was much alive to the importance of procuring patrons and customers. The jury, after a short retirement, returned into court a verdict of "Not Guilty." Keesey looked around as if somebody were expected to say something, but he added to the jury, bowed to them with a grateful air, and remarked, "I congratulate you, the jury, I am much obliged to you for your very liberal patronage."

One day an Irishman was limping down the High Street of Edinburgh, from the Court of Sessions, he overheard a remark by one of the passers-by, which inquired, "That is Mr. Cox,—the lame lawyer." Upon which he turned round quickly, with his face all on a broad grin, and said, "No, madam, I am a lame man, but not a lame lawyer."

A NEW STEWE.—Buckham officiated at Perseverance at the Teacher's Convention, and convinced the audience by pointing an anecdote. He said that at the first district school he ever taught he announced one day that on the following Monday he would commence a parsing class. A bright-eyed little girl, one of the pupils, ran home and told her mother that her master, whom a waiting society was in session, and, with uplifted hands, cried: "Oh, mother, the master is going to have a sparking class!" The sewing society was delighted to hear it.

REPLY TO A "CHALLENGE."—Shortly after the battle of Princeton, a wiry Scotch farmer amused himself by writing a humorous hand upon it, which as stung one of the officers, who had behaved very badly on this occasion, that he sent the poor a challenge to meet him at Hamby, for mortal combat. The second found the farmer busy with his pitchfork, to whom he delivered the challenge of the redoubtable hero. The good-humored farmer, turning toward him, with his agricultural implement in his hand, coolly said, "Going back to Mester Smith, and tell him I hae nae time to come to H——— to give him satisfaction; but that if he likes to come here, I'll just do as he did—I'll run away!"

Some time since, while in the supply of a well-established newspaper, Hamilton, I esteemed, a humble student. Mr. F., the senior partner of the firm, was a great humorist. He was fond of the practical joke. Hamilton—his keen perception, etc. But I have all the old gentleman's failings of a good and pliant disposition. This none could deny, for the reason that none had ever seen a example of it. Consequently, he had unlimited and unsecured letters himself. But it one day happened that Mr. F. received a message from a writing gentleman that required an immediate answer, and being so busy he could not answer it in person, he wrote a message in a few lines and dispatched them. Soon the messenger returned with the following: Mr. F.: a note. Expects to be an answer to his own, Mr. F. opened it; but with all his humorous turn he could not enjoy these words, and handing it to one of his partners, he remarked, with a contemptuous air:

"Pretty writing that! What the deuce does he suppose can read it?" If I could not write decently I would not write at all."

"Beg pardon, Sir," said the messenger, "but that is the reason Mr. A. sent it back; he could not read it himself."

Rest it! How the deuce does he expect I can read it, then?"

"But, Sir, that is your own writing."

"Eh! what! Mr. Wright!" said Mr. F.'s face changed color as he grasped the missive from his partner's hands, and, without bringing it to his spectacled, "Why, bless me, so it is; and just as plain as day!"

Mrs. Dr. Lydia Sayer Hasbrouck advertises in her last Sun:

WANTED.

An intended bride who is eligible to begin housekeeping in the same style in which her parents began.

"I very frequently see young ladies, who dare to be seen wielding a dusting brush or darning needle, thinking it a disgrace which should happen to make an early morning call.

"I am indeed sorry that ladies of 'good families,' who dare to wear their last winter's bonnet to church on this Sunday.

Fourteen young ladies, "who are anybody," who dare to be seen in the street wearing shoes with soles thick enough to keep their feet warm.

Fifty young ladies of sufficient age" to go in company," who dare confess that they have ever made a loaf of bread or a pudding.

It is said that Hobbs, the famous locksmith, has succeeded in picking one of Banqua's gory locks; he did it with a hair-pin, and succeeded so well, he has gone to work on a wollock.

"What a fine head your boy has!" said an admiring friend. "I wish I had the fellow's head, Tom." "Help of the old block—ain't you, my boy?" "Yes, father," mutter said yesterday that I was a young blockhead."

One ought to have dates at one's finger ends, seeing they grow on the palm.

A gentleman who spoke of having been struck by a lady's beauty was advised to kiss the rod.

The rhymer who wrote the line, "Dear to me is the gutter that bore you," probably had in his mind the recollection of his bill at some sensible hotel.

Verbs, John, that's twice you've come home and forgotten to bring me. Ah, mother, it was so gooey that it slipped my mind."

As much as bailie was allowed to whistle to keep his courage up, and the whistling of the bullets deem I have that tendency.

Grocer, to a servers coughing-fit," remarked a sexton to an undertaker, when they were taking a glass together, "that's a good coughing serve a living. Let him down the wrong way," replied the undertaker. "Ah, ah! that's just like you," said the sexton, "you always lay the coffin on the lose."

"Is your horse gentle, Mr. Dobster?" "Perfectly gentle, Sir, you may ride him with as little fear as a feather." A playful habit of extending his hinder hoofs now and then." "Is your horse addicted to his hinder heels you don't mean, kicking, I hope?" "Some people call it kicking, Mr. Jones, but it is a slight reaction of the muscles; a disease rather than a vice."

"Jim, how does the thermometer stand to-day?" "Goes stands on the mantle-piece, right agin the plastering."

The following appears in the Sibyl from one of the sisters:

> How long shall women be suppressed
> By man's unfeeling hand?
> Who will arise—her wrongs redress,
> Grant her, at least,
> Men, turn the scales, step in our place,
> Wear our long robes and letters,
> Stay in the house and sew or knit,
> Be dears at the fireside.
>
> From week to week—from year to year
> Pursue there rounds of duty,
> With what we get as acquiesce,
> And see if it will suit you.
> And if you find a pauper's down,
> And should a dollar save,
> Just look at the other side of that
> By stronger hands and brave.

EPITAPH ON A BARBER.

What answer'st now folks never spoiled his repose;
'Twas the same thing to him whether stocks fell or rose;
For blest at the minister he cared what it grew,
His crops never failed, for they grew on the chin.

A FAIR CONCEIVER.—Sitting by her Edwin, at breakfast, the other morning, Angelina read the following in the Illustrated News: "It is stated that a plan is on foot for the establishment of paper-mills in the metropolis of breweries—Burton-on-Trent. 'Spent-hops' are to be worked up and supplied to the market in the form of paper. Samples of the manufacture are now on view." "Ah, Edwin," said Angelina, who in her excitement was regardless of her grammar, "Edwin, dear, you must buy me some of this hop-paper. You know, dear, that you've promised to let me have a dance next month, and hop-paper will no nicely do to write the notes on!"

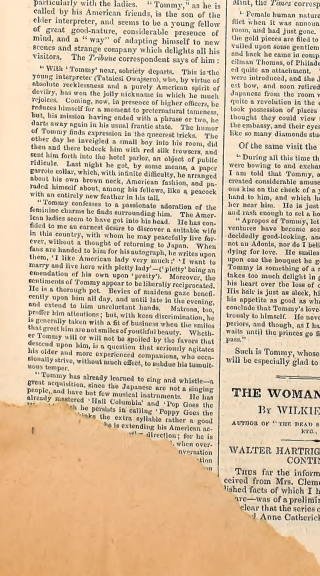
"TOMMY," THE FAVORITE OF THE LADIES.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]



"TOMMY."

We give herewith an excellent likeness of "Tatsieu Owasjero," the youngest of the interpreters connected with the Japanese Embassy, who has become so general a favorite in Washington, and particularly with the ladies. "Tommy," as he is called by his American friends, is the son of the chief interpreter, and seems to be a young fellow of great good-nature, considerable presence of mind, and a "way" of adapting himself to new scenes and strange company which delights all his visitors. The Tribune correspondent says of him:

"With 'Tommy' near, sobriety departs. This is the young interpreter (Tatsieu Owasjero), who, by virtue of absolute recklessness and a purely American spirit of devilry, has won the jolly nickname in which he most rejoices. Coming, now, in presence of higher officers, he reduces himself for a moment to preternatural tameness, but, his mission having ended with a phrase or two, he darts away again in his usual frantic state. The humor of Tommy finds expression in the queerest tricks. The other day he inveigled a small boy into his room, did then and there bedeck him with red silk trowsers and sent him forth into the hotel parlor, an object of public ridicule. Last night he got, by some means, a paper gamrote collar, which, with infinite difficulty, he arranged about his own brown neck, American fashion, and paraded himself about, among his fellows, like a peacock with an entirely new feather in his tail.

"Tommy confesses to a passionate adoration of the feminine charms he finds surrounding him. The American ladies seem to have got into his head. He has manifested to me an earnest desire to discover a suitable wife in this country, with whom he may peacefully live forever, without a thought of returning to Japan. When fame was handed to him for his autograph, he writes upon them, 'I like American lady very much;' 'I want to marry and live here with pretty lady'—(plenty' being an emendation of his own upon 'gresty'). Moreover, the sentiments of Tommy appear to be liberally reciprocated. He is a thorough pet. Belles of maidens gaze bored, eyeth upon him all day, and until late in the evening, and extend to him unreluctant hands. Mahreen, too, prefer him attention; but, with keen discrimination, he is generally taken with a fit of tenderness when the smiles that greet him are not smiles of youthful beauty. Whether Tommy will or will not be spoiled by the fervors that descend upon him, is a question that mutually agitates his older and more experienced companions, who occasionally strive, without much effect, to subdue his tameness sooner.

"Tommy has already learned to sing and whistle—a great acquisition, since the Japanese are not a singing people, and have but few musical instruments. He has already mastered 'Hail Columbia' and 'Pop Goes the ...ds he persists in calling 'Poppy Goes the ...akes the extra syllable rather a good ...he is extending his American ac... direction; for he is ... when over... ...nversation ...tion ...

ferous instincts. He kept calling all his companions to look at the pretty steamer, and when she was about going away, asked: 'Is it permitted here to kiss a little girl as young as that?' adding that in Japan it was considered exactly the correct thing to do.

During their recent visit to the Philadelphia Mint, the Times correspondent says:

"Female human nature suffered an irrepressible conflict when it was announced that Tommy was in the room, and had just gone. The girls of the room where the gold pieces are fixed to exactly the proper weight prevailed upon some gentlemen to have Tommy come back, and back he came in company with his namesake, Commodore Thomas, of Philadelphia, for whom he has formed quite an attachment. The two or three favored girls were introduced, and the Japanese boy made his rarest bow, and soon retired. The disappearance of the Japanese from the room was, however, the occasion of quite a revolution in the demeanor of the girls. They took possession of places at the windows whom they thought they could view unobserved the personnel of the embassy, and their eyes glistened through the chinks like so many diamonds studding the window-frames."

Of the same visit the Herald writer says:

"During all this time the Japanese of the lower order were busying to and exchanging smiles with the crowd. I am told that Tommy, at one point of the journey, created considerable amusement by imprinting a vigorous kiss on the cheek of a young lady who held a child dressed to him, and which he took hold of, and so drew her near him. He is just the boy to play the gallant, and rich enough to set a house on fire.

"Apropos of Tommy, let me say, I think his love adventures have become somewhat magnified. Though decidedly good-looking, and a pet of the ladies, he is not an Adonis, nor do I believe he is sighing, crying, or dying for love. He smiles sweetly on all, and bestows upon one the bouquet he gets from another. In short, Tommy is something of a male coquette, and, I think, takes too much delight in general admiration to break his heart over the loss of one assortment of crinoline. His belle is just as sleek, his trowsers as unruffled, and his appetite as good as when he landed. Therefore I conclude that Tommy's love-scrapes will not result disastrously to himself. He never forgets his duty to his employers, and though, as I have said, the son of a Prince, waits until the princes go first, and bows lowly as they pass."

Such is Tommy, whose portrait our lady readers will be especially glad to see.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC., ETC.

WALTER HARTRIGHT'S NARRATIVE CONTINUED.

THUS far the information which I had received from Mrs. Clements—though it established facts of which I had not previously been sure—was of a preliminary character only. It was clear that the series of deceptions which had led Anne Catherick to London and separated her from Mrs. Clements had been accomplished solely by Count Fosco and the Countess; and the question whether any part of the conduct of husband or wife had been of a kind to place either of them within reach of the law might be well worthy of future consideration. But the purpose I had now in view led me in another direction than this. The immediate object of my visit to Mrs. Clements was to make some approach at least to the discovery of Sir Percival's secret; and she had said nothing, as yet, which advanced me one my way to that important end. I felt the necessity of trying to awaken her recollections of other times, persons, and events, than those on which her memory had hitherto been employed; and when I next spoke, I spoke with that object indirectly in view.

"I wish I could be of any help to you in this sad calamity," I said. "All I can do is to feel heartily for your distress. If Anne had been your own child, Mrs. Clements, you could have shown her no truer kindness—you could have made no readier sacrifices for her sake."

"There's no great merit in that, Sir," said Mrs. Clements, simply. "The poor thing was as good as my own child to me. I nursed her from a baby, Sir, bringing her up by hand; and a hard job it was to rear her. It wouldn't get to my heart so to lose her if I hadn't made her first short-clothes, and taught her to walk. I always said she was sent to console me for never having chick or child of my own. And now she's lost, and still them keep coming back to my mind; and, even at my age, I can't help crying about her—I can't, indeed, Sir!"

I waited a little to give Mrs. Clements time to compose herself. Was the light that I had been looking for so long now glimmering on me—far off, as yet—in the good woman's recollections of Anne's early life?

"Did you know Mrs. Catherick before Anne was born?" I asked.

"Not very long, Sir—not above four months. We saw a great deal of each other in that time, but we were never very friendly together."

Her voice was steadier as she made that reply. Painful as many of her recollections might be, I observed that it was, unconsciously, a relief to her mind to revert to the dimly seen troubles of the past, after dwelling so long on the vivid sorrows of the present.

"Were you and Mrs. Catherick neighbors?" I inquired, leading the memory on as encouragingly as I could.

"Yes, Sir—neighbors at Old Welmingham."

"Old Welmingham? There are two places of that name, then, in Hampshire?"

"Well, Sir, there used to be in those days—better than three-and-twenty years ago. They built a new town about two miles off, convenient to the river; and that's Welmingham, which was never much more than a village, got in time to be deserted. The new town is the place they call Welmingham now; but the old parish church is the parish church still. It stands by itself, with the houses pulled down, or gone to ruin, all round it. I've lived to see sad changes. It was a pleasant, pretty place in my time."

"Did you live there before your marriage, Mrs. Clements?"

"No, Sir—I'm a Norfolk woman. It wasn't the place my husband belonged to either. He was from Grimsby, as I told you; and he served his apprenticeship there. But having friends down about, and hearing of an opening, he got into business at Southampton. It was in a small way, but he made enough for a plain man to retire on, and settled at Old Welmingham. I went there with him when he married me. We were neither of us young; but we lived very happy together—happier than our neighbor, Mr. Catherick, lived along with his wife when they came to Old Welmingham, a year or two afterward."

"Was your husband acquainted with them before that?"

"With Catherick, Sir—not with his wife. She was a stranger to both of us. Some gentleman had made interest for Catherick, and he got the situation of clerk at Welmingham Church, which was the only one of the coming to settle in our neighborhood.—He brought his newly-married wife along with him; and we heard, in course of time, she had been lady's-maid in a great family that lived at Varneck Hall, near Southampton. Catherick had found it a hard matter to get her to marry him, in consequence of her holding herself unconnonly high. He had asked and asked, and given the thing up at last, seeing she was so contrary about it. When he had given it up she turned contrary, just the other way, and came to him of her own accord, without rhyme or reason, seemingly. My poor husband always said that was the time to have given her a lesson. But Catherick was too fond of her to do any thing of the sort; he never checked her, either before they were married or after. He was a quick man in his feelings, letting them carry him a deal too far—now in one way, and now in another—and he would have spoiled a better wife than Mrs. Catherick, if a better had married him. I don't like to speak ill of any one, Sir; but she was a bad woman, with a terrible will of her own; fond of foolish admiration and fine clothes, and not caring to show so much as decent outward respect to Catherick, kindly as he always treated her. My husband said he thought things would turn out badly, when they first came to live near us; and his words proved true. Before they had been quite four months in our neighborhood there was a dreadful scandal and a miserable break-up in their household. Both of them were in fault—I am afraid both of them were equally in fault."

"You mean both husband and wife?"

"Oh no, Sir! I don't mean Catherick—he was only to be pitied. I meant his wife and the person—"

"And the person who caused the scandal?"

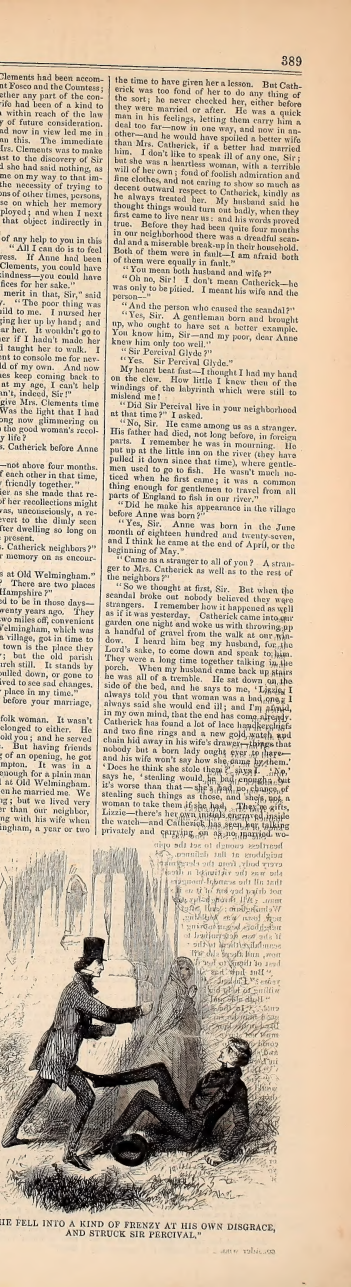
"Yes, Sir. A gentleman born and brought up, who ought to have set a better example. You know him, Sir—and my poor, dear Anne knew him only too well."

"Sir Percival Glyde?"

"Yes. Sir Percival Glyde."

My heart beat fast—I thought I had my hand on the clew. How little I knew then of the windings of the labyrinth which were still to mislead me!

"Did Sir Percival live in your neighborhood at that time?" I asked.



"No, Sir. He came among us as a stranger. His father had died, not long before, in foreign parts. I remember he was in mourning. He put up at the little inn on the river (they have pulled it down since that time), where gentlemen used to go to fish. He wasn't much noticed when he first came; it was a common thing enough for gentlemen to travel from all parts of England to fish in our river."

"Did he make his appearance in the village before Anne was born?"

"Yes, Sir. Anne was born in the June month of eighteen hundred and twenty-seven, and I think he came at the end of April, or the beginning of May."

"Came as a stranger to all of you? A stranger to Mrs. Catherick as well as to the rest of the neighbors?"

"So we thought at first, Sir. But when the scandal broke out nobody believed they were strangers. I remember how it happened as well as if it was yesterday. Catherick came into our garden one night and woke us with throwing up a handful of gravel from the walk at our window. I heard him beg my husband, for the Lord's sake, to come down and speak to him. They were a long time together talking in the porch. When my husband came back up stairs he was all of a tremble. He sat down on the side of the bed, and he says to me, 'Louisa, I always did say that woman was a bad one; and I always said she would end ill; and I'm afraid, in my own mind, that the end has come already.' Catherick has found a lot of lace handkerchiefs and two fine rings and a new gold watch and chain hid away in his wife's drawer—things that nobody but a born lady ought ever to have—and his wife won't say how she came by them. 'Does he think she stole them?' says I. 'She,' says he, 'stealing would be all enough, but it's worse than that—she's got, to choose, of stealing such things as those, and she's got a woman to take them if she had. They're Mrs. Lizzie—there's her own initials engraved inside the watch—and Catherick has seen her talking privately and carrying on secretly with Sir Percival.'

"HE FELL INTO A KIND OF FRENZY AT HIS OWN DISGRACE, AND STRUCK SIR PERCIVAL."

man should with that gentleman in mourning —Sir Percival Glyde. Don't you say any thing about it—they quieted Catherick for to-night. I've told him to keep his tongue to himself and his eyes and his ears open, and to wait a day or two, till he can be sure of his position." "I believe you are both of you wrong,' says I. 'It's not in nature, comfortable and respectable as she is here, that Mrs. Catherick should take up with a chance stranger like Sir Percival Glyde." "Ay, but is he a stranger to her?" says my husband. 'You forget how Catherick's wife came to marry him. She went to him of her own accord, after saying No, over and over again, when he asked her. There have been wicked women before her time, Lizzie, who have used men who loved them as a means of saving their characters; and I'm sorely afraid this Mrs. Catherick is as wicked as the worst of them. We shall see,' says my husband, 'we shall soon see.' And only two days afterward we did see."

Mrs. Clements waited for a moment before she went on. Even in that moment I began to doubt whether the view that I thought I had found was really leading me to the central mystery of the labyrinth after all. Was this common, too common, story of a man's tenderness and a woman's frailty the key to a secret which had been the life-long terror of Sir Percival Glyde?

"Well, Sir, Catherick took my husband's advice, and waited." Mrs. Clements continued. "And, as I told you, he hadn't long to wait. On the second day he found his wife and Sir Percival whispering together, quite familiar, close under the vestry of the church. I suppose they thought the neighborhood of the vestry was the last place in the world where any body would think of looking after them, but, however that may be, there they were. Sir Percival, being seemingly surprised and confounded, defended himself in what was always, that poor Catherick (whose quick temper I have told you of already) fell into a kind of frenzy at his own disgrace and struck Sir Percival. He was no match (and I am sorry to say it) for the man who had wronged him, and he was thrown in the most summary manner before the neighbors, who had come to the place on hearing the disturbance, could run to the part them. And it happened toward evening; and before nightfall, when my husband went to Catherick's house, he was positively known where. No. 'My living soul in the village ever saw him again. He knew too well by that time what his wife's vile reason had been for marrying him; and left her his misery and disgrace—especially after what had happened to him with Sir Percival—too keenly. The chairwoman of the parish put an advertisement in the paper, begging him to come back, and saying that he should not lose his situation or his friends. But Catherick had too much pride and spirit, as some people said—too much feeling, as I think, Sir, even to listen to offers approaching to a live down the memory of his disgrace. My husband heard from him when he had left England, and heard a second time when he was settled and doing well in America. He is alive there now, as far as I know, but none of us in the old country—his wicked wife above all—are ever likely to set eyes on him again."

"What became of Sir Percival?" I inquired.

"Did he stay in the neighborhood?"

"Not he, Sir. The place was too hot to hold him. He was heard at high words with Mrs. Catherick the same night when the storm broke out, and the next morning he took himself off."

"And Mrs. Catherick? Surely she never remained in the village among the people who knew of her disgrace?"

"She did, Sir. She was hard enough and heartless enough to set the opinions of all her neighbors at the proper defiance. She declared, positively, from the clergyman downward, that she was the victim of a dreadful mistake, and that all the scandal-mongers in the district would not drive her out of it as if she was a guilty woman. All through my time she lived at Old Welmingham, and after my time, when the new town was building, and the respectable neighbors began moving to it, she moved too, as if she was determined to live among them in the scandalize them to the very last. There she is now, and there she will stop, in defiance of the best of them, to her dying day."

"But how has she lived through all these years?" I asked. "Was her husband able and willing to help her?"

"Both able and willing, Sir," said Mrs. Clements. "In the second letter he wrote to a good man he said she had borne his name, and lived in his home, and, wicked as she was, she must not starve like a beggar in the street. He could afford to make her some small allowance, and she might draw for it quarterly at a place in London."

"Did she accept the allowance?"

"Not a farthing of it, Sir. She said she would never be beholden to Catherick for bit or drop if she lived to be a hundred. And she has kept her word ever since. When my poor dear husband died, and left all to me, Catherick's letter was put in my possession with the other things, and I told her to let me know if she was ever in want. 'I'll let all England know I'm in want,' she said, 'before I tell Catherick, or any friend of Catherick's. Take that for your answer, and give it to him for an answer if he ever writes again."

"Do you suppose that she had money of her own?"

"Very little, if any, Sir. It was said, and said truly, I am afraid, that her means of living came privately from Sir Percival Glyde."

After that last reply I waited a little to reconsider what I had heard. If I unreservedly accepted the story so far, it was now plain that no approach, direct or indirect, to the Secret had yet been revealed to me, and that the pursuit of my object had ended again in leaving me free to face with the most palpable and the most disheartening failure.

But there was one point in the narrative which made me doubt the propriety of accepting it unreservedly, and which suggested the idea of something hidden below the surface. I could not account to myself for the circumstance of the clerk's guilty wife voluntarily living out all her after-existence on the scene of her disgrace. The woman's own proposal of a settlement that she had taken this strange course as a practical assertion of her innocence did not satisfy me. It seemed to my mind more natural and more probable to assume that she was not so completely in the secret in this matter as she had herself asserted. In that case who was the likeliest person to possess the power of compelling her to remain at Welmingham? The person unquestionably from whom she derived the means of living. She had refused assistance from her husband, she had no adequate resources of her own, she was a friendless, distraced woman: from what source should she derive help but from the source at which report pointed—Sir Percival Glyde?

Reasoning on these assumptions, and always bearing in mind the one certain fact to guide me, that Mrs. Catherick was in possession of the Secret, I easily understood that it was Sir Percival's interest to keep her at Welmingham, because her character in that place was certain to isolate her from all communication with her former neighbors, and to allow her no opportunities of talking incautiously in moments of free intercourse with inquisitive people. But was that what was the mystery to be concealed? Not Sir Percival's infamous connection with Mrs. Catherick's disgrace—that was known, and was the very people who knew of it. Not the suspicion that he was Anne's father—for Welmingham was the place in which that suspicion was inevitably exist. If I accepted the guilty appearances described to me as unreservedly as Mrs. Clements had accepted them, I arrived at the same superficial conclusion which Mr. Catherick and all his neighbors had drawn, where was the deception in all this? And herein of a dangerous secret between Sir Percival and Mrs. Catherick which had been kept hidden from all time to the present. And yet in those stolen meetings, in those familiar whisperings between the clerk's wife and Sir Percival, was the vestige of the clew to discovery existed beyond a doubt.

Was it possible that appearances in this case had pointed one way, while the truth lay, all the while unsuspected, in another direction? Could Mrs. Catherick's accusation of Sir Percival as the victim of a dreadful mistake, by any possibility be true? Or, assuming it to be false, could the revelation which accused Sir Percival with her guilt have been founded in some inconceivable error? Had Sir Percival by any chance asserted the innocence of Mrs. Catherick for the sake of diverting from himself some other suspicion that might be right? Here, if I could find it, here was the approach to the Secret—the hidden deep under the surface of the apparently unpromising story which I had just heard.

My next questions were now directed to the one object of ascertaining whether Mrs. Catherick had or had not arrived truly at the conviction of his wife's infidelity. The answers I received from Mrs. Clements left me no doubt whatever on that point. Mrs. Catherick had, on the clearest evidence, compromised her reputation while a single woman by a private person unknown, and had married to save her character. It had been positively ascertained, by calculations of time and place, that Anne was born particularly, that the daughter who bore her husband's name was not her husband's child.

The next object of my inquiry was to ascertain whether that Sir Percival must have been the father of Anne, was clear in all its greater difficulties. I was in no position to try the probabilities on one side or on the other, in this interview, by any better test than the test of personal remembrance.

"I suppose you often saw Sir Percival when he was in your village?" I said.

"Yes, Sir, very often," replied Mrs. Clements.

"Did you ever observe that Anne was like him?"

"She was not at all like him. Sir."

"Was she like her mother, then?"

"Not like her mother either, Sir. Mrs. Catherick was dark and full in the face."

Not like her mother, and not like her (supposed) father. I knew that the test by personal resemblance was false. But as no publicly confirmed fact, on the other hand, it was not to be altogether rejected on that account. Was it possible to strengthen the evidence by even comparing any conclusive facts in relation to the lives of Mrs. Catherick and Sir Percival before they either of them appeared at Old Welmingham? When I asked my next questions I put them with this view.

"Was Sir Percival first appeared in your neighborhood," I said, "did you hear where he had come from last?"

"No, Sir. Some said from Blackwater Park, and some said from Scotland, but nobody knew."

"Was Mrs. Catherick living in service at Varneck Hall immediately before her marriage?"

"Yes, Sir."

"And did she been long in her place?"

"Three or four years, Sir; I am not quite certain which."

"Did you ever hear the name of the gentleman to whom Varneck Hall belonged at that time?"

"Yes, Sir. His name was Major Donthorne."

"Did Mr. Catherick, or did any one else you knew, ever hear that Sir Percival was a friend of Major Donthorne's, or ever see Sir Percival in the neighborhood of Varneck Hall?"

"Catherick never did, Sir, that I can remember—nor any one else, either, that I know of."

I noted down Major Donthorne's name and address, on the chance that he might still be alive, and that he might be useful at some future time to apply to him. Meanwhile, the impression on my mind was now decidedly adverse to the opinion that Sir Percival was Anne's father, and decidedly favorable to the conclusion that the secret of his stolen interviews with Mrs. Catherick was entirely unconnected with the disgrace which the woman had inflicted on her husband's good name. I could think of no further inquiries which I might make to strengthen this impression—I could only encourage Mrs. Clements to speak next of Anne's early days, and await for any new suggestion which might in this way offer itself to me.

"I have not heard yet," I said, "how the poor child, born in all this sin and misery, came to be trusted, Mrs. Clements, to your care."

"There was nobody else, Sir, to take the little helpless creature in hand," replied Mrs. Clements. "The wicked mother seemed to hate her—and Mrs. Catherick in fault!—from the day it was born. My heart was heavy for the child, and I made the offer to bring it up in tenderly as if it was my own."

"Did Anne remain entirely under your care from that time?"

"Not quite entirely, Sir. Mrs. Catherick had her whims and fancies about it, at times; and used now and then to lay claim to the child, as if she wanted to make up for forgiving it up. But these fits of hers never lasted for long. Poor little Anne was always returned to me, and was always glad to get back—though she led but a gloomy life in my house, having no playmates, like the children, to brighten her up. One longest separation was when her mother took her to Limmeridge. Just at that time I fancied Anne had died; and I felt it was as well, in that miserable affliction, that Anne should not be in the house. She was between ten and eleven years old then, and was beginning to sool, and not so cheerful as other children, but as pretty a little girl to look at as you would wish to see. I was fond of her, and her mother brought her back; and then I made the offer to take her with me to London—the truth being, Sir, that I always felt as if I had my heart to stay at Old Welmingham after my husband's death, if the place was so changed and so dismal to me."

"And did Mrs. Catherick consent to your proposal?"

"No, Sir. She came back from the north harder and bitterer than ever. Folks did say that she had been obliged to ask Sir Percival's leave to go, to begin with, and that she only went to nurse her dying sister at Limmeridge because the poor woman was reported to have left money behind her. Be that as it may, she hardly left enough to bury her. These things may have soured Mrs. Catherick, likely enough; but however that may be, she wouldn't hear of my taking the child away. She seemed to like distressing us both by parting us. All I could do was to give in to her opposition, and to tell her privately, if she was ever in trouble, to come to me. But years passed before she was free to come. I knew her temper, poor soul, till the night she escaped from the mad-house."

"You know, Mrs. Clements, why Sir Percival Glyde placed her there?"

"I only know what Anne herself told me, Sir. The poor thing used to stumble and wander about, it seldom, when her mother had got some secret of Sir Percival's to keep, and had let it out to her in a passion after Sir Percival's return. When Sir Percival found she knew it he shut her up. But she never could say what it was, when I asked her, for she could tell me not that her mother might be the ruin and destruction of Sir Percival if she chose. Mrs. Catherick may have thought as much as that, and no more. I'm next to certain I should have heard the whole truth from Anne if she had really known it, for she pretended to do, and as she very likely fancied she did, poor soul!"

This idea had more than once occurred to my own mind, and I openly told Marian that I doubted whether Laura was really on the point of making any important discovery. Mrs. Clements and Anne Catherick were disturbed by Count Fosco at the boat-house. It was perfectly in character with the general direction that they should assume an absolute knowledge of the Secret on no better grounds than vague suspicion, derived from words which the mother had incautiously let drop in her presence. Sir Percival's guilty distrust would, in that case, infallibly cause him to take the false idea that Anne knew all from her mother, just as it had afterward fixed in his mind the equally false supposition that the mother knew all from Anne.

The time was passing; the morning was wearing away. It was desirable, if I could longer, that I should hear any thing more from Mrs. Clements that would be at all useful to my purpose. I therefore mentioned those local and family particulars, in relation to Mrs. Catherick, of which I had been in search; and I had received a satisfactory answer to every one of them, which might immensely assist in directing the course of my future proceedings. I rose to take my leave, and to thank Mrs. Clements for the friendly readiness she had shown in affording me information.

"I am afraid you must have thought me very inquisitive," I said. "I have troubled you with more questions than many people would have cared to answer."

"You are heartily welcome, Sir, to any thing I can tell you," answered Mrs. Clements. She stopped, and looked at me wistfully. "But I do wish," said the poor woman, "you could have told me a little more about Anne, Sir. I thought I saw something in your face, when you came in, which looked as if you could. You can't think how hard it is not even to know whether she is living or dead. I could bear it better if I was only certain. You said you never expected we should see her alive again. Do you know, Sir—do you know for truth—that it has pleased God to take her?"

I was not proof against this appeal; it would have been unspeakably mean and cruel of me if I had resisted it.

"I am afraid there is no doubt of the truth," I answered gently. "I know of nothing in my own mind, that her troubles in this world are over."

The poor woman dropped into her chair, and hid her face from me. "Oh, Sir," she said, "how did you know it? Who can have told you?"

"No one has told me, Mrs. Clements. But I have reasons for feeling sure of it—reasons which I promise you shall know as soon as I can safely explain them. I am certain she was not neglected in her last moments—I am certain the heart-complaint, from which she suffered so sadly, was the true cause of her death. You shall feel as sure of it as I do, when you shall know, before long, that she is buried in a quiet country church-yard; in a pretty, peaceful place, which you might have chosen with her yourself."

"Dead!" said Mrs. Clements; "dead so young—and I am left to hear it! I made her first short frocks. I taught her to walk. The first time she ever said Mother she said it to me; and now I am left and Anne is taken! Did you say, Sir," said the poor woman, removing her handkerchief, and looking at me pitifully up at me for the first time—"did you say that she had been nicely buried? Was it the sort of funeral she would have had if she had really been my own child?"

I assured her that it was. She seemed to take unspeakable comfort in my answer to this end a comfort in it, which no other and higher considerations could afford. "I would have broken my heart," she said, simply, "if Anne had not been nicely buried; but how do you know it, Sir? who told you?" I once more entreated her to wait until I could speak to her more unreservedly. "You are sure to see me again," I said; "for I have a favor to ask, when you next see me, which concerns nobody but Mary or two."

"Don't keep it waiting, Sir, on my account," said Mrs. Clements. "Never mind my crying, if I can be of use. If you have any thing on your mind to say to me, Sir, please to say it now."

"I only wished to ask you one last question," I replied. "I only wanted to know Mrs. Catherick's address at Welmingham."

My request so startled Mrs. Clements that for the moment even the sense of Anne's death seemed to be driven from her mind. Her tears suddenly ceased to flow, and she sat looking at me in the most astonished manner.

"For the Lord's sake, Sir!" she said, "what do you want with Mrs. Catherick?"

"I want this, Mrs. Clements," I replied: "I want to know the secret of those private meetings of hers with Sir Percival Glyde. There is something more, in what you have told me of that woman's past conduct and of that man's past relations with her, than you or any of your neighbors ever suspected. There is a Secret we none of us know of between those two, and I must go to Mrs. Catherick with the resolution to find it out."

"Think twice about it, Sir!" said Mrs. Clements, rising in her earnest alarm and laying her hand on my arm. "She's an awful woman—you don't know her as I do. Think twice about it, Sir!"

"I am sure your warning is kindly meant, Mrs. Clements. But I am determined to see the woman, whatever comes of it."

Mrs. Clements looked me anxiously in the face.

"I see your mind is made up, Sir," she said. "I will give you the address."

She wrote it down in my pocket-book, and then took the good woman by the hand to say farewell.

"You shall hear from me soon," I said; "you shall know all that I have promised to tell you."

Mrs. Clements sighed and shook her head doubtfully.

"An old woman's advice is sometimes worth taking, Sir," she said. "Think twice before you go to Welmingham."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, June 11, in the Senate, on motion of Senator Clark, the report of the Printing Investigating Committee was taken up. The alleged abuses growing out of the public printing were discussed. Resolutions recommending a change in the mode of executing the public printing were adopted. The Civil Appropriation Bill was taken up and discussed.——In the House, the Post-Office Appropriation Bill was taken up, and several amendments were agreed to; one authorizing the Postmaster-General to cause the mails to be transported between the United States and any foreign port, or between port of the United States and another.

On Tuesday, June 12, in the Senate, an amendment to the Civil Appropriation Bill, appropriating $400,000 for arms to be distributed among the militia of the several States of the Union, was adopted.——In the House, the Senate's amendment to the Post-office Deficiency Bill was agreed to. This restores nearly all the service discontinued or curtailed since March, 1859. The Navy Appropriation Bill was taken up; the ten-minutes were conversed in, occupying one hour and not more than $5000 shall be expended at any navy-yard on the hull and spars of any vessel of war now afloat, or $2000 on her rig and rigging, nor more than $8000 on general repairs, without a previous examination and report of a survey, approved of Board. After some debate the bill passed.

On Wednesday, June 13, in the Senate, Senator Sumner presented a petition from Dr. Cleever and others, for the release of Dominique Hyatt. After discussion, the case it was referred to the Select Committee.——In the House, the resolution reported back from the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, declaring that the Secretary of the Navy has, with the approval of the President, abused his discretionary power, and that the President and Secretary were therefore deserving of the reprobation of the House, were taken up and adopted. Mr. Horrit, of Virginia, strongly opposed them. The President, he said, was independent of Congress, and Congress independent of the President. He was replied to by Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, and after further debate the several resolutions of censure were adopted by the previous question.

On Thursday, June 14, in the Senate, the amendment of the House increasing the appropriation for the maintenance and defence in Africa of the squadron under the Ashley-Webster Act from $200,000 to $500,000 was rejected. The consideration of the Civil Appropriation Bill was resumed. The amendments for paying the claims of the Choctaw Nation to the sum of $2,000,000 being rejected, the Civil Service Appropriation bill was passed without amendment.——In the House, the amendments of the Whole House resolution to reduce the price of public printing forty per cent. was passed. The further consideration of the proposed grant for the Select Pacific Railroad Committee was postponed until next session. Mr. Colfax, from the Conference Committee on the House Homestead bill, reported that they could not agree to the Senate amendments of the Senate Homestead bill, and the House resolved to adhere to its disagreement without a division. Mr. Pettit announced the working of the Reciprocity Treaty with Great Britain, and the effect of placing the products of Canadages to the British North American Colonies without any restrictions advantageous to our citizens. The Senate's amendments to the Army bill were resumed, without action other than the Chairman's report, in order of study for Cadets at the Military Academy to four years, which was then concurred.

On Friday, June 15, in the Senate, majority and minority reports of the Senate Ferry Investigation Committee were presented. The committee recommended the discharge of Theodore Hyatt, the sentinel-guard at the ferry, and a resolution in accordance with the suggestion was adopted.——The Light-house Appropriation bill was passed. A remonstrance from New York relative to the Fifth Avenue Hotel was read. The Tariff bill was taken up and disbursed by Senators Hunter, Bigler, Cameron, and Brewster, and was opposed by a vote of 27 to 17 as to how it disposes of the subject for the present session. The Army Appropriation bill was then taken up, and some of the amendments agreed to. The Overland Telegraph bill, already passed in the House, was considered in the Senate.——In the House, the——the third——Conference Committee on the Senate Homestead bill was appointed. The bill authorizing the issue of land warrants in cases where the originals have been lost or destroyed was passed.

RICHMOND CONVENTION.

The Convention met on Monday, June 11, and after the adoption of the resolution, "that the delegates to the Convention having been appointed on the basis of the majority platform of the Charleston Convention, further action in time in relation to a platform is unnecessary," adjourned, to meet at Baltimore on the 21st inst., two days after the meeting of the Baltimore Convention.

MOVEMENTS OF THE JAPANESE.

The Embassy left Washington for New York on the morning of June 8. In Baltimore they were welcomed by a great demonstration, terminated with a display of fire-engines, fire-works, a review of the military, and the view, from a balcony, of about 60,000 persons gathered to see them. "Tommy" was, as usual, the sponsor of all kinds of ups. He climbed a carriage next to the rear of the one containing the "treaty-box," which so completely filled the vehicle that there was no room for him to sit beside it, or he wished to do at the station. He was already a general favorite, and every time a passing glances and gracious bows to such indies as particularly attracted his attention; and as all the ladies were on the look-out for Tommy, they were not slow in singling him out from the crowd. There was much straining of height eyes to get a look at him, when, from mouth to mouth, there circulated the words, "Tommy's coming." "Oh, is that him?" exclaimed a chorus of ladies' voices, and bouquets fell in showers, not excepting those that were thrown and handed to him.

They left Baltimore for Philadelphia on the 9th. At Wilmington a rude crowd received the party. "Hillo, old horse!" they shouted to the guide in the imperial interior; who sat next to an open window. I was seated next to him; so he said to me, saying, "what does that mean?" The next moment he had a bouquet thrust to him through the window. It had a card attached to it bearing a name in Japanese characters. "That fellow's not a bad sort, after all," said the guide, as the negro who presented it, "Well, please to give it to him." At Chester, he departed, leaving Tommy in full possession of the flowers. They had likely been sent by some officer of the navy who had recently returned from Japan. At this time the yawling bell was being rung by Tommy who had taken his place on the locomotive a few minutes previously, when the train was stopped in order to allow the ambassadors time to partake of some of their plates on the tender. They were vastmeans enough to supply them with food, finding the spot by no luxurious they at once stepped down again, leaving Tommy the sole occupant of their late seats, and to continue his journey while chatting with the engineer and fireman.

They arrived at Philadelphia at half past 8 P. M. of the 9th, and were welcomed by an immense crowd with very large procession.

In Baltimore and here quite freely treated, with one exception: two swords were taken from a bedroom while their owners were dining at the fire-engine house. Philadelphia they seem to have been disgusted with the rudeness of the crowd. The Herald reporter writes:

"The most disgusting and brutal language was expressed by some of the crowd while the procession was passing over the route. This was especially the case in the lower part of the city, where the 'genteel and respectable' must do congregate. For instance, at one point a Royal Commissioner was pointed out to the crowd. 'Look you man with the spectacles, is that your monkey you have got with you?' And this was followed by the laughter of the 'homes' of the crowd. It is to be particularly regretted that many of these remarks were plainly understood by a portion of the Embassy. This morning some of the cars came to Capitain Pompei and Portier, and said they feared from their conduct yesterday that they would be considered them very ridiculous, and intimated that they should not be so severe in their criticisms.

"The Japanese considered the dress and manners of the ladies to be exceedingly curious and not calculated to add to their beauty. They made many remarks which could not be understood by many of the crowd, but which, while it was some——the Mint, delighted——to pull one of their undoubtedly decapitated had it not been for the by-standers.

At the Pennsylvania Hospital one of the Japanese doctors witnessed the operations of amputation of the thigh at the hip-joint, and of the forearm, performed by Professor Pancoast, the patients being under the influence of ether.

They were very anxious to procure watches. Some four or five Yankee clocks were in their cars, which they wind up as often as possible.

On Saturday, June 16, Embassy left Philadelphia for New York. They arrived in New York by special train, and were met at Jersey City by a delegation from the Metropolitan Hotel by an immense procession, civil and military, and the largest gathering of people ever seen in New York.

THE WAY OF JAPANESE COINS.

The visit of the Ambassadors to the United States Mint in Philadelphia was next to the signing of the Treaty, their most important step in this country. The coins of Japan were assayed.—some in their presence; and we subjoin the following account of the assay, which will be of interest to merchants and others.

The coins are of gold, silver, brass, copper, and iron.

The principal gold coin is the cobang, of which we have three sizes, sent to the Philadelphia Mint which have been made within the past sixty years. This coin is of a dull orange, very thick, soft, and rather brittle; it is largely alloyed with silver, but the silver being taken out of the coin by a solvent, the coin loses its form entirely, and it has been a good deal worn. This accounts for the very pale gold which is found sometimes on the surface of which we have scratched of part of the surface, to show the fine color.

No. 1 in a cobang, supposed to be about sixty years old, is worth $17 50 cents, and is of the purest gold and silver; or, as we express by thousandths, it is 637 thousandths fine of gold, 363 thousandths fine of silver = $5 15. It is of oval form, quite thick, 2½ inches long, and 1½ broad.

No. 2 cobang, colored within a few years past, weighs 74 grains. It has been coated with a thin surface of silver, very nearly; the exact fineness in thousandths is 599. The value is therefore $12 39 cents. The size is very little smaller than No. 1.

No. 3 had a cobang, of the present date, brought by the Embassy for assay. They are exactly alike, except the small matter of fineness. The exact fineness in about 581 thousandths, which is precisely three-cents less than No. 2, and $12 36 cents is the value fixed. The value, including the sheet, is $3 37; without the silver $2 91. This is a small coin, about No. 3, but similarly shaped.

No. 4 and 5, two small rectangular coins, with a gold surface, which (by specific gravity) are about one-third gold, and two-thirds silver. The exact fineness as stated in the series are not known to us. They are too-trivia of much, in the estimation of the Japanese, to be worth.

No. 7 rectangular coin, is half the weight of the cobang 36. The exact fineness is unknown, but little more than one-fourth gold; the remainder appears to be silver. This piece is worth about 6 cents. It is very thin, long and half an inch broad.

No. 8, also rectangular, is called the gold itzebu; is one-fourth the weight of cobang, No. 2, and of the same fineness, very nearly. The value is $3 09 cents.

No. 9 and 10 are the new gold itzebu, brought by the Embassy for assay, and are one-fourth of the cobang No. 2 in weight, and are 599 fine. The value is $3 09, Nos. 8 and 9.

All the silver coins are rectangular, and rather thick.

No. 11, an old half-itzebu, silver, is one of several pieces which were given to the officers of the United Exploring Expedition, about the year 1849, by some Japanese sailors who had been cast away on the Japan ocean, and were picked up and taken care of. Afterwards, they were sent to the United States, and we have seen kept ever since. It was our first specimen of Japanese money. It is 1 inches long and 11 inches broad. It is 9 inches fine, silver, it is worth a little over 11 cents. Same size as No. 12.

No. 12 is a silver itzebu, colored some years since, and worth 50 cents. (Some specimens are fully 57.) Same size as No. 11.

No. 13 weighs 181 grains, and appears also to be nearly fine. It is worth 30 cents. Same size as Nos. 11 and 12.

No. 14, a new silver itzebu, brought by the Embassy for assay. It weighs the same as the old itzebu, 181 grains, and is of the same fineness, and is the same size standard (640). Valued at 33.38 cents. Same size as No. 13.

No. 15, a large, thick piece of brass, oval, and cast with a square hole in the middle, and with about 1 cent. "One hundred pesany." It is 2 inches long and 1¼ broad.

No. 16, a copper coin, circular, with a hole in the centre, size of a cent.

No. 17, an iron coin, circular, with rough edges, and with a hole in the centre. Size of a cent.

THE "GREAT EASTERN."

No care has been spared to make the Great Eastern's entrance to New York harbor a success. Samuel Murphy, Captain of pilot boat Washington No. 4, and an experienced pilot, boarded the steamer Friday, and will remain in her to take her in. She will pass through Gedney's channel, which has 40 feet of water on the bar. She will remain off the Battery, at anchor, a day or two, then proceed to Pier No. 1, North river, where she will make her reception, between Hammond and Troy streets, North river, and Beach, which is now being cleared of the building lumber, lime, brick and other materials, is the largest pier in New York, and will be used for the reception of the steamer, between the streets above mentioned, and crossing Bank street. Immediately in the rear of the pier will be the space allotted for the Great Eastern in three blocks in length, a space of about 700 feet.

TORNADOES.

Destructive whirlwinds and storms seem to be prevalent about the country. On the 5th a tornado passed and occurred in Lykins County, Kansas, on the 5th instant, doing much damage to property. Many houses, stores, and fences were lost. A remarkable storm visited Jefferson City, Missouri, on the 6th instant. The thunder and lightning was the most severe ever known in that region. Many of the citizens were much frightened or completely stunned by the shocks of thunder. Subsequently, a tornado passed over a portion of the country was considerable. "On June 8th," says the Leavenworth Times, "a storm of wind and rain was visited by one of the most awful tornadoes, for its duration and destructiveness, that has ever been known. It seems to have commenced from the southwest, but struck the river about three miles above Leavenworth, and quarter it blew with even increased violence. Providence, in the midst of the storm, has been kind to us, and the greatest fury was exhausted in about twenty minutes. Several houses have been unroofed, and fences, &c.

THE ROPE-WALKING MANIACS.

On the 8th Samuel Hodgkinson attempted to cross the chasm at Niagara Falls. At five o'clock Blondin stepped upon the rope on the Canada side, and, with a balancing attitude, somersaulted in Indian style. He wore a cap of black velvet, trimmed with fur, a crimson velvet vest, tights a light tunic of Indian bead-work. His neck and arms were bare.

The rope is 1300 feet long; its deflection is 60 feet, and at the lowest point is 250 feet above the foaming "hell of waters" which dashes madly down the awful gorge of Niagara. Blondin was briskly down the Manilla rope, pole in hand, for a few hundred feet, when he stopped short, threw out one foot and stood, poised above the chasm, on the other, presenting from the opposite shore the diminutive of a large-sized gnat. A little further on he sat down, resting his pole across his knee; and here in the most unconcerned manner he drew out a pipe and filled and lighted it. In the middle of the rope he again stopped, and this time he stood on his head, presenting from sight, his pole meanwhile lying across his feet. Up he slid again, and, with a prolonged leap, and also a few hundred yards of the Canadian bank he landed, struck an attitude, and stood for a few minutes statuesque and motionless. He landed on the Canadian side in seven and a half minutes from the time of his start, rather pale and dejected, but not a whit the worse for the journey. He complained of the sun, which had shone directly in his face.

On his way back to the American side the scrobat ballet, struck an attitude, and was photographed by an "instantaneous" artist. Then the performer dropped his head to feet wronged because Blondin had not fallen into the trap.

DE LAVE CHALLENGES BLONDIN.

De Lave, the rope-walker, has published and sent a challenge to Blondin, offering to match him for a trial of skill in rope-walking for the championship. He proposes to cross the chasm from Suspension Bridge to Clifton, also is decided to be the most expert on an "ascending rope, with ladders, waltzes, jiggs, somersets, &c., forfeits, any distance or any height. He will agree to cross the chasm on the Canada side, from the American side, and will ask both to be selected by the four already appointed by Blondin, Messrs. Wallace, Hamilton, Thompson and Bidwell, to come to Pulaton and walk over the valley of the rocks and Genesee River, from the ledge of the cliff to the top of Garret Mountain, or elsewhere proposed.

HAVE WE A PROPHET AMONG US?

The Pittsburgh Gazette says: "We announced, a few days ago, that the Great Tycoon of Utah, Brigham Young, had left Salt Lake City, and was temporarily in this city. Unmindful of popularity with the unbelievers, and observing the fact that his public receipts would be otherwise than 'saucy,' he has been domiciled somewhere. A tall, slender gentleman strolled into the billiard-room at the Point Breeze Trotting Park on Thursday, and, observing a friendly game with one of the subscribers. He did not refuse the customary invitation of the host to 'take a hand.' He was introduced, by Christian manner. The subscriber will thank us for naming the gentleman as the tender gentleman as Brigham Young. And many successions citizens have spent the time in his company. Subsequently he was introduced as Mr. Smith, or Mr. Jones, as occasion may require, but is, nevertheless, Brigham of King Brigham. We shall shortly reveal some of the adventures of the distinguished stranger, who was in the habit of wandering look about them, and remember that 'we have a Brigham among us.'"

ORIGIN OF THE CATTLE DISEASE.

It is alleged that the pleuro-pneumonia is a disease of the Dutch cattle. Professor Simonds, of the report of the New Jersey Agricultural Society, just out, says so.

ASSASSINATION IN CINCINNATI.

Professor Gamble, of the Medical Eclectic Institute Cincinnati, while entering two ladies home from the Odd Opera House, was assaulted by a man in the corner of Main and Hunt streets, and stabbed in the breast, causing instant death. The murderer have not been arrested.

MYSTERIOUS RENDEZVOUS FOR SLAVERS.

The Saxon (New Providence) Guardian, of 30th ult., says: "Captain Wylie, of the steamer Isabella Fyfe," arrived here on Monday last from Cay Sal Bank, and reports that on Saturday, the 23d inst., he came to anchor on the north side of Anguilla Cay, and saw a brigantine having sailed from there early in the morning, and he saw no more of her till Monday evening. Captain Evans left the north side of Anguilla Cay at 6 o'clock on account of a heavy surge; and in going around the south side between the cay, passed a large brigantine under the cay, on the southeast under sail. As soon as she discovered the schooner steering for her, she hove to a little, and then bore away with all sail set. The crew of the John W. going ashore found there in a thatched house with a road leading up to it. The house was about seven feet high and ten feet square. It had a window in it with a loaded gun on it, and a globe lamp hanging up. They brought away No. 1, which was found concealed in the schooner, heard a loud noise on the west side of the cay, supposed to have come from a great many persons. They then went back to the house, emptied the water-casks, and brought all they could away. The two-casks of demijohns, some iron hoops, a few bullets, and the roof of the house, about a half of powder. They saw never the house about a dozen tame fowls. A large hole was also found in the cay, which was dug into, etc. The house is situated in a valley between two hills."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

HEENAN AND SAYERS.

Two fee-simile of the Champion's Belt were presented to Sayers and Heenan, at the Alhambra London, on the evening of the 30th. The entertainment consisted of singing and dancing and dances; between the parts the belts were brought in, and the ceremony of presentation was performed. The belt was of the value of £100, richly chased, stripped all their coats, buckled on their belts, and walked around the ring arm in arm. The performances, as it was called, to be repeated twice a day during the week.

The London Times says it objects that Heenan is only fought two battles in his life—who was defeated in America. We are inclined to suppose he is the champion of a belt bearing the inappropriate inscription of the championship of England.

A FOOLHARDY BET.

A young man, who works in the coal-mines of Gill, near Chatford, lately made a bet at a public-house that he was to walk the length of the railway and let a train pass over him. Accordingly, on the day fixed for the purpose, placing himself lengthwise in the middle of the line between the sleepers, he lay down with his head close to one of his bet, but at the expense of a severe burn on the back of his head. He was then taken up and carried to his home, added to which he will be brought before the Correctional Police for his impropriety.

FRANCE.

THE PRINCE IMPERIAL KISSES A SURGET.

After a week of Paris in holiday attire, quiet occurred, which produced a very pleasing impression on the minds of the people. The Emperor and Prince Imperial remained some time on the course after the Emperor's departure; and when the Prince had dismounted from his pony and was walking along, the people approached to take a nearer view of the imperial party. The young Prince was the object of espécial notice, which increased enthusiastic and loud. On Thursday, July 5, while a nice little boy about his own age, accompanied by his father and mother, came near to where the Prince stopped short, and then, as if moved by an irresistible impulse, the boy kissed the hand of the young Napoleon. All who witnessed this little scene were greatly touched with the feelings of affectionate regard for the Prince, and expressed their delight by loud acclamation.

ITALY.

GARIBALDI'S PROGRESS.

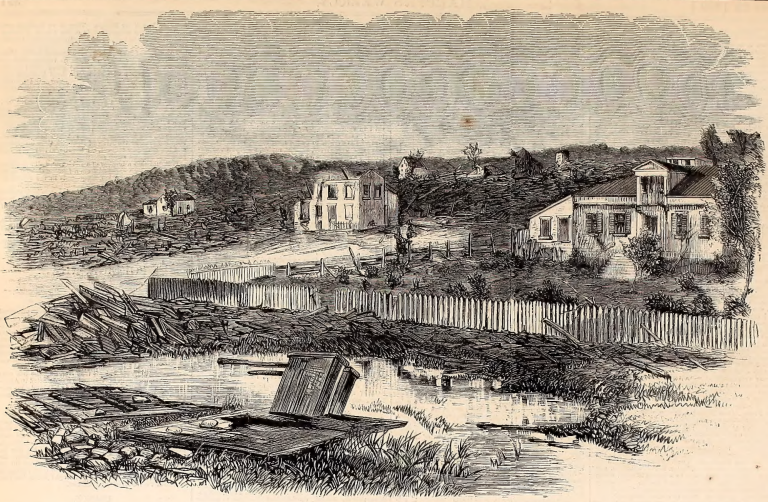
The reports of Garibaldi's successes are confirmed. He attacked Palermo on the morning of the 27th. Fighting on the morning of the 27th, and penetrated to the centre of the city. On the 28th, after a continuation of six hours' duration, and during an active bombardment by the sea and land. The royal troops retired to the palace and the other public buildings. Hostilities were resumed, and the royal troops were taken by surrender, and in the evening burned down. Less is killed and wounded were considerable. In Regalbuto, Garibaldi met a great reception. to American citizens at Palermo. There was great agitation in Naples and Admiral Mundy called. The Ministers tendered their resignation on the 29th. A Liberal Cabinet was expected to be formed. Garibaldi was already carrying out important administration reforms at all points of the country. A dispatch, dated Palermo, dated June 1, says that an armistice had been agreed upon between Garibaldi and the Neapolitan General. Before termination on Sunday, the 3d inst. The populace at Naples were greatly excited at the news of the armistice. "Down to Emanuel!" and "Sicily!" were raised on the streets.

THE ARMISTICE.

While events of the most stirring character are occurring Europe, the Roman Court is curiously engaged, and in obedience to public sentiment is preparing to recently figured abuses, but in a rather superficial manner. This, which is similar to the amnesty which has been granted on the 20th inst., and the promotion of a fourth rail of the Roman Court. The Pope has written to France to-decree—this reciprocal of a holy hole being a French monument of Napoleon I. and Marie Louise. Marie Louise was born in 1776, of whom little is known save that she begged to be allowed to go to grave, was actually so late as 1853 the subject of enthusiastic letters and reports from the Roman Court. Affairs.

Count de Vengeance writes from Versailles, August 14, 1793, relative to the Duke of Orleans, who was put to a fanatical imprisonment in religious, and was at last executed in the Revolutionary Tribunal in 1793, and then Clement XIV. thought favorably of the Duke, and he was released though afterwards executed. Louis Philippe being so many sanctified by the Church. Louis Philippe is now in the Roman Court, and the Duke of Orleans is to be the subject of the highest eulogy on the part of the French Emperor.

THE TYCOON ATTACKED.



A private letter, dated Sickahama, April 3, and received in London, says:

"About a week ago Prince Gokaiso, when on his way from his palace residing to the palace of the King, with his usual guard of sixteen, was attacked by a party of fourteen. One of the guard and four of the assailants were killed, and several on each side wounded, including the Prince himself. Fortunately for him, the guard fought bravely during the attack on the Prince. One of the assailants was severely wounded, and, with his comrades, to prevent his detection, cut off his head and made his escape through one of the gates of the castle land. The Tycoon ordered the officers in charge of the gate to commit hara-kiri, which they did. It is thought by many that a revolution is impending, which, if successful, will result in the speedy expulsion or death of all foreigners. The Government has taken extraordinary precautions to protect itself and this place from assault. Guard-houses have been established along the road to Yedda, and also at the Tycoon's palace."

THE GREAT TORNADO.—RUINS OF ALBANY CITY, ILLINOIS.

THE GREAT TORNADO.

We present some sketches of the ruins of Albany City, Illinois, and Camanche, Iowa, the two places which suffered most severely from the tornado which swept over Western Illinois and Eastern Iowa on the evening of Sunday, June 3. Our engravings are from photographs taken for us on the ground by Messrs. William Field, of Fulton City, and G. H. Joslyn, of Camanche.

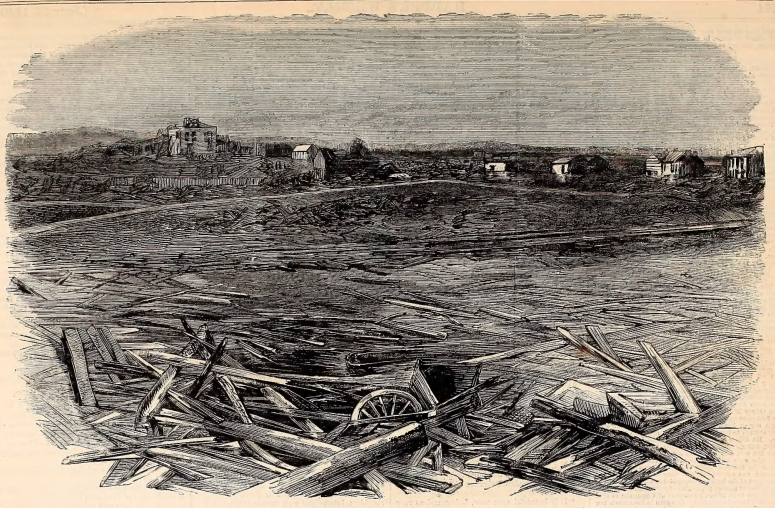
The Fulton Courier for June 8 contains an excellent report of the dreadful scene, in which two towns and an immense amount of property were in a few minutes utterly destroyed. To it we are indebted for the following facts:

The tornado commenced about five miles beyond Cedar Rapids, and moved in almost a direct easterly course. It was of the nature of a whirlwind, or, as some say, of two whirlwinds moving in the same direction, and near each other. In shape they resembled a funnel. The larger villages between Cedar Rapids and the Mississippi escaped a visit of this fearful destroyer; but much damage was done to property before reaching Camanche, and from fifty to sixty lives were lost.

CAMANCHE.

The storm reached Camanche at 7 30 P.M. It came with a hollow, rumbling noise heralding its approach, which sounded like a heavy train of cars passing over a bridge. Moving with the velocity of lightning, it struck the devoted town, and the fearful work of havoc commenced. The scene that followed, as given by eye-witnesses, can neither be imagined nor described. Amidst the roar of the tempest, the rustling of the wind, the reverberating peals of thunder, the vivid flashes of lightning, the pelting of the rain, the crash of falling buildings, the agonizing shrieks of terror-stricken women and children, the bewildered attempts to escape, and the moans of the dying, but little opportunity was left to observe the general appearance of the blow.

Parents caught their children in their arms and rushed frantic for any place that seemed to promise safety. Many found refuge in cellars, which to others proved graves. So sudden was the shock that many in the upper parts of buildings were left no time to flee to other parts.



To go outside was as hazardous as to remain within. The turbulent air was filled with fragments of lumber, furniture, and trees, flying in every direction with the force of cannon-balls.

DURATION OF THE TORNADO.

Amidst such intense excitement, attended with such fatal consequences, moments seem years. But from statements that beyond doubt are correct, the storm did not rage less than two and a half nor more than five minutes. It would seem impossible, on looking at the devastation, to suppose it the work of an short a time. Darkness immediately closed over the scene, and left a pall over the town only equaled by the darker gloom that draped the hearts of the survivors of the disaster.

THE SCENE, NEXT MORNING, AT ALBANY.

Heavy warehouses were lifted entire and removed some considerable distance, strong brick and stone buildings entirely demolished, while the lighter frame dwelling-houses were in most cases entirely swept away. We could not estimate the whole number of buildings injured, but could learn of not over three houses in the whole town that were not more or less damaged—most of them destroyed. The ground was strewed with fragments of boards. The hotel kept by Captain Barnes was not moved from its foundation, but part of the roof and inside partitions were carried away. The brick (Presbyterian) Church was leveled to the ground, and the Congregational much injured. The brick and stone houses seemed to afford but little more protection than the frame, and when they fell gave, of course, less chance of escape. But one piece of business (Mr. Pease's) was left in a condition to use. The buildings, household furniture, provisions, and every thing in fact, in most instances, were swept beyond the reach of recovery. The ferry-boat was lifted from the water and laid upon the shore. Cattle, horses, and hogs were killed or driven away by the irresistible element. The loss of life, however, was far less than could have been expected. But five persons were killed, and perhaps fifty or sixty injured.

AT CAMANCHE.

The town was almost completely destroyed. A very few buildings were, as if by miracle, left standing, but even these were more or less injured. The ground was covered with splinters, boards, furniture, etc., completely shivered to pieces. Nothing perfect or whole was to be seen, but every thing looked as though it had been riven by lightning. The larger trees were blown down; while on the smaller ones that would yield to the wind, were to be seen tattered pieces of clothing, carpets, pillows, and even mattresses nearly torn to shreds. The river below was covered with marks of the storm, and much property was lost by being swept into the water. The general appearance of the ground was much like the traces left by a torrent where flood-wood is left lying in its path. Where buildings once stood is now a mass of unsightly ruins. It is with difficulty that the lines of former streets can be traced. Frame-houses were swept away or turned into every conceivable variety of positions. Dead animals were left floating in the river or lying among the ruins. The feathers on the poultry were even stripped from their bodies. Every thing was so completely scattered and destroyed that it was useless to attempt to recover any thing, and the citizens could only sit down in despair. Until 12 M. of Monday the work of exhuming the bodies from the fallen ruins was still progressing. In one room that we visited the bodies of children and females were lying (ten or twelve in number) clothed in their white winding-sheets. It was a sight that we pray may never again be ours to witness. The little children, in particular, had but few facial injuries, and lay as if sleeping.

THE DEAD AND MISSING.

To all, thirty-eight persons were reported missing at Camanche, and thirty-two bodies had been found.

Absent-nightly were reported as wounded, some of whom have since died.

Information has been received that furnishes us with reliable accounts of 339 deaths caused by the tornado along the line of the Iowa and Nebraska road, including Camanche. On the Illinois side of the river the loss of life has not been quite so great, but we think we are safe in putting the total number of killed at 175. The wounded are by far more numerous, while the loss of property can not be definitely estimated. We hear of 150 cattle in one yard in Iowa that were all killed. Farm-houses, fences, crops, railroad cars, and all property that fell in the path of the tornado, was laid in fragments. There were hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of property destroyed, much of which will never be replaced.

EXTENT OF THE STORM.

The tornado commenced in Linn County, Iowa, and stopped, as near as we can learn, in the vicinity of Elgin, in this State, thus traversing a distance of 180 miles. It varied in width from a half mile to two miles. It, of course, would carry objects sometimes as regards its direction, moving as it did with the motion of a whirlwind. We can now learn that it has been lifted from its foundation, and carried two hundred feet in a course directly contrary to the regular course of the tornado.

INCIDENTS.

The escapes in all the places where the storm poured were often truly miraculous. In Albany, Mr. Stevenson had repaired to the church for the purpose of ringing the bell for worship, but hearing the appearance of a terrible approaching, concluded not to ring it. Had the congregation been called together it would have been certain death to all, as the walls of the church, being built of brick, fell in a mass inside. We have a story that had been carried several rods with three persons in it, and set down without damage to the occupants, a distance a little daughter of Mr. Swett was lying on a bed, and was blown with it several rods into a grove, from which it came unharmed calling for its mother. An infant son of Mr. Wm. Bowen, Riley was found asleep, and it is thought that her own weight upon it was the cause of its safety. A family took refuge in a large chest which, fortunately, proved strong enough to protect them from a mass of rubbish that covered them. Mrs. Oliver M'Mahan fell to a place where the floor of the first story had been previously partly destroyed, receiving a leg or heel. The joists fell over her, but were hung around to cover the bend, and thus protected her life. Mr. Elliot had at one time been safely secure in his cellar, but going up for something, he stepped out from the cold was killed instantly. We saw two children who were killed in the arms of their mother, and Mr. Camanche the first story of a hardware store, with its contents, was carried into the river and sunk, while the upper part of the building dropped down square upon the foundation so nearly as to place there by carpenters. A child was blown from fifteen miles west of Camanche to that place and found uninjured. One man in Iowa was carried up 200 feet. A family on a farm took refuge in a "potato hole," where they remained secure, while the rest of their left was completely demolished. Pieces of boards were picked up clinging to the trees in Camanche, in the north and south directions. A wagon was lifted into the air, broken to pieces, and the tire of one of the wheels cut out of all shape. Nine freight cars standing on the track at Camanche were some distance from where they were standing. The tornado raised immediately over the house of Mr. Minto, in Garden Plain, and descended to strike the next house beyond. We noticed that those living in frame-houses met with less loss than the inmates of brick or stone houses.

A gentleman in the west informs us that a small boy was blown across Cedar River and his mangled body left in the front of his father's door.

In one family all that was left were three little girls, the eldest not over four and two children having been instantly killed. We saw where a fence found had been forced down on the side of a house, under which two hundreds of shingles had forced themselves clear through the clap-boards of a house.

Another eye-witness says:

A chimney weighing about two tons was broken off at its junction with the roof, lifted into the air, and thrown down into the front yard, burying itself in the ground a depth of two feet without breaking or cracking a single brick. A light pine shingle was driven from the outside through the clapboards, lath, and plaster, and projected two inches from the inside wall of a dwelling-house. No other known fact could have accomplished this. A common trowel, such as is used by masons, was driven through a pine log in the side of a house, projecting six or two inches. In one spot was found a large pile of bookcovers, every one of which was gone, and which must be a thousand sheets. Leaves were stripped of their tissue, leaving the fibers clean and bare as if a botanist had nearly picked it off. Tree trunks were twisted several times round, and were then broken off. The Mitchell House, a three-story brick structure, fronting south, was lifted up from its foundation and turned completely round, so that the front door faced the south. It then collapsed, and fell in an outwardly as it was upon the north, and, strange to relate, out of seventeen persons in the house only two were killed. One house was lifted and was lifted from its foundation and whirled into the river, crushing as it fell and drowning three persons, all Germans.

A plane was taken out of a house in the centre of the town and carried some distance to the river bank without breaking it.

The effects upon some of the houses near Camanche, which were in the outer edge of the tornado, were curious. Upon some roofs the shingles were stripped off in parallel rows, a barn door upon one end would be resembling the figure 8. Some roofs were entirely unshingled, and in some cases every clap-board was taken off. The sides of some houses were literally perforated with boards, shingles, timbers, and sharp stakes. In some parts of Camanche, where houses stood thickly clustered together, there is not a vestige of one left. Another tract of about forty acres is covered with splinters of about two feet in length. The lower stories of some houses were blown lout entirely, leaving the upper story upon the ground. The town is entirely ruined, and we can not see how it can ever be rebuilt. There are whole blocks of this that are cleared entirely, with nothing but the cellars to indicate that a house ever stood there.

The whole atmosphere around the place is sickening, and a stench is pervading the whole path of the storm that is almost impossible to endure.

THE NEW PYGMALION.

IT was one of those warm and balmy days that scatter the snowy rags of winter with mischievous parentheses. The dreamy sunshine slanted, like a golden mist, through the southwest window of Philip Amber's studio, and gilded bronze and marble with mellow lustre. A half dozen or so of torpid flies, partially resuscitated by the unusual warmth, crooned a monotonous roundelay on the sunny panes; and the old-fashioned time-piece that stood, grim and stately, in the corner, ticked solely, like the voice of an accusing spirit, through the little apartment, where the patient sculptor worked steadily at a plaster model, whose dainty proportions were just beginning to rise from out the almost shapeless mass before him.

That little studio, with its high, oak-grained walls, and wide, deep-seated windows, was a miniature museum of the beautiful. Grand, old paintings, copies and originals of the ancient masters, invited the appreciative eye to feast upon their mellow beauty. A large engraving of Raphael's Sistine Madonna, hallowed with its divine features a shadowy niche, that only yesterday had been taper to complete its resemblance to those old-world shrines and oratories where the devout pay their adoration to the Virgin. Statuettes of the Venus di Medici and the Apollo Belvedere glanced at each other from opposite brackets, while a beautiful cast of Dannecker's Ariadne adorned the mantle.

This last work was Philip's especial favorite. To his kindling glance it was deeply suggestive; and he once remarked that humanity is borne away on the tide of its evil passions, as Ariadne is borne by the ferocious tiger, while her fair beauty, the body, and passions the soul.

The afternoon deepened toward the twilight. An ashen cloud swept the western sky, like a drop-curtain, leaving but a narrow strip of fiery orange crowning the mountain-tops, which scarcely visible from the studio windows. Long shadows glanced the corners of the room with dusky impertinence; and the sculptor, laying aside his work, withdrew a short distance to view the result of his long day's toil.

A smile of satisfaction hovered about his mobile lips, and touched their saddened expression with a quiet grace; when the door softly opened, and there entered a young girl, whose pale, earnest face bore a faint resemblance to Raphael's Madonna di San Sisto.

"It is you, Miriam?" asked the sculptor.

"Yes, father," the young girl answered in clear, soft tones, "it is me; and are you not ready to leave your work? It is already late, and you have we here?" she asked, with an air of surprise, and she raised the curtain which hung before the more distinctly the plaster mould on which her father had been engaged.

"Beautiful, father, beautiful!" she exclaimed; "and this is Evangeline?"

Her blue eyes glowed with unusual warmth as she spoke, and her appreciative enthusiasm lent new emphasis to her voice.

"Yes, it is my Evangeline," the sculptor answered, pleasantly; "and you like it, Miriam?" "I wait till it's completed, then see what you think of it."

"It is beautiful even now, father, and so very like some one I have seen; but come, tea is waiting."

And the two left the studio arm in arm for the adjoining room, which seemed the very abode of domestic happiness, every thing bore such a tasteful, home-like air. A bright coal fire glared in the grate, the curtains shut out from sight the crowded streets of the city, and the table, spread on the tea-table, screened by a salmon-tinted shade, diffused a mellow, subdued radiance throughout the little apartment.

When tea was nearly finished a servant entered and handed the sculptor a letter, which the postman had just left at the door.

"Whom is it from?" asked Miriam, laying her hand on her father's shoulder as he folded the letter carefully up after reading it, and fell into a brown study.

"What did you say?" he asked, abstractedly. "There is a letter for you?"

"No; not for me, but for yourself."

Miriam took the letter from its envelope, and drawing nearer the lamp, she perused its contents, which ran thus:

"BOSTON, January 14, 18—.

"DEAR PHILIP,—After so long a silence I hesitate to write you concerning something which has caused me no slight anxiety; and I trust the long and well-tried friendship which has existed between us will be sufficient excuse for troubling you in the matter.

"My only child, as you already know, has long desired to become a sculptor; he feels that his talent lies in that direction, and I have not the heart to oppose him in all such eccentric ideas, and to divert his mind from this strange desire. But all in vain, as this letter proves; and now, in his extremity, he looks to you, my friend, whether or not you can take him under your guidance for a few months. God knows I am no advocate for pupil; and hoping you will find it convenient to accede to his and my request, I am,

"Truly, your friend,

"PAUL FELDING."

"What shall you do, father?" asked Miriam, handing back the letter, and regarding the sculptor's expressive countenance.

"I will see," he calmly answered. "And yet I can not well refuse," he added, musingly.

"Oh, take him, father," said Miriam, smiling. "You have often complained of being lonely, and now you need a Ferdinand to complete the comparison. Say 'Yes,' dear Prospero!" And the young girl laughed at her own fancy, while her half-awakened the sleeping canaries on their perches.

"Yes it so, then," replied the sculptor; "but guard well your heart, my little one, or

"'I'll break my staff,
Bury it certain fathoms in the earth,
And deeper than did ever plummet sound,
I'll drown my book.'

"Spare your admonitions, father. You have no 'rough magic to abjure,'" answered Miriam. "I shall always remain with you, and never hold any one dearer."

The sculptor smiled doubtingly; and drawing his daughter fondly toward him, whispered, gayly,

"Perhaps so. Don't be too sure, my darling."

Miriam blushed a dainty crimson, and darting away from his embrace opened the Alexandre organ that stood near by, and commenced playing an accompaniment to that plaintive old Scotch air, "Annie Laurie," which she sung in a soft, soprano voice.

There are some songs which become to the heart as a sort of bosom friend and confidant, to whom we intrust our dearest thoughts and emotions. So it was with this mournful tune, sad as the evening winds that bend the heather on the Highland moors, and which found a deep response in the young girl's soul, prematurely saddened by suffering and affliction.

While Miriam sang the sculptor's mind was lapped in a tender melancholy, a twilight of joy and sorrow, as he recalled the happy past, plucking here and there from its faded pastures a few withered flowers that scented the present with the merest ghost of an odor. He was dwelling, in memory, on the sweet face of his wife, who had "gone before," and whose fair lineaments he was striving to reproduce in his statue of Evangeline.

But he soon aroused himself from his unusual reverie, and commenced a reply to his friend Felding, offering to receive Raphael as a pupil.

Miriam looked forward to young Felding's arrival with eager joy. She had always led a sober, secluded life, seldom seeing persons of her own age and station; so the coming of this fellow-pupil raised to the quiet "Bermoothes" of the sculptor's home, formed a pleasant break in her life's dull monotony. Therefore it was nothing strange that between the two there should spring up a warm, devoted friendship. Young, enthusiastic, and gifted with artistic sympathies, each could understand for the other; and their acquaintance progressed from day to day till it finally deepened into intimacy.

Some one has quaintly remarked that "Friendship waits upon lovers, and love upon wings." But with Miriam and Raphael Cupid soon gained himself pinions, and burst full-fledged upon their dazzled vision. Their hearts commended its new sentiments from the other, and each half-assured, half-fearful, a strange timidity grew up between them, and the old friendship was no longer a bond of union.

Meanwhile the sculptor had completed his model of Evangeline—a thing of wondrous skill and beauty. He might have called it the statue of a lady, rather than a mere book and abstraction was the air that breathed from every feature. In realizing his ideal the sculptor had chosen the moment, so beautifully described in the poem of Evangeline, having journeyed to the Jesuit Mission, where she is informed by the priest that Gabriel "is dead, and sleeps in the churchyard."

"Let me remain with thee, for my soul is sad and afflicted."

He represented her standing with bowed head and clasped hands, her rosary hanging from her waist, and her long wavy hair flowing over her shoulders, forming the lower of the picture.

Adjoining Philip's studio was a large gallery, of which he was the superintendent, where artists were wont to display their productions, and there he placed his Evangeline, having invited a few artist-friends, with their wives and daughters, to view it, and pronounce their opinion on the successful completion.

"Can we not have some tableaux from the young folk?" asked Philip, of Miriam and Raphael; "there is nearly a week to practise."

"Oh, yes," answered Miriam, pleased with the idea; leave them to me, and I will get them up. Will you help me, Raphael?" And so the tableaux were immediately decided upon and arranged. Miriam chose the part of Evangeline. "I will rival your statue, father" she said, gayly; "am I not pretemptuous?"

"Rather," replied Philip; "but Heaven preserve you from a similar fate, un bien-aimé?"

The appointed night at last arrived; and Raphael, longing to make known his love to the sculptor's daughter, and uncertain of what response awaited him, still dreadfully restless and impatient to view the wondrous statue, unconscious of its return to the studio, Miriam had preceded him there a few moments, and in the somber twilight she practiced her attitude for Evangeline.

Raphael entered silently, and paused himself in a dark alcove. Miriam had just arranged her position, and stood in graceful beauty, her auburn hair cascade lightly upon the moonlight that streamed in at the dome—pripling negligently over her whitrobed shoulders, and her hands clasped, as if in prayer for relief from God.

"A glorious statue!" thought Raphael. "The counterpart of Miriam's mother, and of Miriam herself," he added aloud. "Ah, if she only returned my affection!"

And he arose to approach the statue.

But in her profound reverie, and left the new Pygmalion confused and astounded. Gradually the hands dropped upon his bewildered mind, and he departed in search of Miriam; but the arrival of guests detained him.

A disheartening thought now occurred. When Love enters the soul he seldom fails to discover, with his keen, searching gaze, a legion of fears and distrusts lurking there, like so many ghosts, to frighten him away.

"If Miriam loves me, why did she not confess her feelings, instead of fleeing so hastily, when I revealed her mine in such an open, though unintentional manner?"

Raphael could give himself no satisfactory answer; and turning round, he saw the pseudo-statue conversing with a well-known artist. Miriam's face was as pale as Carrara marble; agitation was visible in every feature and movement; and when Raphael left the statue arrived she crossed herself from representing Evangeline, on piece of indisposition. She avoided Raphael all the evening; and when their guests departed she withdrew to her chamber, giddy, confused, and racked with emotion.

The next morning she excused herself from breakfast. Her father went to her room, and found her ill with a low, nervous fever. Toward evening her mind grew delirious; her thoughts wandered; and she murmured in a confused manner of Evangeline, and Raphael, who watched beside her, stung with unutterable fears, had implering God to restore her to health. Oh ye who have watched long days and longer nights by the bedside of one you loved with passionate affection, whose life trembled in the balance and threatened to expire, starting at each movement of the fever-sleeper, tracing the dusky shadows gathering about the eyes, feeling the fluttering pulse, and listening, ever and anon, to murmured words of delirium—ye alone can tell how lengthy seemed that week to him, and how deep was his anxiety, who loved the sculptor's daughter with all the affection that Gabriel cherished for Evangeline!

But Miriam at last grew better. It was a warm mid-April evening; the sun had just sunk behind the hills, and the curtains of the sick-chamber were opened wide to let in the lingering light. She had slept nearly all the afternoon, and now she stirred uneasily, her eyes opened, and she whispered, "Raphael!"

He was beside her in a moment; but nothing more was said, save what was uttered by their eyes' mute eloquence.

The doctor soon entered, and bidding her be quiet, he left her to repose. Then, while Raphael continued his faithful watch beside her, but now more calm and happy. That single word, "Raphael," opened to his soul visions of peace and blessedness.

The next morning Miriam sat up in bed, propped by bolster and pillows. A young girl is beautiful in the full glow of health, doubly so when careful pleasures and dainty triumphs of her age; but she is never more beautiful than when convalescent. Sympathy, love's next-door neighbor, then joins herself to admiration, and a young man's heart is prone easily to withstand such allied forces that raise gentle mutiny and assault him in his own domain.

"What book are you reading?" Miriam asked Raphael, as she inhaled the fragrance of a bouquet of wood-violets and anemones.

He closed the volume with a confused air, and answered, hesitatingly,

"Longfellow's 'Evangeline.'"

Miriam's pale cheeks flushed a delicate scarlet, and, in a faltering voice, she said,

"Read me the last canto, Raphael."

The young man commenced reading in a low, tremulous tone; but when he reached the touching passage descriptive of Evangeline's recognition of Gabriel in the crowd, his voice could read no further; but throwing the book aside, he grasped the invalid's unresisting hands, and raising them to his lips he stammered, brokenly,

"Oh, Miriam! let me be thy Gabriel, and thou be my Evangeline!"

Miriam closed her eyes dreamily, as if listening to music she had long been thirsting to hear.

"Nay, our love will terminate in no such fate," whispered the invalid, softly. "But I will be thy Miranda, and thou my Ferdinand!"

"Ah, yes," said Raphael, gratefully. "But here comes Prospero. Let us ask his consent."

"Which I grant," said the sculptor, seeing the happy looks of the young lover, and guessing the state of things. "In the words of my worthy prototype: 'Sit then and talk with her—she is thine own.' But, sir, ne'er, you promised never to hold any dearer than me."

Miriam saw sunk in too blissful a reverie to reply; while Raphael was busy replying to her fair-tures, which he reproduced a few months afterward in a statue of "Miranda confessing her love to Ferdinand" that gained him great applause.

ANCELLA

BY A. BARRY.

WHEN the sun comes through the windows,
And through the open door,
With a gray and golden carpet
Striping the kitchen floor,

He can not choose but kiss her,
As quiet and pale she stands
Wringing the coarse white garments
With her little reddened hands.

He follow'd her when she splashes
Her hands in the foamy tub,
Half encircles her waist so slender
As she leans o'er the board to rub.

When round her pale, wide forehead
His fingers have toying been
I wonder if he hath listened
To the thoughts that sing within.

I know that her lips have murmured
Of Enid and Elaine,
Or some passionate words in German,
Matched with a mournful strain.

This pale-faced maid in the kitchen
Hath dreams as sweet and rare
As ever in poet's story
Had lady or princess fair.

All the maidens of earth may see,
Knows well there is not a princess
More pure and good than she.

THE BROKEN MERCHANT.

"You remember the fall of ——57?"

"It would be singular if I did not."

Two merchants were in conversation. One, the first speaker, was a man past fifty, with a face that showed marks of care and anxious thought—not present care and thought, but only the signs of what had been. You saw at a glance that life's hard experience in the business world had not deadened the best of human sympathy in his heart. The other was a younger man, with a firm, confident mouth, and an eye that showed energy and purpose. There was nothing of the selfish hardness that we often see in countenances of his type.

"Have you not missed old familiar faces since then?" said the elder of the two men.

"Many," was answered. "Many. Yet no one seems to think of the wounded or maimed in life's battle."

"No; not of what they may yet be suffering."

"How quickly a man who is thrust by misfortune outside of our business circle is forgotten!"

"Yes. Or if remembered, it is with an unforgiving spirit for the loss that was suffered when he fell. You have not forgotten T. L—— & Co.?"

"No; of course not. Poor man! He struggled hard to keep up when that fearful storm raged; but it was too fierce and strong for him. Oh, yes, I remember L——."

"I saw him a few days ago."

"Ah! Is he in the city?"

"Yes, actively, in our vicinity."

"There was scarcely a day, for years before the 'panic,' that I did not meet him. Our houses had many transactions together. But since that time he has not once crossed my path. He vanished from among us like one who dies. I have not thought of him for more than a year. And he is still in or near the city?"

"Yes."

"What is he doing?"

"Much, I think. You remember what a fine presence he had. What a steady eye, and uplifted countenance?"

"Very well. He was one of the pleasantest men to do business with I ever knew. Prompt, gentlemanly, clear-headed, and highly honorable."

"You would hardly know him now."

"Indeed!"

"The change is painful. If any who lost by his failure remember him with unkindness, they need only to see him to dismiss the feeling."

"I thought," said the younger of the two men, "that L—— had naturally a great deal of reactive power—that if he went down in any disaster, he would struggle up again."

"Such was my opinion. But it seems that we were mistaken. He was proud and sensitive; and felt himself, in a certain sense, disgraced by his failure. Some merchants fall half a dozen times in their lives, scramble up on their feet again, look boldly or bravely into men's faces, and move onward as confidently as if nothing had happened. There are others of finer or weaker stuff, who are too cowardly, or too sensitive on the score of obligation, to face their old associates. But L—— is one of these. Poor man! I feel sad when I think about him."

"When and where did you see him? I am interested in his case."

"I am glad to hear you use the word interest. It was in order to awaken in your mind a feeling of interest for Mr. L—— that I spoke of him. As a class we are to blame for the sympathy with men who, after suffering misfortune in business, shrink away from among us into almost helpless obscurity. Business honor is a sacred thing in the minds of all right thinking men. A true merchant is sensitive on this point in a high degree. Touch him here, and you touch him vitally. He may never recover from the wound. He goes out from among us, but comes not back. We neglect, perhaps forget him; he is stung to the quick. He feels disgraced. All his mind falls into morbid action. Alas! how many hundreds of such, whose faces we have not seen for years, are hiding from common observation in our city, suffering poverty as well as pain! We forget our business associates too soon. We let them pass from our memories and our sympathies as if they were only automatons.

"But I was speaking of Mr. L——. You have the old, pleasant picture of him in your mind. Look at it for a moment. Now I give you the reverse. I was over in Williamsburg a few days ago; and having occasion to make an inquiry, stepped into a little office where orders were taken for coal. It was not in size over six by eight feet. In one corner was an [illegible] gum-looking pine desk, at which a man sitting. His dress was in keeping with the place, and not exactly in keeping either; for I noticed [illegible] though worn, soiled, and mended in places [illegible] here, it was not of common material. [illegible] answered in a polite, kind way; [illegible] ered, and stirred my feel[illegible] My glance into his face [illegible] ression of that lin[illegible] said I to my[illegible] 'Who can he be?' And I tried hard to identify the voice and features. But no familiar personality came up in my mind. After transacting the business which took me to Williamsburg, I made my way to the ferry, and was stepping on board the boat to return to New York when my perplexity of mind in regard to the individuality of the man I had seen for only a moment became so intensive that, I stood still, and said to myself:

"'I must know who he is.'

"Turning, I walked slowly along the street, questioning in my mind as to whether I should go back to the coal-office, or ask, in the neighborhood of its location, for the merchant's name. I concluded to see the man himself, and so called once more at the office. I found him still sitting at the high desk, which took up nearly half the space inclosed by the office walls.

"'Did you find the place?' he asked, as I looked in at the door. There was a kind, gentlemanly manner about him, but not much life in his tones. I was more struck than at first with the familiar expression of his countenance. The voice I had certainly known before.

"I thanked him for the direction he had given me, and replied that I had found the place I was seeking. Then I said:

"'Haven't I met you before, Sir? I ought to know your face.'

"I was struck with his changed expression. The inquiry was plainly not readily agreeable.

"'Pardon me,' I said, quickly, 'if my question is in any way obtrusive.' He had dropped his face a little, and turned it partly away.

"'No, Sir, it is not,' was answered, still with his face slightly averted. There was a subdued tone in his voice, which was not sad-ness, yet no one could hear it stirred in me a feeling of sympathy. 'You have met me before.'

"'Where?' I looked at him closely, but failed to make out his identity.

"'In New York.' Still I was at fault.

"'May I ask your name?'

"He raised his eyes, and looked at me steadily for a few moments—steadily, and I thought curiously.

"'And you have really forgotten me!' A faint sigh came to my ears. 'But no wonder,' he added, in a lower voice, 'I am not as I was when we met almost daily. Misfortune breaks a man down, and changes him rapidly. My name is L——.'

"'Not of the old firm of T. L—— & Co.?'

"'The same.' My look of surprise did not seem to stir the dead level of his feelings.

"I took his hand and held it firmly, while I looked into his waist countenance with all the kind interest I felt.

"'It can't be possible,' I said. 'T. L——!'

"'It is possible and actual,' he replied.

"'You knew me?'

"'Certainly, the moment you came in.'

"'Why didn't you call me by name?' I asked.

"'You might not have cared to know me; and I have no desire to intrude myself upon old business acquaintances.'

"'This is not the place for you,' said I, glancing around the little office. 'My time was firm.

"'I have learned to be thankful for even a place like this,' he replied.

"'How can you be touched me! For my thought went back to that neatly carpeted counting-room in which you and I have so often sat with him; to the large warehouse that held the costly goods that were his own; to the elegant home in which he had surrounded his family with luxury. Thankful even for that narrow apartment, with its high desk, that to close walls as if it were a coffin! And surely the man had buried his hopes there. What a change for two short years!'

"'Is this business your own?' I asked.

"'Oh no!' The answer was quick, as if the very question surprised him.

"'You are paid for attending the office and taking orders?'

"'Yes.'

"'Do not think me intrusive, but I would like to ask as to the salary you get.'

"His brows closed a little. 'Three hundred dollars,' he replied, after some hesitation.

"'Only three hundred!' I did not attempt to conceal my surprise.

"He smiled faintly, repeating, in answer, what he had said before—that he learned to be thankful for even a place like this.'

"'But,' said I, 'you are competent to fill a better and higher place. This won't do. A man with your business capabilities must not be lost from his sight sphere.'

"'I don't know that I have any business capabilities,' he answered, in a despondent way.

"'Others know it if you do not,' said I, confidently. 'But why have you kept yourself so entirely aloof from your old friends?'

"'Friends? I have no friends.'

"'Old business friends, I mean.'

"'There are no friendships in business,' he replied, contracting his brows.

"'Business is business, and friendship friendship,' I returned. 'Because a man is engaged in business, it isn't conclusive against him that he has no heart.'

"'He may have heart for his own kith and kin, but the men with whom he does business come to be regarded as the tools and machinery by which he makes money. If they break, and can't be mended again, they are cast aside as useless, and no longer thought of or cared for.'

"He spoke with considerable bitterness. I felt the truth of what he said.

"'There are many exceptions to this,' was my answer, 'as you might have proved long ago had you not so wholly withdrawn yourself from old associations.'

"He shook his head doubtfully.

"'What of your family?' I ventured to ask. I remembered his wife and daughters. The former, a bright, intelligent, rather fashionable woman; the latter, two handsome, well-educated girls, who for years had made their way into society a year before their father's failure.

"I half regretted the question, it moved him so strongly. His face, which had shown no very marked feeling, now fairly rippled with emotion.

"'I am not asking from idle curiosity,' said I. 'My interest is sincere. You have not sought me out, but I have discovered you. Will you not speak to me of your present condition as it is?' I remember Mrs. L——, and I remember your daughters. Are they still living?'

"I was sincere, and he could not help feeling it.

"'Yes, thank God!' he replied, in a subdued way. 'They are living, and have been every thing to me.'

"'They are in Williamsburg?'

"'Yes. We live here. The girls are teaching.'

"'A school?' I asked.

"'No; Agnes teaches music, and Clara French and drawing.'

"'New York is a better place for them,' said I.

"'It might be; but we can not afford to live there.'

"He did not answer very freely. Misfortune and suffering had not, it was plain, crushed all the pride out of him. Our interview was embarrassed, at least on his side.

"'I will call on Mrs. L——,' said I, on parting with him. 'There's something better for you than this.' I spoke cheerfully and confidently.

"He thanked me for the interest I had manifested, and went so far as to say that if I could help him into a better position I would lay him under a deep obligation.

The young merchant to whom this relation was made sat silent for some time after his communicative friend left him.

"You have given me the heartache," he said, at length. "I remember Clara and Agnes very well. They were lovely, attractive girls; the reigning belles for a season. But little over two years have gone by, and now they are humble teachers toiling in obscurity for bread. I have daughters, too, and have thought that it may be so with them sends through me a throb of pain. And yet my position in business is not as good as the one that was held by Mr. L——. Will it be my turn next?"

"It is well," said the oldest of the two men, "to bring these matters home to ourselves. It will help us to sympathy for others. Among business men there is too little sympathy for the unfortunate. They go down amidst the stormy waters, and no man thinks of grappling to save them."

"We must save L——," responded the other, resolutely.

"We must. Only three hundred dollars for such a man! Just think of it! Now I will tell you what we can do, if we go rightly to work. I have thought it out; but much will depend on you, as you are younger and more active than I am."

"Tell me what to do and the thing shall be done."

"There is to be an election for President of the A—— Insurance Company on next Monday. L—— is a director, and the salary is twenty-five hundred dollars. I own a few shares of stock, and so do you; and what is better, you are a Director."

"The very place for him!" And the younger of the two merchants struck his hands together. "But how is it to be managed? Colonel is talked about for the place."

"He isn't fit for it. L—— must get the election; and I think you and I can bring the right influence to bear to that end, at least."

"We will!" was the resolute answer.

Where there is a will there is usually the way. A week from the time our kind-hearted merchant met Mr. L—— in his humble position of clerk in a coal-office he saw him again in the same place, and handed him, without a word of comment, a letter announcing his election as President of the A—— Insurance Company. Mr. L—— read it twice before making any response. Then there was a change in his countenance that showed how deep into the merchant's face.

"This is your good work," he said, quietly.

"I have taken part in it," replied the merchant.

L—— grasped his hand, held it tightly for a few moments, and then, as tears fell over his cheeks, said, in a broken voice,

"God bless you!"

The merchant had his reward at that moment in full measure, shaken down and running over.

CHAPTER XXII.

PLEASURE.

"Babette," said Captain Brand, as he tapped a spoon against his coffee-cup and puffed his cigar—while the stout dumb negress was removing the remains of the light dinner—"Babette, old girl, you know that we are going to leave here in a few days, and I should like to know whether you care to go with us or remain here on the island."

The negress made a guttural grunt of assent, and nodded her head till the ends of her Madras turban fluttered.

"Ho! you do, eh? Well, my Babe! I shall be sorry to leave you, for you will be very lonely here, and it may be a long, very long time before I come up this way."

Babette jerked her chin up this time and did not grunt.

"It's all the same, eh? old lady! Well; I shall leave enough to eat to last you a lifetime; but you will have to change your quarters, my Babe, and live in the Padre's shed, for I—I don't think this house will be inhabitable long after I am gone."

The negress gave another grunt and nod of assent.

"Yes. Well, old lady, the matter is decided, then; but in case you should have any visitors here after we have gone, you won't take any trouble to describe to them what you have seen here? No! That shake of your head convinces me—not if they roast you alive?"

The hideous sign of understanding that the woman expressed in her dumb way would have convinced any body without the trouble of uttering a word.

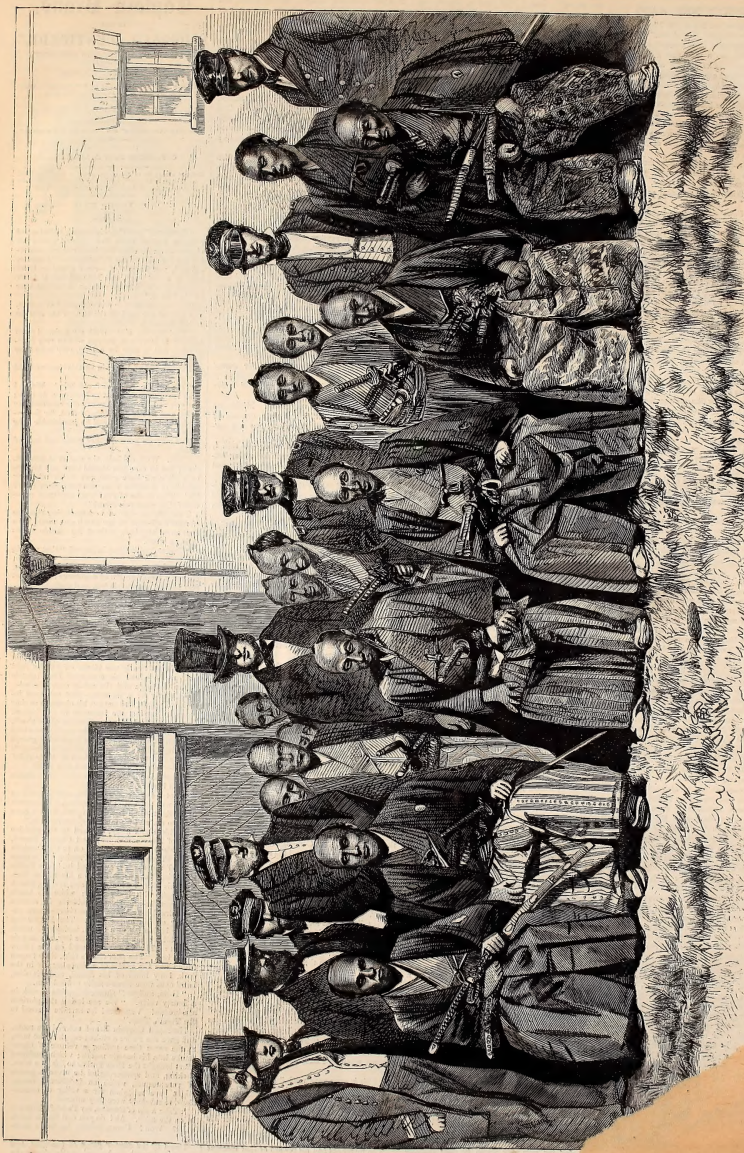
"Bueno," said Captain Brand, "that will do for to-day."

Rising as he spoke, he stepped to a cabinet, slipped a large handful of doubloons in his trowsers-pocket, put on his hat, and walked out.

The sea-breeze swept over the island with its full strength, making the lofty cocoa-nuts bow their lofty heads, the plantain-trees shake their broad flat leaves and clash the stems together. The mangroves bent, too, before the wind, and the small eddied loop in tiny whirls amidst the great expanse of cactus, while the vessels swung with taut chains to their anchors. Even Captain Brand's hat nearly was blown off his dry light hair as he joined his compadre Don Ignacio at the landing; and the sandy dust blinded—though only for a moment—that ancient individual's optic, and put out his cigarrito as they struggled against the intelligent breeze. But they walked on in the direction of the sheds, and as they passed through the court-yard where the men were lounging about in yawning groups or sitting under the piazza, playing cards—getting up and touching their hats as their chief passed—Don Pedillo accosted him thus:

"Capitano, the people are thirsty, and desire a small barrel of wine."

"Not a drop, Señor Pedillo—not so much as would wet the bill of a mosquito! To-morrow at daylight let all hands be called, for we have work to do, and we must be quick to do it."



Pedillo slunk away, abashed by the positive tone of his commander; and Captain Brand, with his cutlass, passed on to the humble abode of the Padre and Doctor. Pausing at the open door of the shed, they looked in. The Padre was lying flat on his back on his narrow bed, with his mouth wide open, and snoring like a bee-hive with lusty stops; while his beads and crucifix—misplaced emblems in contact with drunkenness and debauchery—were reposing on the cheek of the Doctor, who was sitting beside his own couch, whispering words of childish comfort to the little boy, whose pale cheeks and large dark eyes rested on the pillow of the bed. The poor child's thin, limp fingers rested like the petals of a drooping lily in the dusky, bony hand of his friend, and his dim, hazel eyes were turned sadly toward him.

"Hola, amigos!" shouted Captain Brand, in a hearty voice. "We are losing the glorious sea-breeze! Vamonos! let us take a stroll to the Tiger's Trap."

Hereupon Captain Brand entered the room, and gave the Padre a violent tweak of the nose, at the same time puffing a volume of cigar-smoke into his bestly mouth; which combined effort brought the Holy Father to life in a trice, choking, and sputtering, as he arose, a group of paternosters, which an indifferent hearer might have mistaken for a volley of execrations, so savagely were they uttered.

"Take a sip of Geneva, my Padre? There it is, on the table. Ah! do you call half a bottle a sip? Well! Come, Doctor, let us be moving."

Down by the narrow gorge of the inlet, and over the smooth rocks and shelly shore, the party took their way — Don Ignacio leading, with the amiable Priest, on whom he glared with his malevolent eye, as if—he not being a person from whom money or its equivalent could be squeezed—the greedy old Spaniard would like to trundle him with a glance. In the rear came Captain Brand and the Doctor; the former as gay as a bird—of the vulture species—and his companion grave, severe, and preoccupied. Stopping as they reached the Tiger Trap battery, where, after Captain Brand had made a close inspection of the guns, and held sharp confabs with the men who rose to receive him, he moved away a few steps, and resting his body against the lee side of a projecting rock, he removed the cigar from his frozen lips, and said,

"The arguments you have urged, Monsieur, and the views you entertain, have a certain amount of reason in them. It is true you were deceived in coming here, but yet you swore to remain, and not betray us, when you did come. Well—I don't interrupt me; I divine what you are going to say—you did not know what our real character was. Perhaps not. Nevertheless, I can not consent to your going away with that old rascal, Don Ignacio, there; that is, if he would take you, which I think he would not, as your presence on board might compromise him with the Cuban authorities; and," went on Captain Brand, as he crossed his legs, and held his fine Panama hat on his head as a ruffle of the sea-breeze shot around the rock, "with respect to your remaining here on the island, you will only have that dumb old beast of a Babette for company, and it is highly probable that the English or American cruisers will be down upon you before a change of the moon; and they might—a—hang you, perhaps, for a pirate. Ho! ho!"

"If Don Ignacio declines to take me, Captain Brand, of course I can not go in the felucca; but be sure what will, I am resolved not to sail in the Centipede."

The Pirate regarded the Doctor for a moment with a cold, freezing look, not wanting, however, in a partial glimmer of respect and admiration, as he thus resolutely stated his determination; and then, putting his finger lightly on the Doctor's arm, as he saw Don Ignacio and the Padre draw near, he said, impressively, in a low tone,

"Monsieur le Docteur, do not make hasty resolutions. I command here, and my will is law. I will turn the matter over, however, in my mind, and give you a final decision before we part to-night. Now let us return. The sun is down, and the rocks are slippery.

"Well, caballeros, let us have a little social amusement," said Captain Brand, as he sat down at the table in the Padre's and Doctor's quarters, around up his splendid ounce—the present from the Captain-General of Cuba. "But bear in mind that we must break up at midnight, for our comrade here has a multitude of articles to get on board his felucca to-night, and I must be astir at daylight."

Did Captain Brand think, while he turned the key of that gold repeater, of the bloodstained wretch he had put to death in the morning, who was lying stark and stiff in his narrow, damp resting-place; or of the poor little sufferer, who had been torn from his heartless mother, sleeping near him? Oh no!—

Captain Brand was thinking of [illegible]t a small store of dollars,

[illegible]nd other stray bits of [illegible]ble of doubloons

[illegible]or remission of [illegible]one time and [illegible]such donations falling in pretty rapidly after a successful cruise, but dwindling away to most contemptible gifts long before his luck took to sea again.

Captain Brand was very liberal to his crew, dividing a great deal of money with them; but since he rarely visited any foreign ports, they had little chance of squandering it; and in the end it served merely as a gaining currency to play with, and eventually coming back to him as contributions for stores, ammunition, rigging, and so forth. The Captain, therefore, was a large gainer by the operation, as most of the articles in eating and drinking, and the vessel's outfit, were—as we know—generally presented to him; so that he was enabled to stow away the cash for future gratification.

Don Ignacio Sanches was likewise a money-ed man, and came provided with a long pouch of solid gold, which he made into little piles before him of the exact size of those of the Captain. The Doctor, however, declined to play, and sat an indifferent spectator of the game.

"Let us begin, Seniores!" exclaimed the Don, as he rapidly shuffled the cards, and his keen, black spark of fire lit up with animation at the rich prospect before him. "We are losing precious time. I'll be Banquero! Is it agreed?"

So they began. The cards were dealt, and the betting went on. The Padre forgot Breviary and beads in his excitement, and as his little pointings were swept away, he forgot, too, the sacred ejaculations he was wont to lard his discourse with, and he became positively profane. The Captain won largely in the beginning, and jeered his comrade with great zest and enjoyment; but that one-eyed old Spanish rascal was not in the least disturbed, and bided his time. At first the conversation was light and jovial, Captain Brand insisting upon the Doctor describing minutely how he had hacked the bad Gibbo's leg off with a hand-saw, laughing hugely thereat, and wiping the icy tears from his cold blue eyes with his delicate cambric handkerchief. Then the fascinating game began to fluctuate, and the luck set back with a steady run into the piles of the banker. Captain Brand liked as little to lose his money as any other gambler in cards or dice, and he was somewhat chafed in spirit; but what especially irritated him was losing it to that wrinkle-faced, one-eyed, greedy old scoundrel, with no possible hope of ever getting a dollar of it again. As for the Padre, he was dead broke, and since his friends would not lend him a real, and the banker did not play upon credit, he sat moodily by, and gloated over the winnings of the Tuerto, and cursed his own luck and that of his companions likewise.

"Ho!" growled Captain Brand, "maldito á la sota! I have lost my last stake!"

Even while he spoke the poor little boy murmured, in a sobbing voice, "Mama, chère mama!" and turned uneasily in his little nest upon his fitful slumber.

"That crying brat again!" said the now angry Pirate, as he hurled the Padre's half empty gin jug in the direction of the couch, which crashed against the wall, and fell in a shower of glass splinters over the little sleeper.

The child gave one terrified shriek, and starting from the bed in his little night dress, now soiled and torn, he ran and threw himself on his knees before the Doctor. Another bottle was raised aloft by the long muscular arm of the Pirate; but before you could wink, that arm was arrested, and the missile twisted from his grasp.

"For shame, you coward! Don't harm the boy. He will die soon enough in this awful den without having his brains dashed out."

"Ho, Monsieur le Docteur!" muttered the villain, looking as if he would like to taste the heart's-blood of the resolute man who stood before him, "do you presume to call names and oppose my will?"

"Nonsense, Doctor; you seem to take rather a strong interest in the brat—possibly an injudicious one; but since he is in my prize, you know by law, come, what will you give for him? Ah, happy thought, we will play for him! There, deal away, compadre. Sota and cavallo! I take the sota again, and you ten doubloons against the boy on the cavallo."

The Doctor said not a word, but nodded assent, and seemed absorbed in the game.

"Presto! Turn the cards, you old sinner. Quick! For dios! horse has kicked me, and the knave loses! Monsieur, the brat is yours."

Then, starting up, Captain Brand hastily pulled out his watch, and said, "Hola, caballeros, the time is up! I must say good-night."

Don Ignacio's brown fish-fingers, like a dentist's steel nippers, laid down the cards and carefully picked up his winnings, even to the smallest bit of the precious metal, and dropped it piece by piece into his long pouch, following them each with his glittering eye, and smiling with his wrinkled old lips as the dull chink of the coin fell upon his ear. When he had performed this operation he tied up the mouth of the bag as if he was choking somebody to death; and then, twitching something which was partly hidden in his sleeve, he arose in readiness to go out.

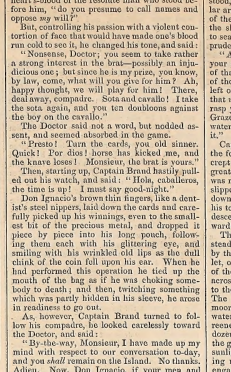
As, however, Captain Brand turned to follow his compadre, he looked carelessly toward the Doctor, and said—

"By-the-way, Monsieur, I have made up my mind with respect to our conversation to-day, and you shall remain on the Island. No thanks. Adieu. Now, Don Ignacio, if your mea and boats are at the cove we will make sharp work with your business. Vamanos!"

CHAPTER XXIII.

WORK.

When the Pirate stood in his saloon on the morning subsequent to the pleasurable events of the Sunday previous, he, as well as his saloon, presented altogether a different aspect. The apartment had been stripped of all its rare and costly furniture, cabinets, candelabras, plate, china, and glass; and nothing of value was left save the camphor trunks on the floor, the cane-bottomed settee, a few chairs, and a table. All the beautiful things, ornamental as well as useful, had disappeared, even to the rich packages of merchandise in the great vault beneath. The late possessor, however, of all that wealthy wealth did not appear to be at all discomposed, or to cherish the faintest pang of regret at his loss. In truth he seemed to be relieved from an uncomfortable load of responsibility, and feeling assured, perhaps, that in rooming about the world he could select a still more valuable collection; only give him time, and he would exercise his critical taste with every pleasing variety. It was thus he consoled himself as he stood there in his now denuded room, attired in a pair of coarse canvas trowsers, a red flannel shirt, with a short sharp hanger on his hip and a double-barreled pistol in his belt—quite the costume in which he so singularly shocked Doña Lucia, whose lovely misfortunes once hung there on the wall in company with the other miserable victims of his lust.



Captain Brand had just entered his dwelling, having been up and actively occupied ever since we last parted with him. Now he had come for a cup of tea and dry toast; and, while Babette was bringing that simple breakfast, the Pirate stood, tall, erect, and powerful, with one muscular arm resting high above his head on the side of the door-way, and the other lying lightly on the shark's-skin hilt of his cutlass, looking out to seaward—a very model, as he was, of a cool, prudent, desperate pirate.

"Ah! there you go, you crafty old miser, in your guarda costa! Take care, my compadre, of that reef. If that felucca's keel touches one of those coral ledges there won't be a tooth-pick left of her in ten minutes. San Antonio! but that was a close shave! How the sharks would rasp your bones, for there's no flesh on them! Grazed clear, eh? Bueno! now you're in blue water, you old wretch, and make the most of it."

Captain Brand waved his hand in adieu to the felucca, which, with the wind off shore, had crept through the coral gate-way, and, with her great lateen sail and green glancing bottom, was rising and falling on the long swell as she slipped away to the eastward. He then gulped down his tea, made one or two savage bites at his toast, and again walked out to the veranda, descended the ladder, and took his course toward the basin.

There, too, the scene had changed; and instead of the tranquil, shelly shore, only agitated by the musical rippling from the pure little inlet, or the faint cry of a sea-gull, or the chirps of the lizards in the crevices of the rocks there across the basin, three sounds had given place to the nimble feet and voices of busy sailors. The Centipede, also, had been towed from her moorings to a jetty which projected into the water from the shore, and there she lay, careened down, her keel half out of water, with a dozen of her crew scrubbing her lean sides till the green-coated copper came flashing out in the sunlight like burnished gold. With her slanting masts lashed to the jetty, carpenters were engaged reducing the length of the foremast and trimming out a spar for a new bowsprit. The long gun with its carriage lay near, and artisans were at work as a temporary forge, hammering out bolts and straps to replace those which were weakened by long service. On the shore, too, were a score or more of the pirate crew—Spaniards, Negroes, Lascars, Indians, and who not—ferocious-looking scoundrels, busy as bees, splicing and knotting ropes, stretching new rigging, cutting running gear from the coils of hemp or Manilla-grass rope, or making spun yarn and chafing-mats; while beneath the low mat sheds hard by, sail-makers were stitching away with their shining needles, making a set of square sails for the changed rig of the Centipede, or repairing old sails. But this was not all; for in a shed beyond was the armorer, with a few hands, grinding pikes and cutlasses and cleaning small-arms; while further still was the gunner and his mate, filling powder-cases for the long gun and swivels, and making up musket and pistol ball-cartridges.

In the midst of all these busy doings moved Captain Brand; hither and thither, from vessel to forge, from sail-to rigging; giving clear, sharp directions in various languages—commendation here, reproof there—inspecting with his own cold eyes every thing; judging of all; quick, active, ready; never at a loss for an expedient, and urging on the work like a thoroughbred seaman, as he was, who knew his own duty and how to make others do theirs. So went on the refitting of the Centipede all through the burning hot tropical day; and while the half-exhausted crew took a respite in the scorching noon for dinner, still their leader toiled on. Or, if he took a rest, it was in closely scrutinizing the progress made by his men, or in puffing a cigar like to a small high-pressure engine, or in chambering up the steep face of the crag to the signal station, where he would peer away in all directions around the island—never missing the glance of a pelican's pinion or the leap of a fish out of water. Then he would return to the cove, and begin anew the work. It was no longer the elegant Captain Brand, in knee-breeches, point-lace sleeves, and velvet, doubly seated at his luxurious table groaning under splendid plate, fine wines, and brilliant wax lights, and dispensing a profuse hospitality; but Captain Brand, the Pirate, in tarry rig, amidst sailors, sails, and cordage, munching a bit of hard biscuit or raw ear o cabo of salt junk out of a mess kid; but ever ready, never weary, and always up to the professional mark.

At the first gray hush of dawn on the following day Captain Brand was astir again, and before the sun went down behind the waves the schooner Centipede had been transformed into a brigantine, her foremast reduced, new standing rigging fitted for it, with a new bowsprit and head-booms, her rail raised four or five feet by shifting bulwarks, and a temporary house built on deck over the long pen. She was also pierced afresh, with a white streak; and, with false head-boards on her bows to hide her snake-like snout of a entrance, no one, unless in the secret, could have known that the clumsy box of a merchantman lying there was once the low, swift, piratical schooner which had made so notorious a name in the West Indies. Still the work was driven on with scarcely any intermission—"a hours' repose for the crew at night, and an hour for dinner in the day; but as for Captain Brand, he never slept at all—a doze for an hour or two, perhaps, on his settee in the saloon, and a cup of tea in the morning, with cigar-smoking, satisfied all legal requirements. The next day by noon the water and stores were got on board the brigantine, her magazine stowed, the crew of the new transferred from the sheds, the Captain's camphor trunks on board, and cabin in order, the sails bent, anchors on the bow, swinging to a hawser made fast to the rocks, the vessel was ready to put to sea at any moment.

"Pedillo," said Captain Brand, as his vigilant gaze took in all around him and then rested on the Centipede—"Pedillo, you may use the vessel down to the mouth of the Tiger's Trap so soon as you've stowed some fagots ready for lighting a bale-fire. When you get to the Trap tell the gunner, Gomez, to take a gang of hands and give that battery a good coat of coal tar, plug the vents for the guns, and lower carriages and all in the sand beside the magazine. Tell him to destroy the powder, and pitch overboard all he can't carry on board: and tell him to hand about it, for we shall sail with the last of the sea-breeze toward sunset.

"And Pedillo!—here the Pirate's voice dropped to a whisper—"come back after the vessel is secured, and bring that Maltese fellow without a nose with you. It will be as well, perhaps, for you to provide yourself with a few fathoms of rawhide strips, as we may have occasion to use 'em, you know?"

Señor Pedillo's black wiry beard fairly bristled as he grinned knowingly at his superior's words, and, getting into a bit of a canoe at the jetty, he paddled off to the brigantine to execute his orders.

Meanwhile Captain Brand slowly bent his steps toward the house under the crag, and entered his spacious saloon for the last time. On the bare table, too, was his last dinner, served on a few odd dishes and cracked plates.

"Bateese, old girl!" said he, as he sat down to this repast, "you have a bottle of old Madeira, and a flask of hock left. No?"

The negress shook her head violently, made the sign of the cross, and by other telegraphic motions gave her master to understand that Padre Ricardo had dropped in, drained both bottles, and then had reeled off on board the brigantine.

"The drunken, selfish beast!" muttered Captain Brand; "it will be the last taste of wine he will swallow for a long time."

The Pirate was quite correct in his schemes for the Padre's reform; for the next copious draught the lazy Padre imbibed was the briny salt-water from the Caribbean sea.

"Well, my Bobs, a drop of water then! Thank you, old lady. Here's to your health while I am gone. There—you need not blubber so over my hand—good-by!" And so passed away from Captain Brand's sight the only creature in the wide world who loved him.

CHAPTER XXIV.

CAUGHT IN A TRAP.

CAPTAIN BRAND did not linger long over his frugal dinner, and when he had finished, as if he had not had enough exercise for the last three days, he began to walk with long nervous strides across the saloon.

"He called me coward, did he? and dared to lay his hand on me! By my right arm, my Creole Doctor, I'll teach you not to call hard names again, and I'll paralyze your hands for all time to come."

The Pirate's jaws grated like a rusty bolt as he hissed out these murderous threats; but as his eye caught the squirming green silk rope, as he swung round on his heel in his walk, he paused and muttered,

"That bit of stuff may be of use. I'll take it by way of precaution."

Hereupon he rapidly unrove the cord and coiled it away in the bosom of his shirt. Then, looking at his watch, he said, "Ho! the time approaches, and here comes Pedillo."

Lighting a cigar, he left his dwelling for the last time; and, after pausing to hear a report from Pedillo that his orders had been executed and the vessel all ready for sea, and whispering a few precise directions in return, Captain Brand mounted up the steep face of the crag again and accosted the signal-man at the station.

"Any thing in sight?"

"Nothing to the eastward, Capitano; but it has been a little hazy here away to the southward since meridian, and I can hardly see through it."

"Bueno, my man! give me the glass. You can go on board the brigantine. I'll take a last look myself."

While the signal-man scrambled down the crag Captain Brand rested the spy-glass on the trunk of the single cocoa-nut tree, whose slender-like fingers of fan-shaped leaves still bore like a gibbeted pirate in chains; and then he searched long and steadily along the hazy horizon. As he looked, however, his eye withdrew his eye from the tube, something—a mere dim speck—arrested his attention. Quickly dropping the glass, and re-applying it to both eyes and carefully adjusting the joints, he raised it again, as a backwoodsman does his rifle with an Indian for a mark. For five minutes the Pirate stood as motionless as the crag beneath him, intently peering through the tube at the speck in the distance. At last he let the glass fall at his side, and pulling out his watch with a jerk, he muttered to himself,

"It is a large and lofty ship; but should she be a cruiser after me, she will find the bird flown and the nest empty. Ho, my brigantine!"

Springing down the precipitous declivity as he spoke, he passed a moment at a loophole of the vault below, and, having lighted and puffed his cigar into a bright coal, he carefully twitched the match-rope which led to the train, opened the loose mouth of the powder-bag, and fled. Waiting an instant till he saw the nitre sparkle as it ignited, he moved away with long, swinging strides to the shore, and then, glancing through the now deserted huts the crew had occupied, where quantities of fagots and dried wood and barrels of pitch were standing, he continued on till he came to the quarters of the Doctor. The Pirate, however, paused at the door on the thatched plaza, looking quietly at the brigantine, whose sails were loosed, and the vessel lashed to the jetty, and, with her head just abreast the Tiger's Trap.

"Ah! Monsieur le Docteur, I have merely called to bid you a last adieu before I go on board; and as I have a few moments left, and a few words to say, suppose you walk with me toward the chapel. Allons! you look suspicious sall off there," waving his glass in the direction, "and I wish to have a good look at her."

"Doctor," continued Captain Brand as they reached the little esplanade facing the graves and chapel, "you will have no one left here on our island save our dumb Babette, and the chances are rather remote for your getting away, without, perhaps, the aid of the Trade-Wind, you should happen to drop in here, which I do not think probable. I rely, however, upon your keeping your counsel as to my visit, and not even betraying the secrets you are acquainted with."

The Pirate said this in an off-hand, friendly way, as he threw the glass leveled toward it that he saw in the offing.

"Captain Brand," replied the Doctor, "I was deceived in coming to you well aware that I shall religiously keep my oath for the twenty years, as I swore to do. After that, if we both live so long, my word and arm shall speak and strike."

The Pirate stepped back a little as he shut up the joints of the spy-glass with a crash; and, with a scowl of hate and vengeance combined, he said, in a deep voice, while his eyes gleamed like a ray of sunlight on an iceberg:

"And I, too, keep my oaths; and without uttering twenty words more now!"

Even while the treacherous villain spoke, two swarthy, sinewy scoundrels crept stealthily from within the chapel, with the soft, slimy movements of serpents, as their leader uttered the last word they sprang at the back of the Doctor and wound their coils round him, twining strong strands of rawhide rope about his arms, legs, and body. Bound as in a frame of elastic steel from which there was no escape, their victim was thrown, face downward, upon the sand.

"Be quick, Pedillo! the time is flying. Gomez, bring the corpse trestle from the chapel."

In a moment a wooden frame with legs, and stretched across with a bed of light wire, which had been used to carry the mortal remains of the priests and the poor persons, too, bodies of them—to their last resting-places, was brought out from the little church. Then the bound victim was laid on it, face upward; again the hide thongs were passed in numerous plaits until the body was lashed firmly to the trestle.

"Place it on the edge of that rock there, with his head toward the cocoa-nut tree. Take this silk rope, Gomez, and clap it well up to the trunk. There, that will do. I myself will perform the last act of politeness."

Saying this, the Pirate adjusted the noose of the cord, and slipping it over the Doctor's head, he placed the knot carefully under his left ear. The victim gave no groan or sigh, and his dark luminous eyes were fixed on the blue sky above him in heaven.

"Monsieur le Docteur," said Captain Brand, as he hurriedly looked at his watch and raised his hat, "I have but one word of caution to give you in your struggle, you will have your neck broken before you are stung to death! Talk as much as you like; but as Babette is a long way off and hard of hearing, I doubt if she comes to your assistance. Adieu!"

The retreating figures went leaping toward the inlet, and, as they rushed through the sheds, they applied a torch to the combustible material deposited there, and then sprang on toward the Tiger's Trap. A few minutes afterward the Doctor turned his eyes in that direction, and saw the sails of the brigantine sheeted home and run up like magic; and taking the last breath of the sea-breeze on her quarter, the stern-fast was cast off, and she slipped easily out of the gorge-like channel. Still as those dark, stern eyes watched the receding hull of the Centipede, a sudden jar shook the island, a heavy column of white smoke rose from below the crag like a water-spout, and, spreading out like a palm-tree, came down in a deluge of timber, stones, and fire, and the whole of the frame leaped out from the gloom, and an awful peal, in a dull, heavy, booming roar that shook the crag to its base, announced the explosion of the Pirate's Den. At the same time the veil fires gleamed in fitful flashes from the sheds, and rapidly making headway, all of a sudden the whole fell in wild conflagration, all the whole nest was wrapped in flames. The shock of the explosion and the fires killed the bird, and a lurid pall of smoke and cinders hung like a gloomy canopy over the island.

"THE AMERICAN INSTITUTION."

Under this title a late number of the New York Christian Advocate and Journal discusses the subject of Sewing Machines—setting forth the peculiar merits of the Grover and Baker, in contradistinction with the lock-stitch machines generally in use. A Grover & Baker has been in use in the family of one of our firm, rendering perfect satisfaction, developing the merits claimed for it by the Advocate, as follows:

1. It makes the only seam deemed by a sewing machine in which each stitch is independently locked, and without dependence upon the other stitches for strength.

2. It is the only seam that will admit of the thread being cut at every fourth stitch without injury to the security of the seam.

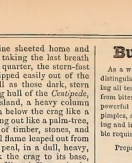
3. It is unnecessary to fasten the ends of seams made by this machine. This is done by the machine itself, without the use of the hand needle.

4. The Grover & Baker stitch is the only one formed from one continuous thread without winding from the spool into a shuttle from time to time for the under thread.

5. A seam thus formed is more elastic than any other sold by a sewing machine, and is consequently very valuable in all goods that are to be washed and stretched under the iron.

6. The machine is adapted to all varieties of fabrics, sewing each equally well, and requiring no adjustment for any kind of sewing other than the adaptation of needles and thread.

7. It is much easily kept in order than any other machine, and need not be taken apart to be oiled.



8. The machine sews common spool cotton, silk, and linen thread with equal facility.

9. The machine is so simple that an intelligent child of ten years of age may learn to operate and keep it in order.

10. By reason of its simplicity of construction and ease of management, it is best adapted to all the wants of the family.

Another very important merit this machine has is that the fabric, while being sewed, is passed across the machine from front to rear directly from the operator, obviating the liability or necessity of curving the spine, as is done when using a "lock-stitch" machine. The inventor seems to have carefully considered the health, comfort, and well being of the sex to whom he appeals for patronage, and we think has realized all that his utmost hopes could have prompted.

Still another merit possessed by this machine, the most marvelous of all, is this: while it sews a seam that will not rip in wear, it may very easily be removed at pleasure by the ordinary learner in order to accomplish it. This will be regarded as a very desirable quality by ladies generally. In order to use the machine, as they may be enabled to correct mistakes with more facility than if they used a "lock-stitch" machine, while it will be obviously a convenience to economical families in changing the fashion of garments, or making them over for children.

STAFFORD'S FAMILY RECIPE BOOK, containing 100 Receipts, published at the Exhibition Hotel of this City, and accompanied by a letter from the MESSRS. Leland, seems to be a valuable work for family use.

FRENCH'S CONICAL WASHING MACHINE.

French's Conical Washing Machine. Price only $10.

N.B. Price only $10. Price only Ten Dollars.

Price only Ten Dollars.

This simple, compact, durable, economical, portable, and efficient machine will easily, cheaply, and perfectly perform the work of twelve women.

It can and will get out of order, and may be worked efficiently by a child, washing, laces, and every variety of soiled clothes, without wear or injury. It has been selected in the laundry of French's Hotel and elsewhere, with all other washing machines making any pretensions to novelty, and has, in every instance, performed its work in less than half the time required by any other, and much more thoroughly and satisfactorily.

It will wash a single handkerchief, collar, lace sleeve, six shirts, or all of these articles together, without the necessity of sawing or boiling.

These results are produced by the constant reaction of the suds, and not by friction or rubbing surfaces. It is admirably adapted for introduction into houses with stationary tubs, as it may be latched and connected with the waste and water-pipes, and will make an important feature in houses "with all the modern improvements."

In the Family, Laundry, Hotels, Boarding-Houses, Hospitals, Asylums, Boarding-Schools, on Ships and Steamers, and in the Army, it will be found unequaled and indispensable.

It may be worked singly or in number by any steady motive power.

This machine may be seen in operation at the laundry of French's Hotel, and at the depot, No. 419 Broadway, corner of Canal St., and at No. 310 Fulton St., Brooklyn.

PRICE ONLY TEN DOLLARS.

Entire satisfaction given or the money returned.

THE PATEK WATCH.

In view of the fact that individuals are known to be preparing to impose upon the American public an inferior imitation of this

UNRIVALED LADIES' WATCH,

Messrs. Patek, Philippe & Co.,

of Geneva, Switzerland, the manufacturers of the Patek Watch, have recently requested

Messrs. TIFFANY & Co., 550 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, their Sole Agents in this city and State, to advise purchasers of this counterfeit. The spurious article is cheaply cased in the original style of ornamentation, and bears engraved upon its cap a forged trade-mark, either Patek & Co., Patek, Philippe & Co., Charles Patek, or Alexandre Patek. The genuine is engraved with the name of Tiffany & Co., in addition to Patek, Philippe & Co., and is invariably accompanied by a certificate signed and numbered. Like all other counterfeits, this attempted imposition is but an unworthy copy in externals alone of the admirable work from which it would borrow reputation; but as it is known that the parties to this fraud are even going to the length of copying Mr. Patek's own certificate and signature, the purchaser of a Patek Watch can rely on no other guarantee than obtaining it of the authorized and sole agents, Tiffany & Co.

AARON BURR'S FIRST LOVE.

Margaret Moncrieffe.

With Letters to "Kate," and from "Leonora."

NOW JUST PUBLISHED.

"A novel of American life and character, just published, entitled Margaret Moncrieffe, by Benjamin Disraeli, one might fancy was written expressly to counteract the sentimental notions of our young ladies upon love in a 'Minister's Wooing;' for that adventurer, so fascinating and so dangerous in his qualities, is the hero of the book, and its heroine his first love. This alone will attract the curious to peruse a production by a foreign class; but when it is known that the story is founded on documentary evidence—that its scenes are laid in the materials—that the original letters and cipher of Burr are included—and the 'strongest' Aaron Burr ever had a strong interest to the story, which has not much merit of the single or combined kind, but is historical and gentlemanly."—Boston Evening Transcript.

ECONOMY OF SEWING MACHINES.—THE WHEELER & WILSON SEWING MACHINE COMPANY has prepared tables showing by actual experiment of four different workers, the time required to stitch each part of a garment by hand, and with their Sewing Machines. The superiority of the work done by the machine, and the healthfulness of the employment, are advantages quite as great as the saving of time. Subjoined is a summary of several of the tables:

	BY MACHINE		BY HAND
	Hours.	Min.	Hours.	Min.
Gentlemen's Shirts	1	16	10	30
Frock Coats	2	33	16	15
Satin Vests	1	14	7	19
Linen Vests	0	48	5	14
Cloth Pants	0	51	5	10
Summer Pants	0	33	2	20
Silk Dress	1	13	10	23
Merino Dress	0	4	3	37
Calico Dress	0	07	0	57
Chemise	0	1	10	21
Morcen Skirt	0	25	7	33
Muslin Skirt	0	09	2	1
Drawers	0	08	3	1
Night Dress	1	1	10	2
Silk Apron	0	18	4	16
Plain Apron	0	9	1	16

Seams of considerable length are ordinarily sewed at the rate of a yard a minute.

The Lock Stitch made by this Machine is the only stitch that can not be raveled, and that presents the same appearance on each side of the seam. It is made with threads, one upon each side of the fabric, and interlocked in the center of it.

INSURRECTION IN SICILY.

THE LAKE AT YSSBROOKE.

My parents were kept by the times in India: I was put to school at Harrow. At sixteen I spent my holidays at Ysbrooke. Yssbrooke belonged to my mother's brother; at least he occupied it, and his executors at his death disposed of it. There was a story about a trust, but that is neither here nor there. My vacations were, in most cases, passed there. It was a dull, old, profitless sort of place, with gables of any age, that never seemed to grow older; large unthinned woods, and farm-yards that never appeared either to thrive or to fall into decay; cattle grazing with a hopeless aspect on cold-looking pasture land, and thin crops of grain, which would have driven a farmer of these go-ahead times to suicide or the bottle. The whole establishment seemed but an abortive display of prosperity, which left its cold shade upon every person and thing brought within its compass; not that we were any of us habitually miserable, that I remember. The society at Yssbrooke was undoubtedly of a grave kind, but I do not think that it was distasteful to me on that account. I carried with me such school-boy elasticity as was consistent with my temperament. It was not much, perhaps, for I was ordinarily a dreamy and may have been more in my element in my uncle's domain than would most of my school-fellows; but, on the whole, I was happy there. For was it not home to me, and at home who is not happy? My uncle had a daughter. She was some six years my senior; which circumstance, combined with a certain native superiority which made me feel myself immeasurably her inferior, probably checked my development of an attachment that I have since thought was waiting to break out on my side. Tall, lithesome, with earnest hazel eyes, and soft silken brown hair, she could not have been more fascinating had she been an angel of beauty.

DISCOVERY OF THE BODY.

One could never look in her face without seeming to read the depth and fervor of her simple heart. A winning though retiring candor pervaded her whole person. Quiet and subdued in manner, she was perfectly open and frank in all she said and did. She inspired confidence with the first glance of her eye, and alas, as I have reason to know, she yielded it but too readily and fearlessly when it was sought by others. Well, I was not myself in love with her. In her eyes I was but as a boy. "Cecil, remember," she would say to me, "that you are baby, you goose;" and I never had the hardihood to dispute that truth, nor could I make up my mind to be offended at its enunciation. For she was so taking,—the tones of her voice were so soft and true, and her hair—well I may be excused for referring to it again, for have I not a small piece of it before me now?

But there was another reason for my not presuming upon hopes, against which my youth was itself a sufficient impediment.

Edith Gerson, as years drew on, yielded her

...a hopeless apathy, varied at times by fits of ...

...Two entire days had elapsed since she left the house in her ordinary walking-apparel, without any reliable trace of her being forthcoming. She took no clothes or change of linen from her drawers, and her last act was the destruction of every letter or writing she had received from her lover, as well as of every trace which could lead him back to memory. She was gone and so was he, and up to the present moment they were, in fact, as if never of them had ever been.

And what said my uncle to all this? I was mad to know what his hopes of her recovery were, and how he bore the disaster. Well, I suppose I was enlightened that evening. He returned to Yas-brooke with the idea impressed upon his mind that his child was hiding from him, and was bent on a distant market-town on the high road to Liverpool.
The country people had given him a clew, or a fanciful view furnished by a post-chaise and a dark night. That the clew stopped there only proved she was in hiding. The departure at Liverpool for the country he regarded only as a feint. Her long depression during a fortnight a feint also; and her systematic destruction of her papers as the last last moment as proof of a scheme having a definite living purpose as its end. Nobody tried to undustand him, for nobody had any sympathetic solution to offer, and as long as there was a grain of hope it would be cruel to suggest the reverse. But the rector of our parish, I found, had come to a thought differently: he felt that either Edith was busy or by or further off than human aid could reach.
Having some intimation of her previous acts, he dared to suggest, on the night of my arrival, that the woods, the farm cottages, and even the outlying thickets should be searched. "Search!" cried he, not out, "should she have left home without clothing or money, if she meant to go a journey? Why, my dear friend of Mr. Elliot," he continued, "you should she go at all? Of what good would the disturbance of a journey be to her, when, by simply marrying her at once clandestinely, he could take her with him? You say he refused your conditions?—[by eloping with her, he accepts them, unless—what you will not believe." No—the Colonel will not believe any thing like that: he was satisfied it was a mysterious disappearance; and perhaps the rector thought he had some better reasons for the supposition than he cared to mention, and did not press him further.

The next day had gone and no tidings, and the next, and my uncle seemed at last to be giving in. The whole neighborhood had been roused, and every friend and acquaintance that Edith had ever possessed had been applied to—magisterial aid had been sought—but nothing could bring him the trace of the missing girl. The fifth day from her loss was a Sunday. Early in the forenoon the friends of Colonel Gerson anxiously dropped in during-room for intelligence. I was there, terribly sick at heart, for I had been but three days my arrival, and having contributed my exertions my for intelligence over the country, I was exhausted both in body and mind. From my degree it was mentioned that the Colonel was ill, and the body of persons present diminished, from motives of delicacy, to some half dozen. I waited, however, mechanically, I think, for I had nowhere else to go, and I felt an irresistible attraction in remaining in the company of those gentlemen who were riveted on the same subject as my own. I conversed, however, with none. With my head leaned wearily on my hand, I sat with my eyes fixed, my eyes resting on a large bowl, or rather glass trough of water, containing gold-fish, which stood on a centre table, and by a window. I was before the days of "Aquaria," and the one before me would in these times have been thought insignificant. It was a curiosity, however, in the days of which I write, and the one before me would go, and I felt an irresistible attraction in remaining in the company of those gentlemen who were riveted on the same subject as my own. I con-

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 30, 1860.

THE PROSPECT IN THE FUTURE.

THE prosperity of the United States—as of every other country—depends exclusively upon the proportion maintained between production and consumption. In the language of Alexander (which applies as justly to nations as to individuals), where the income is twenty shillings and the expenditure twenty shillings and sixpence, the result is misery; but let the income be twenty shillings and the expenditure nineteen and sixpence, and the result will be happiness. It is not uncommon to mistake financial crises for commercial disasters. This is an error. Merchants and bankers are mere middle-men, whose profits depend upon occasional circumstances, and who may grow rich or become bankrupt without affecting the country in which they live: their prosperity or their insolvency has no more effect upon the nation than the wealth or poverty of a lawyer has upon the fortunes of his clients. Nations prosper when they produce largely, and consume a little less than they produce; they decline when their production falls off and their consumption of foreign goods exceeds their means of paying for them.

The financial crisis of 1857 never could have proved generally disastrous had the Western crops of cereals and the Southern crop of cotton in 1857 proved what they generally bountiful. It was the rust and the fly and the drought of 1857 and 1858 which rendered the financial complications of 1857 so severe.

We are now entering upon a new era. Nearly three years have elapsed since the great bubble—first inflated by the California gold discoveries—burst, with a report which re-echoed throughout the commercial world. Since then the United States have gone through a period of almost unexampled suffering. By a curious coincidence, simultaneously with our domestic troubles, immigration fell off, good harvests in Europe deprived our farmers of a market for their grain, and political disturbances inces-pased capitalists to advertures money in new adventures, or to purchase cotton at the price which it ought to have commanded. Produce-tive regions were smitten as cruelly as financial centres, and the result was universal poverty.

In the year 1859 the harvests in the months of June and July, it was believed by persons not over-sanguine that the worst was over, and that the tide had turned. "The crops looked well throughout the country; it was fairly presumed that our income would exceed our expenditure. That hope was not realized. In the South, the cotton crop fulfilled the most sanguine expectations—a yield of 4,600,000 bales satisfied every one. But the West was disappointed. That fatal night of the 10th June, 1859, destroyed millions upon millions of bushels of corn and wheat in Illinois, Ohio, Wisconsin, Michigan, Indiana, and Minnesota. To complicate the misfortune, excessive importations of foreign goods stripped the mercantile community of their profits, and disabled them from attending that aid to the rural districts which was fairly expected.

Another year has now elapsed. We are delighted to say that the promise of the future is more brilliant and more certain than it was a year since. The final result is still in the hands of Providence; an early frost may still largely diminish the product of cotton; and the rust and the fly may play havoc with the wheat. But present appearances fairly bolster sanguine hopes. Throughout the Territory of Kansas and the State of Missouri the crops must be very poor; in Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, and most of the Southern States, they will be below an average; but in the great food-yielding States—New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Northern Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Michigan, and Minnesota—the yield of both corn and wheat will be very largely in excess of the average. Oregon and California will also fail to describe the luxuriant appearance of the Western wheat. Hundreds and thousands of square miles are covered with the handsomest grain that a farmer could wish to see. Another fortnight or three weeks and every wheat-grower of the West will be in easy circumstances again. The corn crop usually promises well, but a late spring and genial weather enabled the farmers to plant a larger area than usual, and to plant it well. If the autumn frost be no earlier than the average our crop of the Northwest will be largely in excess of the average. It is plain, too, as well from the drought which has prevailed in Europe and several European States as from the unfavorable crop-reports from Europe, that there will be a fine market for all the food that can be given in the West.

It is yet too early to speak confidently of the cotton crop. Its amount mainly depends on the date of the first full frost. Still, assuming that we have an average autumn, the reports from the cotton plantations justify the hope that we may have, this year, a crop of not less than five million bales. Much more than that than the average has been planted, and the weather has, thus far, been favorable. Nor is it unnatural to presume that the cotton-planters will enjoy this fall and winter the spring that they last ever had. Never did cotton-spinners do so well as they have done since last September. The Manchester mills have ordered largely. Our own mills have been unceasingly active, yet have failed to supply the home demand and the inquiry for export to South America and Asia. In France the manufacturers have been equally fortunate. All over the world, in fact, the manufacturer of cotton goods has been so very profitable that there must be an increased demand for the raw material this fall.

Simultaneously with this increase of production, we note with pleasure a decrease in the general consumption of foreign goods, and a revival of immigration. The imports are largely below, the immigration largely in excess, of that of last year. We have less to pay for, and more hands to work with, than we had a year ago. Add to this that our banks are in a very sound condition, that no speculative schemes are absorbing capital, and that the mercantile community are trading on a safe basis and on their own means, and it can not be denied that the prospect for the future is one upon which every man may fairly congratulate his neighbor.

THE PROGRESS OF BUSINESS IN ITALY.

THE work goes bravely on! At the time we write we know that at least half of Palermo is in Garibaldi's hands, and that the imbecile tenant of the Royal Palace is solicitous for help from his brother sovereigns. It is agreeable to know that, with the exception of Austria—which does not count—just now the Powers of Europe have unanimously declined to lend their aid to the maintenance of Neapolitan oppression in Sicily. Napoleon adroitly makes the point that a foreign Power can not mediate between a monarch and his subjects, but only between two hostile Powers; if, therefore, the King of Naples wants to submit his quarrel to arbitration he must begin by recognizing the independence of Sicily. England positively refuses to move in the matter, simply reserving the right of mediating at the proper time in the interest of humanity. Similar answers, we are assured, were forwarded from Berlin and St. Petersburg. Young Bomba is left to his own resources, and may feel pretty certain that nobody sympathizes with him in his day of trouble.

Thus, the world moves, after all. Time was, within the lifetime of men not very old, when Bomba's cry of distress would have roused bristling bayonets in every capital in Europe, and Frenchmen, Germans, Spaniards, and Russians would have flown to Sicily, to crush out the insolent assailants of the divine right of kings. Austria put down the Italians over and over again. France sent an army to crush out liberty in Spain. Russia lent soldiers to help the German princes trample their people. Throughout Europe, thirty and forty years ago, sovereigns were banded together in a Holy Alliance, based upon the principle that the safety of all monarchs required the protection of each one of them against revolution. England was not a member of the Alliance; but in the great league which overthrew Napoleon, and of which the Alliance was the natural sequel, England took the leading part, and in good society in England every one sympathized with the allied sovereigns. Nearly forty years have passed since the last of the meetings of the Holy Alliance: what a change in public feeling!

Let no man suppose, however, that the work is over in Italy. The Bourbons and the Jesuits and the soldiery are fighting for bare life. They know perfectly well that if they are beaten that will be the end of them. They are desperate. They have money, arms, a well-disciplined army, and the advantage of position; while Garibaldi has but a slender force, the peasantry are not armed, the revolution has no money, and nothing can hardly be granted to rebels. In the end, it stands to reason that the cause of right must prevail; but the final triumph may not be reached as soon as many people expect. We may look for a long summer's work. Napoleon, it seems, has again yielded to the entreaties of the Pope, who, after coarsely abusing the Emperor in a public rescript, has now begged the favor of his protection a little longer. So Rome is safe for a few more weeks or months, and the Pope has something more to trust to rely upon than the valor of Lamoricière and the constancy of his Irish recruits. Here, again, the struggle promises to be a long and wearisome one. Institutions like the Papacy can not be overthrown in a day, however hard the Pope and his ministers may try to provoke destruction.

But God is over all, and the end must come at last. We who watch and hope shall yet see a free, united, liberal Italy.

THE LOUNGER.

ON A CERTAIN LATE NOVEL.

THAT any person, man or woman, who has the talent to write a good book, should write it, is natural and pleasant. That any clever person trying to help himself along in the world, and believing that he can do it by writing a story, should write it, is still natural and pleasant. A good storyteller is a benefactor. We can spare many people before him. How shall we estimate Defoe, Cervantes, Le Sage? But if this good talent be better than the story, ought the critic to say that the story is good because the author is pursuing a laudable object, as the author no doubt thinks? Shall I think that the critic may hold his tongue? So he will, doubtless, if any harm is to follow from opening his mouth. But critics don't make fame. Even the newspapers can not confer genius. They may excite a curiosity, and sell many editions of a book; but if the book is not good, they can not bribe a crowd to witness the author's failure. You may be induced to buy a book because you see it highly praised, but when you have discovered that the book does not commend itself, no applause will persuade you to the purchase of that author's next production.

I remember that a MS. was once sent to me. I told the author candidly that it had better not be sent; that if I liked it, the public might not; and if I disliked it, the author was sure to dislike me. But nothing would prevent it. Town knows that any such consideration, etc. I read the MS. —it was a novel—and did not like it. I said so to the author. He might rushed down and separated us for many months. One day I received a small package, which I opened, and discovered a fresh, new novel. Of course it was the novel I had not liked; and under the cover a note: "M—— presents compliments and a copy of ——." Mr. L. will observe that the eminent publishers, —— & Co., take a different view from his own of the merits and chances of success of the inclosed."

There was no possible but Phœnician.

"Mr. L. presents his compliments and thanks for the book, and is delighted that the eminent publishers differ with him about it. But he can only remind M—— that Phœnician remained of the same opinion although the Greeks did win the battle."

The difference was that the novel did not. There was an immense advertising, and what is called puffing. The author was a person of "singular power," of "rare genius," and the novel "stands out among fiction" "fresh," etc., etc. This was five years ago. There has never been another work by the same author. Probably not a copy of that has been sold in four years; and it is doubtful if a single reader recalls either the name or the story.

Often and often since that day new novels have been published. They have marched by the public eye in full-dress parade. The drums and trumpets sounded, the banners waved; but the sound grew gradually fainter, until it was heard no more. A good look at a military show, company thundering by with a clash of hired music. It is a thrush or a bobolink singing its own song, and every day repeating its charm, like the sun and the rose. Do children get tired of Robinson Crusoe? Does the "Arabian Nights" sell by puffing? Young author, the papers may say what they think. They may be right. It may be that you are poor, and be pitiful; they may not wish to alienate the publisher's advertising; they may have a general policy of praise; or, on the other hand, they may really like your book. But do not be elated; wait a little, until the next novel is published, and then read what they say of that. You will find that genius has been lavishly bestowed upon your generation, and that you are one of a mighty company of "rare poverts" and "very remarkable talents."

JOHN AND MATRIMONY.

THE spirit of our laws asserts absolute religious freedom. Every man has a right to reject and establish it. But if a man say that his religious views constrain him to pick pockets, he can not plead absolute religious freedom as a reason why he should not be sent up. There are several other rights besides those of free religion lashed. You may believe what you choose, or what you can not help, but if you believe it right to cut your neighbor's throat, you will be hanged, nevertheless, because he has the same right to keep his throat whole that you have to your beliefs; and when rights conflict, society, or organized common sense, steps in and regulates the difficulty.

Clergymen are both religious and civil officers. When they marry you they perform a duty exactly the union by a religious blessing, and they legalize it by authority of the State. In the grant of that authority, the State may, of course, impose such reasonable conditions as it chooses for the purpose of accomplishing the end it has in view. In the view of society marriage is a legal contract, and hence his Honor, Mayor Wood, who is not a religious officer, and Aldermen of the Peace, and various magistrates, are empowered to perform the ceremony.

Now the people of the State of New York, in view of the great interests of property which depend upon legitimate birth, desire as far as possible to discourage illegitimate unions. And for that purpose have ordained that every officer who marries a couple shall keep a register of the names and surnames of the parties, their residence, age, and condition, whether single or widowed, as near as can be ascertained. Nothing could be more simple and reasonable. Any person who is about to enter on such a law to which any good citizen could possibly object. But there is an objector, and a most extraordinary objector, in this matter.

The Archbishop of the Romish Church has written a letter in which he says that if the State paid for the clergyman for marrying people he could understand that he would be responsible to its laws. But then the Archbishop knows that his sole authority to perform a legal marriage anywhere in that State is derived from the law of the State, and that the same power imposes the duty of the registry. Does he intend to say that the citizens are not responsible to the laws except when they are paid for it? Does he mean that the clergyman pleads that a clergyman is often called upon "to remedy privately the evils which the corruption of morals may have introduced, and that any requirement of private conscience is concerned on the part of the delinquents"? It is a dark saying. But the only reasonable answer to it is this, that the people who have been long living together illicitly as husband and wife sometimes repent, and wish to be legally married. Very well. If in some cases sufficient reason why a clergyman should be subjected to state in his registry the fact that they were married by him, and therefore legal? Is there any reason why concealment should be wished at because it has been long practised? Why, if it be right to conceal it, can a clergyman justify his revelation of it by the mere fact that the State pays him for the information?

The letter of the Archbishop which has excited so much remark is a triumph of obscurity. Learned divines and lawyers are employed in the effort to cloud their ideas, and the meaning of the Archbishop is certainly obscure. He professes that he does not refer the question to Rome, but he is not ready to violate his conscience—meaning, of course, that he is not willing to make the registry. But then he has just stated that if the agent were paid by the State he would be responsible to the laws. His logic says, therefore—though, of course, the prelate himself would be horrified at the low compelling a man to violate his conscience nay to discard the law of God—that the State should think it would be better to marry people quietly, according to law, than to attempt a justification of conflicting by a plea that the State had offered no bribe for obedience.

THE SPANISH MAIN.

ANTHONY TROLLOPE has written one of the cleverest of the English novelists, has written a little book of travel among the West India Islands and along part of the Spanish Main, which is one of the most readable, agreeable, instructive volumes that you are likely to put your hand upon until the summer.

Mr. Trollope (son of our old friend who made such fun of us some years ago, and with whom we were so savagely angry) has traveled in the English Post-office, and crossed the ocean upon some public business. But he did the public work apparently only as his health uniform—his temperament, as Professor Fowler would probably say, bilious-lymphatic—he calm, perceptive—intelligent—prompt—impartial—able to see fun and to make it—a man upon whom a good bottle, a good cigar, and a good dinner would produce a happy effect.

During a cruise of several weeks he drops in upon all the West India Islands, and falls in love with them. Nothing is so charming as love, and the most appreciative and retentive eyes. He tells you the incidents of travel with a fresh spirit, and ACT FIFTH, SCENE THE LAST.

JOHN BULL can never laugh at us again for absurd extravagance. The solemn editorials of the Saturday Review and other leading English papers upon the lustful fight of Heenan and Sayers were droll enough; but the grave description in the Times of "the interesting ceremony which no suspiciously closes this novel Anglo-American 'difficulty'" is beyond Rabelaisian. We have had some signal successes in the achievement of absurdity. When, for instance, the obsequies of a bully killed in a barroom fight in a cock-pit were celebrated as those of Washington might have been, decent Americans felt their fingers tingle, and the newspapers justly stated the public sentiment. But there was this explanation of that display, that Poole was identified as the representative of a party, and that signification of his funeral was really political.

But the P. R. represents nothing. To confound that rare excellence, heroism, with the ability to endure a flogging is simply laughable; and when it is dismissed that the one muscular preparation prevents any real suffering from the "punishment" it becomes contemptible. The courage that held Thermopylæ and watched at Valley Forge was not of the muscular kind. The point of pluck is in the mind, not in the knuckles; and many a man, because he is such a coward that he can not resist the foolishness of "the code," passes for a brave fellow because he stands up before a pistol. How it is possible that such an insult you if you do not permit him? If you want brave men, don't go to race-courses, prize-rings, cock-fights, and barrooms; but look out for all their lives walk in a cloud of popular delusion, because they love truth and are loyal to principle. Mr. Benjamin Caunt, because he has the fists and can stand a pummeling, is no brave brave, for those reasons, than Hopo'-my-thumb's ogre. He may be a hero, but his fists and power of endurance don't prove it.

John Bull thinks otherwise. The description of which we spoke is exquisite. The amiable fighters are introduced at the two bruvest men who had honored the world since the days of Wellington and Napoleon." And John then announces that the account of the bruising "is a history which will be read by future generations with admiration," and that his reason is "world-wide." Dealer or Jonathan then takes up the wondrous tale, and addresses Mr. Sayers upon "the termination of your career in the prize-ring public life," and "the fitting finish of a great career." The bruising at Farnborough, especially. Probably the part when Mr. Heenan was engaged in strangling Mr. Sayers was "divinely revived; and it was not only courteous but knightly." After this it seems rather tame that Jonathan should say that he is "pleased Mr. Sayers that he is receiving "a sound expression of the admiration of two nations such as a man in your humbling way has had the great fortune to receive before." Is a gentleman who, by overmatching one the rule of another, has revived chivalry, and by planting his murders upon an opposing people proved himself not only courteous but knightly, to be talked to of "humble standing?" Do people of humble standing fifty finish great careers, and terminate long and honorable public lives?

With such a flourish of eloquence the actors in the late great comedy bow themselves off the scene. Will John Bull be content so with his estimate of the not gain to decency, honesty, and heroism of the whole business?

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

MODERATION IN CRINOLINE.

A lady who styles herself Artiste en Corsets, Fournisseur de la Cour Impériale, yesterday advertises a "Jupon Medium." The thing called "Jupon" is a new fashion, and the only saving exception to the rule which declares that there is a medium in every thing. Hitherto there has been no medium in the dimensions of that article of female apparel, which have indeed attained all known proportions; however, a man may hope to be enabled to sit or dine with comfort and a strong part of his time. Many little clothes, which were generally spread out on each side so as to be in front of the table, and to give a grotesque appearance to figures, are uncomfortably worn in attempting to sit down to dinner, and, consequently, as gentlemen will frature, thanks to the "Jupon Medium," will ever, perhaps, be enabled to dine with their wives, instead of the fourcon of one of his fair neighbors instead of his table-napkin. If the "Jupon" should be a specimen of the golden mean, success to it. May it be patronized by the aristocracy, and, by a less fashionable spirit-gauge, it will be what you may call an example of the happy medium!

OLD PEET AND OLD FOGIES.—The cause of greyness in the hair, in many instances, may be traced to a too copious indulgence in pate-wine. When we consider the composition of the nutritious and delicately solid viand in question, we may easily understand how the practice of imbibing it is calculated to give one who is not old the appearance of an elder-ly gentleman.

SPEAK AND SHOULDER-ARMS.—"What is an equestrian statue?" inquired a visitor, of a meeting that a functionary of that nature had been promoted to the cutenancy of a new regiment. "A equerry, my dear," replied the parent, "is a horse-footman."

We have heard of an economical man, who always takes his dinner in front of a mirror. He does this to double the dishes.

A cockney at a tea-party, overhearing one lady say to another, "I have something for your private ear," immediately exclaimed, "I protest against that, for there is no hair underneath it."

An editor says that he hoped to be able to present a marriage and a death as original matter for his columns; but a busy time broke up the wedding, and the doctor got sick, so the patient recovered.

A LAWYER said to a medical friend: "My family, surely, is the more ancient; for the killing of Abel by Cain was the first criminal case."

"Sure enough," replied the doctor; "but before that happened a rib was taken out of Adam's side; and that operation was the first surgical operation."

A SCREECHING FIEND.—Dr. Mosher, of Giessen, relates the case of a girl, who, suffering from an affection of the ear, accompanied by an attack of typhoid fever, was suddenly seized with a screaming, which lasted for eighty hours. Beckoning her answers per writing-tablet, he makes out that the girl must have screeched 48,000 times.

Once at the breakfast-table at the Tedworth, Mr. Assheton Smith was intent on the newspaper, when suddenly he uttered an expression of horror, and his countenance exhibited the most poignant emotion. The ladies present, supposing that some great European calamity had occurred, hastily asked him what was the matter, and were told by the old gentleman, looking over his spectacles, "By Jove, a fox has been hunted to death in a barn!" The enthusiastic votary of the chase, the man to be hunted to death in a week all through the season, the high-priest who had immolated innumerable foxes, had could allow his life to expire on one knife with which he had cut off no less than 1500 tails, was bowed down with sorrow when he heard of foxpend being destroyed without the usual ceremonies.

HOW TO AVOID DROWNING.—Always keep your head above water.

"NO NOSE ON THAT HEAD."—Why is a busy barber like a telegraphic wire?—Because he runs from poll to poll.

THE TRUE PROMOTER OF DIGESTION.—Laughing after dinner is a better "stomachic" to promote digestion than cheese, Champagne, or gills.

"Master," said an old Scotch servant, "whether is't better to have a saucy woman gives you a glass of whisky, to tak a drop or drink aff at ance?" This puzzled the humorous Scotch phrase, judiciously replied to their poser that the mastery consisted in taking it by the whisk, the man exclaimed, with a sigh of relief, "Then, Gude be thankit, I 'se no mastery!"

A PROVERB OF SOME SOLDING-US.—It is better that a woman should scold than sit in silence. Better for us to endure the greatest ills than fly to others that we know not of. We do not object to the noise of scolding. We never did. Scolding seems to be a poor sun to make of a woman, but it has something more than its advantages. We do not like the noise of a boiler blowing off steam; but if it saves the boiler from bursting, we should be content to endure it.

THE TAILOR THAT MADE THE REMARK.—The DUKE of Wellington was remarkable for the coolness with which he gave his directions. Even in the heat of an engagement he has been known to give vent to a tremendous observation, especially when it seemed to raise the spirits of his men. Thus, when the fire was most scorching Badajoz, his Grace rode up while the balls were falling around, and observing an artillery-man particularly active, inquired the man's name. He was answered, "Taylor." "A very good name, true," remarked Wellington. "Cheer up, my men; our Taylor will soon make a pair of breeches for the enemy." At this sally the men forgot the danger of their situation, a burst of laughter broke from them, and the next charge carried the fortress.

What aches on a railroad train are most likely to be head-ache. The Railroad Aches.

The boy who was caught looking into the future has been arrested on a charge of peering into what was coming.

A sentimental chap intends to petition Parliament for a grant to purchase the diamonds of admiration; so that henceforth the "coarse of true love may run smooth."

"And so you have married a Mr. Penny?" said a gentleman to a lady who had accepted a widower.

"No; Mr. Twice."

"Ah, you have done better than I thought."

"Sare," said a Frenchman, wishing to display his knowledge of the English language, "did it rain to-day?"

"Yes, Sare," was the equally humbatic reply; "yes, Sare, it was."

A six-year elder, going into the village without leave, was stunned after by one of the masters, who inquired how he dare to do so.

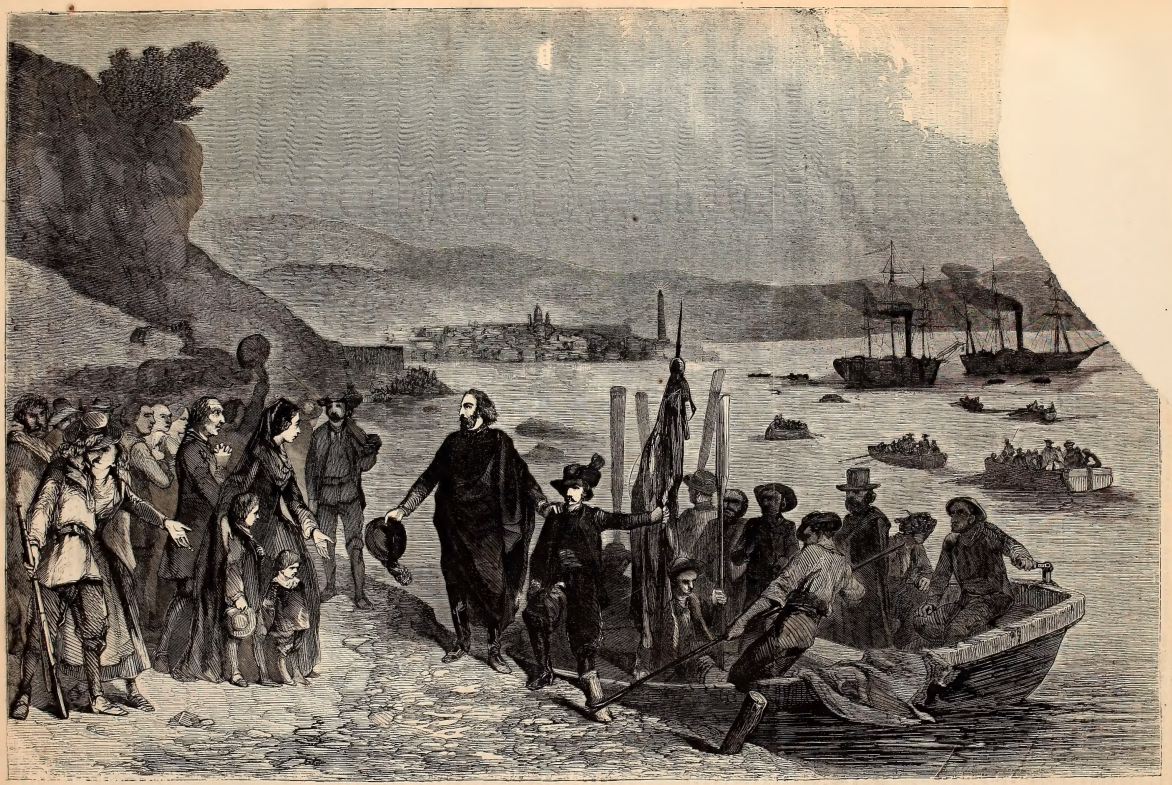
"I am going to buy a ha'porth of nails, Sir."

"What for?"

"For a ha'penny, Sir," was the reply.

"Wonderful things are done nowadays," said Mr. Thomas Green to his wife, after seeing Black's boy a new lip from his cheek.

"I don't like to play farthin," said Jenkins, "and have all the silver I have a binding me: it makes me common property."



Nothing is common which is dear," meekly responded Charles; "and dear are all private property according to law."

A sailor, a giant of known bravery, who was in a boat at the siege of Copenhagen, kept down his head while a ball was flying over his head.

"For shame! hold up your head!" thundered the officer in the stern.

"I will, Sir, when there's room for it," was the laughing response.

The cost of a house is the gift of nature. That of an ass is often the work of a builder.

DEPARTURE OF GARIBALDI AND HIS FOLLOWERS FROM GENOA ON THE NIGHT OF MAY 5, 1860.

DEPARTURE OF GARIBALDI FROM GENOA.

THE engraving on the previous page depicts the departure of the Italian chief Garibaldi from Genoa for Sicily on the 5th May last. Orders had been given to the captains of his force to meet on the night of 5-6th May, at the Villa Spinola. Their consultations were necessarily brief; time was precious. Before day broke the embarkation was effected, and the Piemont and Lirio were under full steam with their gallant crews.

General Garibaldi was the last man to embark. Our picture represents him consenting to the earnest request of the wife of one of his officers that she might be allowed to embark as a hospital nurse. This lady's name is Crespi.

The results of the expedition are well known.

VII.

WHEN I reached home again, after my interview with Mrs. Clements, I was struck by the appearance of a change in Laura.

The unvarying gentleness and patience which long misfortune had tried so cruelly, and had never conquered yet, seemed now to have suddenly failed her. Insensible to all Marian's attempts to soothe and amuse her, she sat, with her neglected drawing pushed away on the table; her eyes resolutely cast down, her fingers twining and untwining themselves restlessly in her lap. Marian rose when I came in, with a silent distress in her face; waited for a moment to see if Laura would look up at my approach; whispered to me, "Try if you can rouse her;" and left the room.

I sat down in the vacant chair; gently unclasped the poor, worn, restless fingers; and took both her hands in mine.

"What are you thinking of, Laura? Tell me, my darling—try and tell me what it is.

She struggled with herself, and raised her eyes to mine. "I can't feel happy," she said; "I can't help thinking—" She stopped, hurt forward a little, and laid her head on my shoulder, with a terrible mute helplessness that struck me to the heart.

"Try to tell me," I repeated, gently; "try to tell me why you are not happy."

"I am so useless—I am such a burden on both of you," she answered, with a weary, hopeless sigh. "You work and get money, Walter; and Marian helps you. Why is there nothing I can do? You will end in liking Marian better than you like me—you will, because I am so helpless! Oh don't, don't, don't treat me like a child!"

I raised her head, and smoothed away the tangled hair that fell over her face, and kissed her—my poor, faded flower! my lost, afflicted sister! You shall help us, Laura," I said; "you shall begin, my darling, to-day!"

She looked at me with a feverish eagerness, with a breathless interest, that made me tremble for the new life of hope which I had called into being by those few words.

"Work, and set her drawing materials in order, and placed them near her again.

"You know that I work and get money by drawing," I said. "Now you have taken such pains, now you are so much improved, you shall begin to work and get money too. Try to finish this little sketch as nicely and prettily as you can. When it is done I will take it away with me; and the same person will buy it who buys all that I do. You shall keep your own earnings in your own purse; and Marian shall go to you to help her as often as she comes to see. Think how useful you are going to make yourself to both of us, and you will soon be as happy, Laura, as the day is long."

Her face grew eager, and brightened into a smile. In the moment while it lasted, in the moment when she again took up the pencils that had been laid aside, she almost looked like the Laura of past days. I had not misinterpreted the first signs of a new growth and strength in her mind, unconsciously expressing themselves in the notice she had taken of the occupations which filled her sister's life and mine, and in the inference that she had truly drawn from them for herself. Marian (when I told her what had passed) saw, as I saw, that she was longing to assume her own little position of importance, to raise herself in her own estimation and in ours; and from that day we tenderly helped the new ambition which gave promise of the hopeful, happier future that might now not be far off. Her drawings, as she finished them, or tried to finish them, were placed in my hands; Marian took them from me and hid them carefully; and I set aside a little weekly tribute from my earnings, to be offered to her as the price paid by strangers for the poor, faint, valueless sketches of which I was the only purchaser. It was hard sometimes to maintain our innocent deception, when she proudly brought out her purse to contribute her share toward the expenses, and wondered, with serious interest, whether I or she had earned the most that week. I have all those hidden drawings in my possession still; they are my treasures beyond price—the dear remembrances that I love to keep alive—the friends, in past adversity, that my heart will never part from, my tenderness never forget.

Am I trifling here with the necessities of my task? am I looking forward to the happier time which my narrative has not yet reached? Yes. Back again—back to the days of doubt and dread, when the spirit within me struggled hard for its life, in the icy stillness of perpetual suspense. I have paused and rested for a while on the course which is leading me to the End. Is it time wasted if the friends who read these pages have paused and rested too?

I took the first opportunity I could find of speaking to Marian in private, and of communicating to her the result of the previous visit which I had made that morning. She seemed to share the opinion on the subject of my proposed journey to Welmingham, which Mrs. Clements had already expressed to me.

"Surely, Walter," she said, "you hardly know enough yet to give you any hope of claiming Mrs. Catherick's confidence? Is it wise to proceed to these extremities before you have really exhausted all safer and simpler means of attaining your object? When you told me that Sir Percival and the Count were the only two people in existence who knew the exact date of Laura's journey, you forgot and I forgot that there was a third person who must surely know it—I mean Mrs. Rubelle. Would it not be far easier, and far less dangerous, to insist on a confession from her than to force it from Sir Percival?"

"It might be easier," I replied; "but we are not aware of all that exists between Mrs. Rubelle's connivance and interest in the conspiracy; and we are therefore not certain that the date has been impressed on the memory of Sir Percival's accomplice in the same manner as it has been assuredly impressed on the minds of Sir Percival and the Count. It is too late now to waste the time and the chances which may be all-important to the discovery of the one assailable point in Sir Percival's life. Are you thinking a little too severely, Marian, of the risk I may run in returning to Hampshire? Are you beginning to doubt whether Sir Percival Glyde may not, in the end, be more than a match for me?"

"He will not be more than your match," she replied, decidedly, "because he will not be helped in resisting you by the impenetrable wickedness of the Count."

"What has led you to that conclusion?" I asked, in some surprise.

"My own knowledge of Sir Percival's obstinacy and impatience of the Count's control," she answered. "I believe he will insist on meeting you single-handed—as he insisted, at first, on acting for himself at Blackwater Park. The time for suspecting the Count's interference will be the time when you have Sir Percival at your mercy. His own interests will then be directly threatened—and he will act, Walter, to terrible purpose in his own defence."

"We may deprive him of his weapons beforehand," I said. "Some of the particulars I have heard from Mrs. Clements may yet be turned to account against him; and other means of strengthening the case may be at our disposal. There are passages in Mrs. Michelson's narrative which show that the Count found it necessary to place himself in communication with Mr. Fairlie; and there may be circumstances which compromise him in that proceeding. While I am away, Marian, write to Mr. Fairlie, and say that you want an answer describing exactly what passed between the Count and himself, and informing you also of any particulars that may have come to his knowledge at the same time in connection with his niece. Tell him, in case he hesitates to comply, that the statement you request will, sooner or later, be insisted on if he shows any reluctance to furnish you with it of his own accord."

"The letter shall be written, Walter. But are you really determined to go to Welmingham?"

"Absolutely determined. I will devote the next two days to earning what we want for the week to come; and on the third day I go to Hampshire."

long. I found Laura busily occupied in the same drawing exactly as I had left her. She was going to London, of course, by the time the Cedile Laura's drawing for her drawing was finished and occupied and happy. Then to the stress

"Remember what I say," she whispered, as we left the passage; "remember all I have said on your safe return. If stranger than to you on this journey; if you and Sir Percival meet—"

"What makes you think we shall meet?" I asked.

"I don't know—I have fears and fancies that I can't account for. Laugh at them, Walter, if you like—but for God's sake keep your temper! if you come in contact with that man!"

"Never fear, Marian! I answer for my self-control."

With these words we parted.

I walked briskly to the station. There was a glow of hope in me; there was a growing conviction in my mind that my journey this time would not be taken in vain. It was a fine, clear, cold morning; my nerves were firmly strung, and I felt all the strength of my resolution stirring in me vigorously from head to foot.

As I crossed the railway platform, and looked right and left among the people congregated on it, to search for any faces among them that I knew, the doubt occurred to me whether it might not have been to my advantage if I had adopted a disguise before setting out for Hampshire. But there was something so repellent to me in the idea—something so meanly like the common herd of spies and informers in the mere act of adopting a disguise—that I dismissed the question from consideration almost as soon as it had risen in my mind. Even as a mere matter of expediency the proceeding was doubtful in the extreme. If I tried the experiment at home, the landlord of the house would sooner or later discover me, and would have his suspicions aroused immediately. If I tried it away from home, the same persons might see me, by the commonest accident, with the disguise and without it; and I should in that way be inviting the notice and distrust which it was my most pressing interest to avoid. In my own character I had acted thus far rightly; in my own character I was resolved to continue to the end.

Is there any wilderness of sand in the deserts of Arabia, is there any prospect of desolation among the most barren of Polar seas which can rival the repelling effect on the eye, and the depressing influence on the mind, of an English country town, in the first stage of its existence, and in the transition-state of its prosperity? I asked myself that question as I passed through the chaos of desolation, the neat ugliness, the prim torpor of the streets of Welmingham. And the handsomer when shared after me from their loveliness by the trees that drooped helpless in their arid exile of unfinished crescents and squares; the dead shrubberies that waited in vain for the vivifying human element to animate them with the breath of life; every creature that I met, every object that I passed, seemed to answer with one accord: The deserts of Arabia are innocent of our civilized desolation; the ruins of Palestine are incapable of our modern gloom!

I inquired my way to the quarter of the town in which Mrs. Catherick lived; and on reaching it found myself in a number of small houses one storey high. There was a bare little plot of grass in the middle protected by a cheap wire fence. An elderly nursemaid and two children were standing in a corner of the inclosure looking at a lean goat tethered to the grass. Two foot passengers were talking together on one side of the pavement before the houses, and an idle little boy was leading an idle little dog along by a string on the other. I heard the dull tinkling of a piano at a distance, accompanied by the intermittent knocking of a hammer near at hand. These were all the sights and sounds of life that encountered me when I entered the square.

I walked at once to the door of No. 13—the number of Mrs. Catherick's house—and knocked, without waiting to consider beforehand how I might best present there is the clergyman coming along the square.

Look, Mr. What's-your-name — look, if you please!"

She started up with the activity of a young woman, went to the window, waited till the clergyman passed, and bowed to him solemnly.
The clergyman ceremoniously raised his hat, and walked on. Mrs. Catherick returned to her chair, and looked at me with a grimmer scream than ever.

"There!" she said. "What do you think of that for a woman with a lost character? How does your speculation look now?"

The simplicity—the vanity—of what she had chosen to assert herself, the extraordinary practical vindication of her position in the town which she had just offered, had so prepared me that I listened to her in silent surprise. I was not the less resolved, however, to make another effort to throw the light on her guard. If the woman's fierce temper once got beyond her control, and once flamed out on me, she might yet say the words which would put the clue in my hands.

"How does your speculation look now?" she repeated.

"Exactly as it looked when I first came in,"
I answered. "I don't doubt the position you have gained in the town. I don't wish to assail it, even if I could. I came here because Sir Percival Glyde is, to my certain knowledge, your enemy as well as mine. I have a grudge against him, you have a grudge against him too.
You may deny it, if you like; you may distrust me as much as you please; you may be as angry as you will—but, of all the women in England, you, if you have any sense of injury, are the woman who ought to help me to crush that man."

"Crush him for yourself," she said; "then come back to me and tell me what to do."

She spoke those words as she had not spoken yet—quickly, fiercely, vindictively. I had stirred in its lair the passion which I had come out for a moment. Like a lurking reptile it leaped up at me, as she eagerly bent forward toward the place of my chair. Like a reptile, it struck, and like a reptile it dropped out of sight again, as she instantly resumed her former position in the chair.

"You won't trust me?" I said.

"No."

"You are afraid?"

"Do I look as if I was?"

"You are afraid of Sir Percival Glyde."

"Am I?"

Her color was rising, and her hands were at work again, scratching her dress. I pressed the point further and further home—I went on, without allowing her a moment of delay.

"Sir Percival has a high position in the world," I said; "it would be no wonder if you were afraid of him. Sir Percival is a powerful man—a baronet—the possessor of a fine estate
—the descendant of a great family—"

She smeared me beyond expression by suddenly bursting out laughing.

"Yes," she repeated, in tones of the bitterest, fiercest contempt, "the descendant of a fine estate—the descendant of a great family. Yes, indeed! A great family—especially the north-country branch."

There was no time to reflect on the words that had just escaped her; there was only time to feel that we were well worth thinking over the moment I left the house.

"I am not here to dispute with you about family questions," I said. "I know nothing of Sir Percival's mother—"

"And you know as little of Sir Percival himself," she interposed, quickly.

"I advise you not to be too sure of that," rejoined. "I know some things about him-more than you suspect."

"What do you suspect?"

"I'll tell you what he don't suspect. I don't suspect him of being Anne's father."

She started to her feet, and came close up to me with a look of fury.

"How dare you talk to me about Anne's father! How dare you say who was her father, or who was not! How you look out, her face quivering, her voice trembling with passion.

"The secret between you and Sir Percival is not that secret. I repeat it again. The mystery which darkens Sir Percival's life was not born with your daughter's birth, and has not died with your daughter's death."

She drew back a step. "Go!" she said, and pointed sternly to the door.

"There was no thought of the child in your heart or in his." I went on, determined to press her back to her last defence. "There was no bond of guilty love between you and him when you held those stolen meetings—when your loving mother put you whispering together under the vestry of the church."

Her pointing hand instantly dropped to her side, and the deep flush of anger faded from her face while I spoke. I saw the change pass over her; I saw, that hard, firm, fearless, self-possessed woman quail under a terror which her utmost resolution was not strong enough to resist, when I said those five last words—"the vestry of the church."

For a minute or more we stood looking at each other in silence. I spoke first.

"Do you still refuse to trust me?" I asked.

She could not call the color that had left it back to her face; but she had steadied her voice, she had recovered the defiant self-possession of her manner, when she answered me.

"I do refuse," she said.

"Do you still mean to go?"

"Yes. Go—and never come back."

I walked to the door, waited a moment before
I opened it, and looked round to take a last look again.

"I may have news to bring you of Sir Percival which you don't expect," I said; "and, in that case, I shall come back."

"I want no news of Sir Percival that I don't expect, except—"

She stopped; her pale face darkened; and she stole forward, with a quiet, stealthy, cat-like step, to her chair.

"Except the news of his death," she said, sitting down again, with a mockery of a smile just hovering on her cruel lips, and the furtive light of hatred lurking deep in her steady eyes.

As I opened the door, I saw room to go out she looked round at me quickly. The cruel smile slowly widened her lips—she eyed me with a strange, treacherous leer—she raised a foot—an unutterable expectation showed itself wickedly all over her face. Was she speculating, in the moment of her triumph, on my youth and strength, on the force of my sense of injury and the limits of my self-control; and was she encouraging herself by the hope which they might carry me if Sir Percival and I ever chanced to meet? The bare doubt that it might be so drove me from the house, and silenced even the common forms of farewell on my lips.
Without a word more, on my side or on hers, I left the room.

As I opened the outer door I saw the same clergyman whom I had noticed on the square once, about to pass it again on his way back through the square. I waited on the door-step to let him go by, and looked round, as I did so, at the parlor window.

Mrs. Catherick had bent her footteps approaching it also, and stood slowly plucking, and she was on her feet at the window again, waiting for him. Not all the strength of all the terrible passions which existed in that woman's heart could lessen her desperate hold on the one fragment of social consideration which years of resolute effort had at last dragged within her grasp. There she was again, not a minute after I had left her, placed purposely in a position which made it a matter of common courtesy on the part of the clergyman to bow to her for a second time, and to give his hat once more. I saw the hand, gravely face behind the window soften mad light up with gratified pride; I saw the head with the grim black cap bend ceremoniously in return. The clergyman had bowed to her—and in my presence—twice in one day!

The new direction which my inquiries must now take was plainly presented to my mind as I left the house. Mrs. Catherick had helped me a step forward in spite of herself. The next stage to be reached in the investigation was, beyond all doubt, the vestry of Old Welming-ham Church.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, June 18, in the Senate, Senator Wilson's amendment to the Navy Appropriation Bill, proposing to provide that no officer shall be appointed to the Army or Navy who is a slave-trade, was debated by Senators Collamer, Mason, Wilson, Hale, Bayard, and others. After further debate a vote was taken on the amendment, and it was lost by a vote of 18 to 25. The Navy Appropriation Bill was passed.—In the House the business done was not of much importance. The Civil Appropriation Bill was amended by the appropriation of $250,000 for the extension of the Treasury building. Also, $50,000 for the preservation of the Capitol extension, with $200,000 for inlor and materials, and $47,000 for the erection of marble columns for the Capitol.

On Tuesday, June 19, in the Senate, the Appropriation Bill was taken up, the House report agreed to, and the Senate's amendments disagreed to. A bill was then considered. Senator Polk was in favor of the Butterfield contract, thought the Post-Office authorities certainly would be willing to take $60,000 and give up the contract, which would be a saving of $20,000 per annum to the country at the time the contract had to run.——In the House, Mr. Davis, of Maryland, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-roads, reported a bill for the appropriation of $250,000 for the completion of the Washington Monument. Mr. Davis, from the Committee on Commerce, on the disagreeing amendments to the Army bill, to the Senate amendments to the Navy appropriations of $750,000 for fortifications. The Senate's amendment, appropriating $1,000,000 for coal and navy depots on the Isthmus of Chiriqui, was concurred in.

On Wednesday, June 20, in the Senate, a Committee of Conference was ordered on the Navy Appropriation Bill. A motion to take up the Post-Office Appropriation Bill to-day to-night to-night to-night with spectators, yet the excellent police arrangements of Superintendent Kennedy secured a speedy and uninterrupted pass for the procession—a satisfaction from eve-

Metropolitan Hotel, where the Embassy is located in magnificent quarters, was illuminated in every window, and decorated with a thousand Japanese and American flags. The grocers were also arrayed in Dodworth's Band. The entire arrangements were conducted in a manner that is said to have given satisfaction to the Embassy and Naval Commission who have been in charge.

On Monday, 18th, the Embassy, in company with the Naval Commission and the Common Council, visited the Mayor and Governor at the City Hall, and were formally welcomed. The Seventh Regiment, National Guards, turned out a volunteer escort of about 600 men to guard the visitors on the route. Addresses of welcome were made by Mayor Wood and Governor Morgan, and replied to by the Princes, who, after viewing the Governor's Room, were escorted back to the Metropolitan. The Embassy was called upon in the morning by the Consul and Vice-Consul of the Netherlands, by Judge Edmonds and J. E. Zimmerman.

On Tuesday the Embassy did not participate in any public ceremonies, in consequence of the rain.

On Wednesday the Embassy received, with great cour-tesity, a committee of twenty-four gentlemen from the Chamber of Commerce, and listened to an appropriate address from Potshall Pritt on behalf of the delegation.
They replied that they hoped for more extended commercial intercourse between Japan and the United States, and continuing invited the committee to assist, and join in conversation inform the Embassy more fully of the desires and designs of American merchants. Various parties of the Japanese visited the matinee at the Academy of Music, the mass-fraged Niagara at the Bowery, and the Broadway stores.

On Thursday the Embassy visited the Central Park, and witnessed the planting of a Japanese tree. They also visited Washington Heights the residence of Mr.
J. G. Bennett. About thirty-five of the subordinates of them constitute their shopping excursion.

On Friday, 23d, the Embassy kept quiet. The Japanese officers and an interpreter had an interesting interview with the delegation from the Ethnological Institute where they were on shopping excursion, visited the Assay-office, Trinity Church, Custom-house, Exchange,
Barnum's museum, and also passed a portion of the day

TERRIBLE ACCIDENT AT SEA.

A dispatch from Cape Island, New Jersey, reported that the United States steamer Walker was run into at three o'clock on Thursday morning, off Absecom, by the steamer schooner. The steamer sank in half an hour.
Two are lost, and forty of the crew are saved. All the boats, but about twenty of the crew are missing.

The United States steamer Scourges, Lieutenant Commander R. G. Forbes, Captain Hudson, who happened to be near the scene of the disaster, and who took on board them at Cape May. Twenty of the crew are reported as missing; but there is a hope that a portion of these were rescued by another vessel which was seen near the scene. The rescued persons lost all they had on board, and were in great destitution.

PERSONAL.

The Court of Parishes of New Jersey have refused the application for a commutation of the death sentence of Rev. James Hudnit, convicted of the murder of his wife by poison.

Prince de Joinville visited the Brooklyn Navy-yard on Monday. The visit was a strictly private one, his coachman being his only attendant. After looking around a moderate length of time on the outside, he proceeded to visit the different departments, with the exception of the various work-shops and other places of interest, and expressed himself highly pleased with the arrangements of the yard. He was received by the Marine guard, Lieutenant Reynolds, was called out and gave him a salute.

It is reported that Hon. I. Q. A. Lasser, one of the leaders of the secession movement in the South, and Commercial representative in Congress from Mississippi will retire from Congress to accept the Professorship of Public Law in the University of his State.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE "GREAT EASTERN."

It is announced that the steamship Great Eastern would sail from Southampton for New York on Saturday, the 31st. The ship started with a trial trip on the 8th, running twelve hours out to sea, and twelve hours back. Her speed was regarded as satisfactory, although the rate of speed attained did not at any time exceed thirteen and three-fourth knots, with the screw-engines twelve and a half knots. The very foul state of the vessel's bottom, and the fact that her trim was not being fully favorable for speed, accounted in a measure for the diminution from the rate obtained last year. There was some difficulty, however, in getting the full amount of steam, and the revolutions of the paddles and screw never exceeded ten and a half and thirty-nine respectively, which is considerably below the numbers obtained on the previous trials. The ship answered her helm with marvelous ease and facility: as stated in the last letter by the New York pilot, expressed the utmost astonishment, and declared the vessel could go anywhere, and turn in any waterway. Sundry minor improvements suggested by the trial trip, were completed on the 19th, after which the ship was ready for her crew to put accustomed to their several stations. It is confidently expected that the ship will reach New York within ten days, where it is intended to moor her close to the city.

THE CAPTURE OF PALERMO.

The correspondent of the London Times has written a graphic account of Garibaldi's capture of Palermo, from which we make several extracts. He begins as follows:

"PALERMO, May 28, 1860.

"It is 7 P.M., and I am writing to you with the bombshells flying about my head through the roof. The first landing of Garibaldi produced the first fit of terror at Naples, but restful Bourbonism rest in the hearts concentrated in the Bay of Palermo, the order to bombard his fortified Palermitans, and rejoice in the news, unless, if they should dare to rise against his paternal authority. The Palermitans have been treated somewhat ready in this universal manner by the illustrious father of the present Sovereign, who, as you remember, figures in history as King Bomba, for having given these sovereigns of his sons to every large town of his kingdom. Whenever his sons in a town which is bombarded will tell you that it is very unpleasant, especially if you have not got the means of answering in a foreign manner, and you have had it all this morning. Yesterday an official bulletin of the Government announced to the Palermitans that Garibaldi's force had been annihilated by the fire of Generals Colonna, followed by the capture and rout of the King; that the bonds which had joined him together were going loose gradually and rapidly, and that in a short time all would be over. This morning, were utterly astonished at the boldness of this plan, and could only remark about the want of ammunition for their men. They were told, for the hundredth time, that it was not long shots which imposed on the well-armed Neapolitans, but a determined rush in advance; that they ought not to waste their ammunition and dis-off their guns for sport, and were promised whatever could be spared. This objection being waived, all expressed, more or less loudly, their approbation of the plan, and were dismissed with the injunction to animate their people and keep up their courage."

THE NIGHT ATTACK.

The attack was made by night, and some of the raw levies got into confusion and gave the alarm. The name of the town disappears the story of the town
"Instead, therefore, of surprising the rest of the brigade, the surprise was received by a volley which fire, not only in front, but from the houses in their flanks. At the first sound of the unwelcome noise of the Picciotti were across the garden walls, but met with a shower of fire from behind them, leaving their leader and or forty men of the mezzi-corde all isolated in the large garden and street which parallels the bridge. The First Battalion of the Cacciatori was sent up, and as it did not carry the position fast enough, the second was sent, and it soon after. While these were driving back the Neapolitans, some parties got round to the left, and attacked Bovard. It was not so easy, in the beginning especially, to turn the mound of cannon was heard in front, although its effects were severely visible. However, the Picciotti, who had crossed the bridge and entered the orchards, exed on after the first unpleasant sensation has passed that kill or wound—not even the cannon shots, which pass so tremendously close to the ear, but which in effection the morning; for although the Neapolitan fire is an unerring instinct to the best fire arms, I saw not a little damage done by so much shooting. Every one knows that Garibaldi's men are not the regular troops of Picciotti, driving them out of the shuttered places by all the various work-shops and other places of interest, and expressed himself highly pleased with the arrangements of the yard. He was received by the Marine guard, Lieutenbullets came through the wood and from the houses and behind the barricade. One of the Picciotti was killed and fell close to him, and several were wounded. Still cred shelter. But no effect. He addressed Colonel Tukory, who was a native of Genoa and Corsica sicilia, which prostrated seven or eight men. The bugle sounded the charge, the men rushed with charge, and the Neapolitans ran. The sound of this bugle seems to set fascinating on the nerves of the Neapopolitan troops; they know they have to do with Garibaldi's men, and as Colnia Fini they ran even before the charge took place."

A SUSPENSION OF ARMS.

The Neapolitan journals of Sunday were made for a suspension of hostilities. The Times writer says:

"Just at this moment a flag of truce has come from the Royal Palace with the following letter directed to General Garibaldi:

"The Commander-in-Chief of the Armies and Naval Stations beyond the Faro, Palermo, May 30, 1860.

"GENERAL,—As the British Admiral let me know that he would receive with pleasure on board of his vessel the two persons to open a conference with you, of which I e would be the mediator, if you allowed him to pass through the lines, I have the honor to ask whether you accept, and if so to name to me the two persons who are to confer with him. It was for the advantages that the proposal was made to me by the Commander of the Royal Palace to the Sanita, where they would embark.

"Accept, for your answer, I have the honor to be,

"LANZA.

"To his Excellency General Garibaldi."

"To this letter the answer was, that General Garibaldi should have no objection to meet the two Generals on board the Admiral's vessel; that he would send round vessels for the two Generals at two P.M. Negotiations were to begin at noon, and that at 1 P.M. they should meet on board the Admiral's ship. The Neapolitan Lieutenant-General of the national forces, sent the letter to Lan-za, and to the Admiral by Mr. Winnet, the Engineertenant."

TREACHERY OF THE NEAPOLITANS.

"12.50 P.M.—If a man is found to have taken, in confusion, his neighbor's cloak, it may pass for a mistake;
but if that same man is found on the very next occasion in the same action, to have his own "Ecco Garibaldi," and collar the individual. When the Neapolitans asked for the armistice, and General Garibaldi sent, accordingly, the order to all the line to cease firing, they not only continued shelling, but tried to take advantage of the cessation of the fire to gain a better position. To-day they sent off four boats containing a considerable advantage. In order to cross firing at noon and begin the armistice, Colonel Orsini was wounded. The Garibaldians still stuck to their instructions, and did not return the fire. The Neapolitans came to the conclusion that they must fire or else abandon their position. The fire was kept up for a quarter of an hour. It appears that the armistice was broken, when two Neapolitan officers came in as parlementaires. They excused the affair as a misunderstanding, and that the column had not received the order to cease firing. They were sent in front to stop the fire and arrest the advance of the column. They came into the shooting range, the citadel went on also; and surely the citadel could not be supposed to be without news of the armistice.
Just at twelve o'clock the news came that the column of the citadel was approaching the town. Garibaldi immediately, as he did yesterday, collected his reserves, and marched on them. A corps of Cacciatori, under Wilmot, R.N., who had come on shore to bring the Admiral's orders on board, formed the advance. Garibaldi is the midst of the advancing column of Neapolitans and the corps of Cacciatori. A shot fired at the same time from the Castello burst close to him, the Neapolitans had not received the order to cease firing, the danger that he at last reached Garibaldi. It was five minutes to one. The Admiral sent to suggest his Admiral's consent to an interview on board; and a fire was opened from the Admiral's vessel to warn the men it was all a mistake; that the column had not received the order."

THE ARMISTICE.

The Neapolitan journals of next agree upon terms with Garibaldi. An armistice was, however, settled.
The Turin Constitutionnel publishes the following official announcement:

"The negotiations which have reached us from Sicily give the state of affairs thus: The armistice, which expired on the 31st, has been renewed. The Neapolitan Powers appear to have come to an agreement, on the one hand, to demand that hostilities should not be renewed; and, on the other hand, to lay down the principle of the non-intervention of Europe between the King of Naples and Sicily. We may add, that the interests of our countrymen have rendered it necessary to send additional French ships to the Sicilian waters.

THE LATEST FROM SICILY.

The capitulation was signed at Palermo on the 6th June. A Turin dispatch says of the terms of capitulation: "The Neapolitan troops will evacuate Sicily with arms and baggage. They are to encamp until their embarkation, and are to receive provisions during that time.
The Neapolitan fleet will remain in the harbor of Palermo until the departure of the troops. The Neapolitan fortresses in Sicily will be delivered up to Garibaldi."

A constitution, framed similar to pected shortly.

Garibaldi had addressed a letter to Signor Bertini, authorizing him to make advances or negotiate a loan for Sicily, or to contract any debt, and adds that he has at Sicily immense means to satisfy all claims.

A Neapolitan Envoy was on his way to Paris and London.

Count Aquila, uncle of the King of Naples, was strongly urging the adoption of an Italian policy and a liberal constitution for the government of Naples.

HOW GARIBALDI LOOKS.

An American, who has visited Garibaldi in Sicily, thus describes the General:

"Wearing a brown felt hat, pulled forward over his eyes, a red flannel shirt, rusted by the action of sea and of blue pantaloons, into the pockets of which both hands were thrust, and with no sword, Garibaldi looked more like any Yankee farmer coming in from the field than the leader of a mysterious. Understanding we were to see him as we wanted him, and, in good English, as served us that we were welcome. He was just going to dine, and with the remark that our forefathers had taken as poorly furnished. An invitation to sit with him at we sat down to a dinner which carried one's thoughts back to the days of our own Revolution. The General was seated at the foot of the tree on a small box. Saddle and bridle were placed around for a seat on a dozen or more, sitting and standing, with the aid of clasp knives and fingers, made a lively attack on a huge bulk of cooked meat, onions, and potatoes, placed on the ground, around the liberal supplied of country wine. Garibaldi in our the cups then at the most costly feast. It was a thing to remember for a lifetime. Garibaldi is, in black hair, of course, the most interesting of the whole party. His complexion is dark, and his face is full of expression, and his eyes are bright and keen, looking to New York—of General Garibaldi's particular Colonel Colt, who was a personal friend and had presented him with his pistols, and who was anxious for his men, which, through some blunder, had been left behind. The General spoke from Genoa, and of it in very much. In personal appearance Garibaldi is about five feet six inches in height, strongly but not heavily built, but with muscles and a hand like iron; fair complexion, considerably tanned by sun and exposure, but originally red, but now partly gray; a high, straight forehead, brown hair, with partial baldness, and dark eyes, set far back, gray blue, when uncovered, an air of quiet thought on his face that fell to repose as we talked fixed feeling of respect and admiration, though his whole bearing towards each was a stranger feel perfectly at his ease. There is something remarkable about h's profile which I have never seen before, the forehead and nose appear to be in the same straight line, without the usual indentation between them. There is an air of commanding modesty about him in every thing. In conversation a quiet smile is almost continually on his face; he speaks slowly, several times turning aside to give orders or receive information. In speaking of the coming fight he made no brags—said that he labored under great disadvantages from want of arms and discipline. Though he had plenty of men—all except the 1000 Piedmontese who accompanied him were hasty and untrained, and would require a long time to become properly disciplined."

STATE OF THE PRISONS IN PALERMO.

A correspondent writes to a London paper, that he was in Palermo in 1848, when a room was broken open in a jail and the unexpected prisoners found there in, with others, now a night that, for unexampled horrors, no tongue or pen could describe. For a long period of unmerited and tortured persons, some hanging nailed up to walls, where they were crucified alive, others tied to benches, and all states and stages of mutilation and decay. The room had been left in this state, with the doors and windows walled and bricked up, but was discovered by some soft plaster or lime that had fallen, where upwards of 1000 men were furniture stood. The tyrant and his myrmidons had retired from the capital, and the prisoners were released by an unknown mystery forever. Deeds of darkness rarely es-caps the light.

TURKEY

THE TURCO-RUSSIAN IMBROGLIO.

The following dispatch is published in the Hamburg:

"The first act of the political drama, the exposition of which is the mission of Ignatieff to Constantinople, at the meeting called by our Minister of Foreign Affairs, is over, and the curtain has fallen, to be raised in a few days once again for the second. There has been a change of Ministers, and Fuad Effendi, who was the friend of the obstinate old Turk, who rejected all foreign interference, has been sent off to meet the Allied Ambassadors at Paris after the fashion of Mehemmed the Exterminator, and Ali Pasha, who is a moderate statesman, has only signified his readiness to institute an inquiry into the affairs of Syria. Circumstances, the state of Europe, ria, etc., and the condition of the population under their sway, have forced the Ambassadors arrived to make make a tour through the provinces for that purpose, in order to form an opinion of the state of affairs there on the spot. Our Ambassador at Constantinople, Prince Alexander Gortschakoff, has been entrusted with the proposition on condition that the Russian Consuls accompany them on the progress of the inquiry and to report on its results. This may be considered as the first preliminary step to the Congress, which will prepare for further operations. The Grand Vizier and Ministers have declared that the Treaties of Paris ties are without any foundation; that they are to full enjoyment of the privileges conferred upon them by the decree; and that the undeniable agitation pervading among them is entirely owing to the revolutionary spirit of the age or the machinations of foreign emissaries.
The Russian Consuls will report in a contrary sense;
they will show, as they easily can, that the decree has been a dead letter, and that the Porte are no better off than they were before its promulgation. The second act will then open, and the Ambassadors will meet in of our Government, supported by France, and it will depend on circumstances necessary to replace moral reasons by material pressure."

skirting patch of grass. With Flowers in abundance on this spot, and it lies high and airy, with the distant river shining steadily away to the ocean, like a man's life. To gain the milestone here, which the moss, primroses, violets, bluebells, and wild roses would soon render illegible but for peering travelers pushing them aside with their sticks, you must come up a steep hill, come what you can away. So, all the tramps with carts or caravans—the Gipsy tramp, the Show-tramp, the Cheap Jack—find it impossible to resist the temptations of the place, and all turn into the loose when they come to it, and boil the pot.

Within a moderate distance of this encamping ground, though not so near it as that the song trolled from tap or bench at door, can invade its woodland selence, is a little hostelry which no man possessed of a penny was ever known to pass in warm weather. Before it entrance are certain pleasant trimmed limes like hive-s a cool well, with no musical bucket-bundle that its full upon the bucket-rim will make a horse prick up its ears and neigh upon the thirsty traveler for a mile off. This is a house of great resort for hay-making tramps and harvest tramps, insomuch that as they sit within, drinking their mugs of beer, their reliquidated scythes and reaping-hooks claire out of the open windows, as if it was a well-established manner with a fraternity of Ancient Britons. Later in the season the whole country-side, for miles and miles, will swarm with hopping tramps. They come in families—men, women, and children—every family provided with a bundle of bedding, an iron pot, a number of babies, and too often with some poor sick creature quite unfit for the rough life for whom they suppose the smell of the fresh hop to be a sovereign remedy.
Many of these hopping-ars are Irish, and many come from London. They crowd all the roads, and camp under all the hedges and on all the scraps of common land, and live among and upon the hops until they are all picked, and the hop-gardens, so beautiful through the summer time, are as if they had been laid waste by an invading army.

THE SISTERS—AND MAX GREY.

A LITTLE past midnight. Just then a candle lighted the walls and appointments of the coziest little bedroom you ever saw. Alice and Lina had been to the theatre, and had come back in the night's revel, each both flushed and pale with the lingerings of the delightful excitement the company had all gone, leaving the drawing-room blank with that desolateness which follows so close on the heels of a social event. A few scattered chairs had been mechanically replaced, and the sisters had tripped up the staircase with an elasticity more of excitement than fatigue.

Half an hour after Alice was sitting in her own little rocking-chair, close by the warm grate, with her sloping shapely feet on the fender, golden hair streaming carelessly upon her neck; and Lina standing behind her, slowly smoothing it out with her rich fingers and comb.

The lily cheek of the fair-haired girl rested upon fingers of coral deeds-brown, and between the light eyebrows drooped over half-sleeping, but sweetly passive and clear-blue eyes; and the loose-fitting dressing-gown reflected the outline of a delicate young figure.

The sister who stood behind the chair, performing in turn the pleasant, sisterly office, afforded a contrast. Her hair was dark, her eyes black. There was a roundness and fullness of arm and figure, and a brilliant glow of cheek and brilliancy of tint, that told of more definite maturity—of quaintenance and a kind of strength. Even here, in the sacred quiet of the sisters' chamber—the pleasant little chamber, with its crimson sleeping cot, and its two fairy-like white and snowy bed—with its few but choice engravings on the walls, its vases of fresh flowers, its bit of rich carpet for the feet, its pairs of slippers by the corner—her dark eye had a glow, and in her cheek was a flush of restlessness, and life, and earnestness.

These were very differing flowers to be blossoming from the same stem.

Though a little chatty—as sisters will be over a revel like that—both were unusually quiet and pre-occupied. Lina was standing behind Alice's office of the toilet, or gazing demurely into the grate, or sitting side by side, with Alice's head on Lina's shoulder, with her fingers at intervals busy.

Curiously enough, both were busy with the same topic of thought. Each shrank from giving words to her musings; and each was unconscious of the other's reflections. The subject of the sisters' reverie was nothing more than Max Grey, a schoolboy friend of Lina, who had gone to India when only a lad, and returned a man of position and power, and had been lionized by the London world. The first encounter since the return; yet it was one of a brief series. The lion's pale face had been changed for the ruddy dark of manhood, though many traces of its early intellectuality and even contour yet remained.

Though it must be confessed that Lina had well-nigh forgotten the somewhat intense school-girl vow of many years ago, it is not to be wondered at that something of old association was kindled and renewed in the presence of the half stranger. Lina was a true girl still felt herself possessed of a wee bit of life in the new-old friend; albeit the boy of

Uncommercial Traveler.
NO. X.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

THE chance use of the word "Tramp" in my last suggested to me that numerous fraternity so vividly before my mind's eye that I had no sooner laid down my pen than a compulsion was upon me to take it up again, and make notes of the Tramps whom I perceived on all the summer roads in all directions.

Whenever a tramp sits down to rest by the way-side he sits with his legs in a dry ditch; and when, ever he goes to sleep (which is very often indeed), he goes to sleep on his back. Touching the high road, glaring white in the bright sunshine, lies, on the dusty hill-side under the bramble-bush that fences the coppice from the highway, his stump of the order savage, fast asleep. He lies on the broad of his back, with his face turned up to the sky, and one of his ragged arms loosely thrown across his face. His bundle (what can be the contents of that mysterious bundle, to make it worth his while to carry it about?) is thrown down beside him, and the waking woman with him sits with her legs in the ditch and her back to the bank, and wears her bonnet rakishly perched on the front of her head, to shade her face from the sun in walking, and she ties her skirts round her in conventionally tight tramp fashion with a sort of apron. You can seldom catch sight of her peering this way without seeing her, in a despondently defiant manner, doing something to her hair or her bonnet, and glancing at the sleeper between her fingers. She does not often go to sleep herself in the daytime, but will sit for any length of time beside the man. And his dishevelled propensities would not seem to be referable to the fatigue of carrying the bundle, for she carries it much oftener and further than he. When they are afoot, you will usually find him slouching on ahead, in a gruff temper, while she jogs heavily behind with the bundle. He is given to personally correcting her, too, which phase of his character develops itself often-est on lonely unfrequented by-roads—and she appears to become strongly attached to him for

…ere is a dog in the vicinity, and …ntest his unsolely-injured propitiation to the dog chained up in your yard: remarking, as he looks at the yard, "Ah! you are a fojed breed o' dog, too, and you ain't keep for nothink!
I'd take it very koind o' your master if he'd 'ip a traveler and his wife, as envies no gentleman his good fortun', a bit o' your broken victles.
He'd never know the want of it, nor more would you. Don't bark like that, at your betters as never done you no 'arm: the poor is down-trodden by sich as you, you may depend on it!"
He generally heaves a prodigious sigh in moving away, and always looks up the lane and down the lane, and up the road and down the road, before going on.

Both of these orders of tramp are of a very robust kind; let the hard-working laborer see the cottage-door they prowl and beg have the agon never so badly, these tramps are sure to be in good health.

There is another kind of tramp whom you encounter this bright summer day—yes, on a road with the sea-breeze making its dust lively, and sails of ships in the blue distance beyond the slopes of Down. As you walk enjoyingly on you descry in the perspective, at the bottom of a steep hill, up which your way lies, a figure that appears to be sitting astride on a gate, whistling in a cheerful and disengaged manner. As you approach nearer to it, you observe the figure to slide down from the gate, to desist from whistling, to smooth its hat in the bottom of the hill and coming close to the figure, you accost it as the figure of a shabby young man. "He is moving painfully forward in the direction in which you are going, and his mind is so preoccupied with his misfortunes that he is not aware of your approach until you are close upon him at the hill-foot. When he is aware of you, you discover him to be a remarkably well-behaved young man, and a remarkably well-spoken young man. You know him to be well-behaved by his respectful manner of touching his hat; you know him to be well-spoken by his smooth manner of expressing himself. He says, in a flowing confidential vein, partly without punctuation, "I ask your pardon Sir but if you would excuse the liberty of being so addressed upon the public I beg to one who is almost reduced to rags though it as not always been so and by no fault of his own but through ill ehh in his family and many unmerited sufferings it would be a great obligation Sir to know the time." You give the well-spoken young man the time. The well-spoken young man, keeping well up with you, resumes: "I am aware Sir that it is a liberty to intrude a further question on a gentleman walking for his entertainment but might I make so bold as ask the favor of the way to Dover Sir and about the distance?" You inform the well-spoken young man that the way to Dover is straight on, and the distance some eighteen miles. The well-spoken young man becomes greatly agitated. "In the condition to which I am reduced," says he, "I could not ope to reach Dover before dusk even if my shoes were in a state to use me there or my feet were in a state to old out over the flinty road and were not on the bare ground of which my gentleman has the means to satisfy himself by looking Sir may I take the liberty of speaking to you?" As the well-spoken young man keeps up with you while you say you may, you find you have taken the liberty of speaking to you, he goes on, with the money: "I am a shipwrecked mariner and formerly for I was brought up by the best of mothers and begging is not my trade I should not know Sir how to follow it as a trade if my life depended thereunto) wishes for the best of mothers long taught other wise and in the best of ones though now reduced to take the present liberty on the Lord Sir my business was the law-stationering and I was favorably known to the Solicitor-General the Attorney-General the majority of the Judges and Bill ob the legal profession but through ill ehh in my family and the treachery of a friend on which I formerly security and he no other than my own wife's brother the brother of my own wife I was cast forth with my tender partner and three young children not to beg for I will sooner die of deprivation but to make my way to the sea-port town of Dover where I have a relative I in respect not only that will assist me but that would treat me with untold gold Sir in upper times and here this calamity fell upon me I more for my amusement when a little thought that I should ever need it excepting for my air this"—here the well-spoken young man puts his hand into his breast—"this coub! Sir I implore you in the of girdle of white linen wound about his waist—a girdle, sowny as Mrs. Anderson's apron. This cleanliness was the expiring effort of the respectable couple, and nothing then remained to Mr. Anderson but to get chalked upon his spade in snow-white easy-look characters, ursours! and to sit down here. Yes; one thing more remained to Mr. Anderson—his character; Monarchs could not deprive him of his beneficial character. Accordingly, as you come up with this spectacle of virtue in distress, Mrs. Anderson rises, and with a decent curtsey, presents for your consideration a certificate from a Doctor of Divinity, the reverend the Vicar of Upper Deddington, who informs his Christian friends and all whom it may concern that the bearers, John Anderson and lawful wife, are persons to whom you can not be too liberal. This benevolent pastor committed no work of his hands to fit the good couple out; for with half an eye you can recognize his autograph on the spade.

Another class of tramp is a man, the most valuable part of whose stock-in-trade is a highly polished countenance. He goes up like a country-man, and you will often come upon the pour fellow while he is endeavoring to decipher the inscription on a milestone, quite a fruitful subject, or, for he can not read. He asks your pardon, he truly does (he is very shy of speech, this tramp, and looks, in a bewildered way, all round at the prospect while he talks to you), but all of us should do as we would be done by, and he'll make it kind if you'll put a power man in the right road for Upton his eldest son as his broke his leg lad in the mowning, and is at his home Orejid it is worn down by Squire Pouncerly's own hand as wold not tell a lie for no man. He then produces from under his dark frock (being always very low and perplexed) a neat but worn old leathern purse, from which he takes a scrap of paper. On this scrap of paper, written by Squire Pouncerly of The Grove, "Please to direct to the Bearer, a poor but very deserving man, to the County Hospital, near Brighton"—a matter of some difficulty at the moment, seeing that the request comes suddenly upon you in the middle of Hertfordshire. The more you endeavor to indicate where Brighton is—when you have with the greatest difficulty remembered—the less the deluded father can be made to comprehend, and the more obviously he stares at the prospect; wherefore, being reduced to extremities, you recommend the faithful parent to begin by going to Saint Albans, and present him with half a crown. It does him good, no doubt, to see you, but he never comes, since you find him trying drunk that same evening in the wheelwright's sawpit, under the bank where the felled trees are opposite the sign of the Three Jolly Hedgers.

But the most vicious by far of all the idle tramps is the tramp who pretends to have been a gentleman. "Educated," he writes from the village herb-shop in pale ink of a ferruginous complexion—"educated at Trinity Hall Cam—ourred in the lap of affluence—once in my small way the patron of the Muses," etc., etc., etc.—sorely a sympathetic mind will not withhold a tribute to help on to the next town, where he thinks of giving a Lecture to the frugis consumere nati, on things in general? This shameful creature, habitually almost bedrag-tag-rooses in his ragged clothes, now so far from being black, that they look as if they never were of a certain black, is more selish and insolent than even the savage tramp. He would sponge on the poorest boy for a farthing, and repay him nothing but sport; it he would interpose (if he could get any thing by it) between the baby and the mother's breast. So much does the tramp-country he keeps in the maudlin assumption of being higher, this pitiless rascal blights the summer road so he meanders on from town to town, where (to say nothing of my thinking) even the wild convolvulus and rose and sweetbriar, environing the hedge-row, get pared time to recover from the taint of him in the air.

The young fellow who trudges slang, barefoot, five or six miles from last quets slung over their shoulders, their shabby bundles under their arms, their sticks newly cut from some roadside wood, are not eminently prepossessing, but are much less objectionable. There is a tramp-fellowship among them. They pick one another up at roving stations, and go on in company. They sleep a-top of a fust swing—though they generally limp too—and share their knuckle-end of pie. The young man has much ado to keep up with the rest. They generally talk about horses, and any other means of locomotion than walking; or, one of the company relates some recent experiences of the road—which are always disputes and difficulties. As for example: "So as I'm a standing at the pump in the market, blest if there don't come up a Deadie, and he sez, 'Mustn't stand here,' he sez. 'Why not?' I sez. 'So bigger'n you have been in this town,' he sez. 'Who's a beggar?' I sez. 'You are,' he says. 'Why are we so beg?' I did you?' I sez. 'Cos you're a tramp,' he sez. 'I'd rather be that than

ing the print of the thumb and finger in a deeper whiteness, to be more than overcome by a crimsoning after.

Alice looked up quietly, and fixing her clear blue eyes on her sister, rejoined, "I Oh, Lina, I wish I were brilliant and beautiful and attractive like you. Instead of that, I am only a little noiseless thing, to be put, for a corner and looked at from a distance."

Lina whipped the pretty little arm with a rose-bud by way of reply; and the rosebud being big, a little blush spot followed the infliction.

"At a distance! Pshaw, my little lily-bud, who did you dance with to-night?"

"Dance with? Mr. Norton, for one."

"Yes, the handsomest man in the room. But who else?"

"Mr. Jenks, Dr. Andrews, and Mr. Butler."

"Yes, each of them the very first in his line, and yet my little Alice is not attractive!" And Lina smiled very archly, and patted her under the chin.

"But who else, sis; you've not mentioned the greatest oil best yet."

"Who do you mean?"

"Max Grey."

"Oh yes! But he danced with me for your sake, I suppose, Lina;" and Alice laughed a little.

Lina laid her flushed cheek upon the white shoulder, let the long tress fall over her form, and was quiet. Alice had not quite meant what she said, and so, feeling almost guilty, she was quiet. Then her thoughts hastened about a certain something in his tone and manner, and she went through it all again, wonder if he only thought of her as a to-be sister. These thoughts made her sad in spite of all her strength, and she seemed to herself very wicked.

After the candle was extinguished the young girl slipped a white rosebud between the leaves of the Bible and retained it, thinking all the while of a deep dark eye, and a heavy though musical voice.

When the fair sisters, with clasped fingers, fell into dreaminess, each had a love and a hope in her heart.

Max Grey came to the home of the sisters often. The three formed a curious picture. Max, full of life and energy, quite capable of prudent success in a dignified self-control, but evidently playing under the crust of his manner, and bursting out now and then; Alice, still, gentle, though really self-sustant in her quiet, unthinking way; Lina, buoyant, sparkling, assured, dashing, with a rich blood-tint in her face, and black, passionate eyes.

Max had a great deal to say to Lina, with only now and then a word, and it seemed sometimes but a glance or a smile for Alice. And yet Alice never felt herself slighted or alone. There was a "something," and her little heart fluttered about that something. And this in spite of a deep sense of selfishness which made her feel that never, in all her life, was she so wicked before. Oh, the blind self-examinations! The child came out from these deep in-turnings satisfied that in her inmost soul was never the shadow of a wish to steal a love that belonged to Lina; and yet, when Max was with them and she felt that "something," her little heart would flutter at the thought would spring into it that possibly Max Grey hadn't loved at all—before. He had never said to Lina that he loved her, she was sure.

These thoughts were very troublesome. They were very pleasant, very wicked. Alice prayed, in whispers, with her hand on her restless little heart, for strength to conquer this wild beating. And then she sat down to her thoughts as carefully, was very strict with her eyes even—wouldn't look at Max. Indeed, the little creature held herself very tight; and when she thought of Max and Lina—so like in temperament, her earnest life-full nature so matching her deep consciousness and deep power—it seemed so fit and natural that two so similar should be together that Alice felt herself very strange, and was sure that Lina would not be the noble Max. She was quite willing—she knew she was—indeed, she was very, very strong, and wouldn't be weak here more.

By-and-by Max called, and Lina was out. From the moment of his entrance Alice felt the pressure of a weight. She looked out the window—the day was so heavy. She touched the piano-keys; but the sound was slow and dull. She tried to laugh at a witticism, but it ended in only a smile. Max came across the room and sat beside her. She longed to fly—to do any thing; but the will was like the grown heavier and heavier, and she couldn't move.

Max Grey—the great and strong Max Grey—bent, trembling over the little delicate flower, and whispered in her ear. Alice wept as though her heart would break; but Max went away with a kiss on his lips.

That night Alice was crying herself to sleep when Lina came into her place by the bed. Lina begged to know what it was, coaxed, pleaded, promised any thing, every thing, if she would only tell.

"Max Grey loves me."

"And you love him."

The little sister only flung her arms about the neck of the stronger, and sobbed in perfect abandonment of grief.

The blood left the cheek of the older sister—left the neck, the fingers, and lips, while the veins rosebud in unnatural fullness, like through the thin white skin.

Strong natures conquer or die. Lina conquered.

THE.

At the extremity o-great distance from Tours, from Paris to Bordeaux, there-an inn, a pretty way-side inn, with-and a swinging sign bearing the effigy of a Roi, otherwise Henry IV.

It was during a December evening, in the year 1818, when the wind was sighing and surging without, and the rain plashing down with uncommon persistency, that the worthy landlord of Le Grand Roi, the honest but somewhat imperious M. Eluard, Aîné, was entertaining one of his neighbors, who had taken shelter from the inclemency of the weather at his comfortable hearth, were ordinary degree, and both her face and figure were perfect, but it was a beauty and a perfection which were unearthly in character, and altogether incompatible with the scenes and persons with which she was associated. She was not the daughter of M. Eluard. Nature could not so far have belied herself. She was the only child of one who had been a merchant of great wealth and high standing, but who, having ruined himself by injudicious speculations, and not being gifted with sufficient moral courage to face his reverses, had terminated his own existence, leaving his penniless widow and helpless orphan to battle with a world by which he, the strong man, had been worsted. The former died; the latter was a servant in the inn.

Still the wind roared in the wide chimney, and the rain plashed against the windows, as unremittingly as though the storm had only just commenced, and had, as yet, had no time to exhaust itself.

Suddenly two distinct blows were heard on the house-door, given apparently with the hands of a trembling lady, and the host and his guest, pipes in their mouths and listened; Marie started like a person suddenly awakened from a heavy sleep.

The door opened; a fine-looking young man threw off his large wrapping-cloak, dripping with mud and rain, made one bound toward the blazing fire, and seated himself upon the bench opposite to Marie, saying, in a clear, joyous voice, "This is charming, this is delicious, mine host! Had you expected me, I could not have wished a pleasanter welcome. And now I must ask you to hasten my supper, for I want to be off—I must be away to-morrow at daybreak; I should like to go to bed as early as I can."

During this little speech the eyes of Marie and the stranger met more than once; and while he examined him with undisguised admiration and astonishment, she, on her side, was for the first time aroused into something like interest in what was passing around her. She noted the exact shade to the tint of a hedge-rose, and the curved and flexile lips quivered with a nervous movement; while her head drooped upon her bosom, as though under a new and vague emotion, to which she could have given no name. A ray of light had mysteriously penetrated the darkness and desolation of her spirit; for the first time since her mother's death she felt as though there were no longer orphan.

The supper was served, and in less than twenty minutes had disappeared; and then M. Eluard drew more around the fire, observing that the night would light a candle, and conduct Monsieur to his chamber.

The poor girl passively obeyed, and led the way to a large and cheerful room on the first story.

"You are not the daughter of the landlord?" said Adolphe de Roval, as she placed the light upon a table.

"I am not, Monsieur," replied Marie; and a vivid blush overspread her cheeks.

"I thought so. Those white and delicate hands, and that crimson brow, are evidence to the contrary at this moment. Have you many travelers in the house to-night?"

"You are the only one."

"I am glad of it, for your sake. What is your name, Mademoiselle?"

"Marie, Monsieur."

"The sweetest of all names! It becomes you well."

"Does Monsieur require any thing more?" asked the girl, timidly.

young man he arrived little more than an hour ago; but there is no fear that he will disturb you, for he appears to be a perfect gentleman, and is moreover so tired, and so anxious to get on, that he leaves us at daybreak to-morrow."

The brow of the stranger darkened, and he made no reply.

"Be careful," he said a few minutes afterward, "to call me in the morning at seven o'clock, for I must be at Tours by mid-day. Ah! by-the-by, I shall require a saddle-horse—let one be ready for me, as my time is precious."

"My neighbor, Marie-Joseph Carnac," responded the landlord, "has the best roadster in the district; he can be here by half-past six."

"Good!" said the guest; "then I will follow the example of your other inmate, and betake myself to rest."

"Marie, a light!" cried Eluard; and the young girl once more ascended the stairs to marshal the new-comer to his room.

Adolphe was, as we have stated, already in bed, with the candle still burning upon his table. He had as yet been unable to retire; his brain was too busy. His newly-acquired rank; the anticipated meeting with his parents and his sisters; and, mingled with these proud and happy thoughts, the mystery attached to Marie, had made him wakeful; so that when he heard the heavy tread of a man's foot traversing the passage, and passing the door of his room, he was conscious of every sound. Suddenly a thought struck him; and, springing to the floor, he took a key from his waistcoat pocket, opened his trunk, and seizing his uniform sword, which lay upon the top, placed it under his pillow.

Midnight struck from the old clock in the kitchen, and all was profoundly silent in the house, but still Adolphe remained sleepless; when suddenly he was startled by a sound which appeared to him like that of a key slowly turned in the lock. He listened attentively; but as it was not repeated he concluded that he had been the sport of his own over-excited nerves, and drawing the bed-clothes closer about him, he determined to profit by the few hours which were left, and to endeavor to obtain some rest. He had scarcely begun to sleep, however, when he was a second time disturbed, and on this occasion he was at once convinced that he had made no mistake. Some one was endeavoring to enter his room. The candle had burned out; but grasping his sword, he noiselessly groped his way to the door, and stood motionless beside it. At least five minutes afterward the noise ceased, and he began to hope that the would-be intruder had abandoned all hope of invading his privacy, whatever might have been his motive for seeking to do so. He had carefully locked the door of his room, and had little fear that the fastening could be forced; but accidentally casting his eyes on the floor, he saw by the light of the moon which gleamed full upon the window of his room, and which, rendered more vivid by its contrast from the subsided storm, was pouring out its chastened radiance from a new cloudless sky, that a hand had been introduced between the boards of his chamber and the bottom of the door, and was seeking to lift it from its hinges. This was too much: and steadily raising his sword above his head, he struck downward with all his force upon the hand that was trifling with his door. A smothered groan fell upon his ear, and then a half-articulated curse. There was next heard a sound of stealthy steps retreating along the passage, and ere long all was still—but two bleeding fingers remained lying upon the floor!

Adolphe rushed to the fire-place; a few warm fragments of wood enabled him to light a second candle which he placed in a chimney-piece, and he then proceeded to examine the hideous trophy of his victory. For a moment he shrank from touching the fatal "finding" of his unsuccessful, but he rapidly overcame the weakness, and picking up the severed fingers, he carefully folded them in a handkerchief, and folded them up in his handkerchief.

"On the honor of a non-lieutenant," he murmured to himself, with a hysterical laugh, "I am really, for a robber, the fingers are passably slender and the nails tolerably clean. Well, I suppose that all is over for the night; so, as I am shivering with cold, I had better go to my bed again."

Adolphe was young and fearless; and in a quarter of an hour he was sound asleep.

Day was breaking when the landlord awoke our hero, who started from his comfortable repose, after a cup of excellent coffee, prepared by the delicate hands of Marie. As he did so he instinctively cast a glance at those of M. Eluard, and had no sooner ascertained that they were intact than he began to relate to him his nocturnal adventure, him with indignant e-

"Only think, mamma; he is an officer already! Is not charming? What will papa say?"

"But where is my father?" asked the young man; "his welcome is still wanting."

"You know he is often from home," said Madame de Roval; "and we are as little as ever at his confidence. He left us three days ago; but we expect him home to-day."

"And is he still as low-spirited and as silent as when I saw him last?" inquired Adolphe.

"Unfortunately, yes," replied the gentle matron. "I fear that he has involved himself in speculations beyond our means; and that the idea of having compromised the future welfare of his children presses heavily upon him. But your unlooked-for return, Adolphe, and your happy tidings, will, I trust, restore him to cheerfulness."

As soon as the family circle had become somewhat more composed, and that each person was at length permitted to speak at a time, Adolphe was overwhelmed with questions, every member of the party being desirous to learn all that he had done since their last parting.

"It is, at all events, a blessing," said his mother, as she fondly passed her hand over his hair, "that you have performed your journey without any accident, my son, however monotonous you may have found it."

"Nay, my dearest mère," smiled Adolphe, "it was not altogether so monotonous as you may imagine; for I at least met with one adventure strange enough to bear telling."

"An adventure, and a strange one!" exclaimed his sisters, simultaneously. "Oh, Adolphe, let us hear it."

He complied with their request; and no creek around him grew paler than his own as he recilled the extraordinary event of the previous night.

"And, by-the-by," he added, when he had brought his narrative to a close, "I must not forget to tell you that I carried away with me the undeniable proofs of my victory. Here they are." And as he spoke he drew a handkerchief from his pocket, in which something was evidently folded.

At that very instant the door of the room opened, and a man entered, large in stature, but pale and weak, and in his clothes saturated with rain. He could scarcely stagger to a chair before he sank down like one whose vital powers were utterly exhausted; and in a moment the whole family were crowded about him.

"My father! my dear father!", exclaimed Adolphe. "Weary as you evidently are, how thankful I am that you have returned! I have news for you that will, I know, be welcome."

As he spoke the young man extended his hand, but the action met with no response; and as he glanced toward it, to which was so strangely withheld he remarked that it was enveloped in a bloodstained linen.

"What!" he asked, anxiously, "are you suffering from more than fatigue? Have you been wounded?"

"Yes," was the faint reply. "As I was coming through the forest, four leagues from this, I was attacked by robbers. I had heard that they were in the neighborhood; but I believed it to be an idle rumor. I endeavored to defend myself, and in the fray one of the ruffians was cut off two of my fingers. I am faint from loss of blood. Give me some wine, and I shall soon be better."

Madame de Roval hurried to the sideboard, and with a trembling hand and swimming eyes brought the desired refreshment, while the two elder girls wound their arms about their father's neck, and wept piteously. Adolphe stood motionless, like one in a frightful dream. But little Rosalie, the pet and plaything of the family, too young to comprehend the sorrow on which she looked, and full of curiosity to see what her soldier-brother had really brought home, untied herself in unfolding the handkerchief which had fallen from his hand on the entrance of his father, and she had no sooner succeeded than, clapping her delicate hands in childish delight, she called out, almost breathlessly,

"Maman! maman! Adolphe has got the two fingers he cut off at the inn. Give them to poor papa, and then he will be quite well again."

In another hour M. de Roval was in the hands of justice. The landlord of Le Grand Roi had been so active in his exertions to redeem the honor of his house that the gens d'armes had tracked the culprit by the traces of his blood; and in the extremity of their anguish his family had forgotten to urge upon him a second flight.

On the 20th of December the assize court of

THE MYSTERIOUS FINGERS.

...turn ... reprouver, on which his wretched father was seated between two gens d'armes; and the President, touched by the painfulness of his position, gave him permission to withdraw.

Jean Antoine Ebrard was the next witness called. He had been dead three weeks.

As the third name rang through the hall a young girl, dressed in deep mourning, and wearing a long black veil which concealed her face, was led to the witness-chair. As she took the oath she trembled violently; but when desired to say if she recognized the prisoner, she answered, firmly, "No."

Poor Marie! She had perjured herself to save the father of the youth to whom, in one short hour, she had given away her heart. Adolphe had been, as we have already said, the solitary ray of brightness which had pierced through the darkness of her lot; and in seeking to save him one bitter pang she had periled her own soul.

The circumstantial evidence against M. de Rosval was overwhelming, but still failed to establish the identity of the culprit. The evidence of the Juvidord or his step-daughter must have condemned him; but the one was dead, and the other had positively sworn that she had never seen him before.

After the counsel for the prosecution (procureur de roi) had addressed the court, the counsel for the prisoner made an able speech, in which he strenuously endeavored to prove an alibi. He stated that it was impossible to prove that the prisoner at the bar had slept at the auberge of Le Grand Roi on the night of the mysterious event which had led to the present trial, since the only witness now alive, who must have seen him had such been the case, had solemnly assured the court that she did not recognize him. "No, gentlemen of the jury," he concluded, "the accused has been a victim, not an assassin. That he has been mutilated by violence is certain; but he has explained, in the clearest manner, the cause of this unfortunate coincidence; and the sword of the son is unstained by the father's blood."

"To prove which fact," exclaimed a hollow and almost inarticulate voice from amidst the crowd in the body of the court, "there are the fingers which I cut off under the door of my room." And as Adolphe ceased speaking an officer of the court laid them upon the desk of the President.

Having silently examined them, an expression of astonishment was visible upon the countenance of the learned judge, who handed them to the procureur, by whom they were in turn transferred to the jury-box. It was at once perceived that the severed fingers thus produced in evidence had belonged to the left hand, while M. de Rosval was mutilated in the right!

Three days subsequently Adolphe had ceased to live. Mortification had supervened upon the frightful wound which he had inflicted upon himself, in order to save the life of his father, and to preserve the honor of his family.

The young soldier's career was over; his dream of fame had gone down with him to the grave. He met Marie once more; they had been self-sacrificed in a common cause. Each appreciated the devotion of the other—each felt that thenceforward they had done with the world, and the world with them. Adolphe de Rosval lies in the cemetery of his native town; and Marie Delfour, after performing a penance of many years as a Sister of Charity, has found a grave in one of the West Indian Islands.

THE PALACE AT PALERMO.

Our readers will be glad to see the accompanying picture of the royal palace at Palermo, which figures so prominently in the stirring news from Europe. This palace, which is one of the great attractions of Palermo, was first built near a thousand years ago, by the Saracens, and was afterward considerably altered by the Normans. Its architecture bears many marks of both styles. The apartments are handsome; the roofs are arched, the floors marble, and the furniture classic and suitable. On a pillar in front of the palace stands the "last rani" of Syracuse. Once there were four of them, which used to stand at the four corners of the town, with gaping mouths: the wind rushing through their hollow bodies sounded sonorously, and enabled the mariners of those days to say whence it blew. The palace is seldom occupied by any of the royal family of Naples. It is the residence of the Lieutenant-Governor, whose functions consist in receiving the citizens; while sbirri and military despots carry on the business of government.

By this time, doubtless, the palace is in the hands of Garibaldi, and the Bourbon stamp is effaced from its front. It is high time. This palace was the spot where the famous massacre known as the Sicilian Vespers was planned and commenced. God grant that the victorious revolutionists may not have stained their triumph by deeds of retribution which may recall that terrible event!

CHAPTER XXV.

THE MOUSE THAT GNAWED THE NET.

As the powder vomited forth its dreadful thunder, and as the stones and timbers from the blasted den were hurled high in air and were scattered by the explosive whirlwind far and near, some of the splinters and fragments came down in dropping hail upon the red-tiled sheds and the Doctor's dwelling. At the first shock the lonely child started up in his little bed, and while the earth rocked and the stones came pelting and crashing on the roof, he screamed, "Maman! maman!" No loving echo came back to those innocent lips, and naught was heard save the crackling of the flame beyond, licking its tongue along the dry timber and roaring joyously as it was fed. "Maman! chère maman!"

Yet no answer, and still the savage flames came careering wildly on till the very stones of the court-yard cracked like slates, while the burning flakes and cinders landed the air, and the ...stonds into the ...crying, ...and the little ...h one open door- ...ook' ag with the de- ...him, he staggered fee- ...ack. Yet again a flurry of ...ed up the forked and vivid ...nased the child before it.

I mother! in your poignant grief for ... of your poor drowned boy you ... the agony of seeing him, even in imag- ...ation, struggling faintly before that tempest ... and smoke, calling plaintively for her on whose tender bosom his head had rested, while his naked feet were cut and bruised by the sharp coral shingle beneath them. Then onward and onward the boy wandered, and fortunately his footsteps struck the path into a purer atmosphere which led toward the chapel. Here he looked timidly around at the lurid glare behind him, and then entered the church and sank down exhausted, his feverish, smarting eyes closing in slumber on the hard pavement beneath the image of the Virgin Mary.

Then came the close and sultry night—no murmur of a land wind to drive the smoky canopy away—the black cinders falling in burning rain on basin, thicket, and lagoon, till even the very lizards and scorpions hid themselves deep within the holes and crevices of the rocks. Midnight came. The dim and silent stars were obscured by a veil of heavy clouds, and with a low muttering sound of thunder the vapory masses unclosed their portals and the rain fell in torrents. The flames, now nearly quenched with their work, leaped out occasionally from the fallen ruins, but were quenched by the tropical deluge and smouldered away amidst the charred and saturated timbers. Then the thunder ceased, the lizards and scorpions came from their retreats, the teal fluttered over the lagoon, and the noise of the waves bursting over the reef came again to the ear. Still there was no breath of air—the atmosphere was thick and damp, and out from the mangrove thickets and wide expanse of cactus swarms of insects, mosquitoes and sand-flies in myriads went buzzing and singing in the sultry, murky night.

So dragged on the weary hours until day broke again, and the sea-birds floated off seaward for their morning's meal, and the flying-fish skipped with their silvery wings from wave to wave, as the dolphins glittered in gold and purple after them below the blue water. No bright and blazing sun came over the hills of Cuba to light up this picture, but all was blight and gloom, with murky masses of dead, still clouds hanging low down over the island.

The little suffering boy lying there on the coral pavement, with his head resting on the thin delicate arm, with pale sweet face turned half upward toward the Virgin, gave a feeble cry and opened his eyes. He rose to a sitting posture, with his little hands resting on his lap and little ragged shirt. Then, with his dim hazed eyes fixed upon the painting, while the tears coursed slowly down his pallid cheeks, he put forth his hands in a childish movement of supplication and murmured again his tearful prayer, "Maman! maman!"

Presently rising, he turned his feeble footsteps toward the door-way, and as his eye caught the stone bowl of holy water standing on its coral pedestal near the portal, he bent down his feverish head and slaked his parched lips. Revived by this, he timidly looked out from the chapel, and shuddering as he beheld the gloomy wilderness around, he once more screamed in a thin piercing cry, "Maman! oh, ma chère maman!"

That was the last sad wail for help for many and many a long year that those infant lips were destined to utter; and when he again called upon that dear name his manly arms would clasp a joyful mother to his swelling heart.

"AH, HENRI, SEE IF YOU CAN NOT SLIP THAT PRETTY SILK ROPE OVER MY HEAD."

"Henri!" came back like an echo in a clear shout to the shriek of the boy. "Henri! Henri!" was reiterated again and again, each time in a voice that seemed to split asunder the canopy of clouds above.

The boy started and listened; "Henri! Henri! this way to your good friend the Doctor! Quick, my little boy!"

Now with the step of a fawn the child ran out upon the sharp sandy esplanade, and following the voice as he tripped lightly through the narrow pathway of the needle-pointed cactus, in a moment he stopped, with a look of horror, beside the trestle on which the bound and nearly naked man was stretched.

Ay, it was a sight to make a strong and stalwart man turn pale with sickness and horror, much less a baby boy of three or four years old. Ay, there lay the man, all through the dreadful night, with swarms on swarms and myriads upon myriads of stinging insects biting, and sipping, and sucking his life-blood with distracting agony away. Ah, think of the hellish torture often practiced by those bloody pirates upon their victims in the West Indies! The bound man's eyes were closed, the lips and cheeks were puffed and swollen out of all human proportions, and the inflamed body was one gloving, red, and angry surface. No needle could have been stuck where the venomous stings of a thousand mad-flies or mosquitoes had not already sucked blood. Ay, well might the child start back with horror!

"It is your friend the Doctor, Henri," he said in French, still in a strong but kindly voice. "I can not see you, but get me a knife! No, my child, never mind, you can not find one; don't leave me!"

Here the child timidly put his little hands out and brushed away the poisonous insects, and then touched the Doctor's face.

"Ah, Henri, see if you can not slip that pretty silk rope over my head; yes, that is the way —doucement—easily, my child! Well, now, my Henri, you are weak and sick, my poor little boy; but listen to me! yes, I feel your little hands on my eyes. Well, bite upon that cord that goes across my throat. Bite till it snaps asunder! I can nearly choking, little one, but don't cry."

True! the strips of rawhide, which had partially slackened in the rain that had washed the body of the victim, now began to tauten again in the sultry heat of the morning, and lay half hidden in the swollen throat, stomach, and limbs of the tortured sufferer.

Henri's sharp little teeth fastened upon the strand, biting and gnawing, until finally it was severed, and the Doctor gave a great sigh of relief.

"Blessings on you, my poor boy!" he murmured, painfully. "Now bite away on the strands which bind the arm. There! Don't! don't hurry! Rest a little, my child! Ah, it is well!"

Again those sharp little teeth of a mouse had gnawed through the net which bound the lion-hearted man; the ends of the rawhide drew back and twisted into spiral curls, and the right arm, though numb and four times its original size, was free.

"Thanks be to God for all His mercies!"—exclaimed the Doctor, as with difficulty he raised his released arm to his face and pushed back the swollen lids from his closed eyes!—"and to you, my little friend, for saving this wretched life!"

Waiting a few moments to recover his strength, the Doctor made a mighty effort, and some of the coils whose strands had been cut by those little teeth yielded and gradually unrove, so as to leave the upper part of his body free. Then while the child was once more cutting the lashings of his feet he himself unfastened the knots of his left arm, and by a vigorous effort he tore the net from off him and sat upright. Clasping his numbed and swollen hands together, he turned his face and almost sightless eyes to Heaven.

"May this awful trial serve as a partial forgiveness of my sins and make me a better man!"

He paused and laid his heavy arms around the child, while warm and grateful tears trickled down his cheeks. Slowly, and like a drunken man, his feet sought the sand, and then, weak, trembling, and faint, he staggered along the path—the boy tripping lightly before him—till he fell exhausted on the floor of the chapel.

"Water, my Henri! water!"

The child scooped it out from the stone bowl with his tiny hands and sprinkled it on his friend's face.

"There, that will suffice, my brave boy! Lay your cheek to mine!"

What a sight it was! That dark, swollen, powerful frame lying on the coral pavement, and the innocent child, like a dew-drop on the leaf of a red tropical flower, nestling close beside him.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE HURRICANE.

PAST a September noon. The great canopy of dark, murky clouds fell lower and lower, until they nearly touched the earth, wrapping as in a blanket the single cocoa-nut tree on the strand, and shutting out the light and air of heaven as they settled over the noxious lagoon, the mangrove thickets, and pure inlet. The seabirds cease screaming in free seaward, fluttering their wide-spread wings in the sultry atmosphere and alighting on the smooth rocks, where they furled their pinions and put their heads together. The flying-fish no longer skimmed over the waves, and the dolphin and shark sank deep down in the blue water, or lay still and quiet beside the coral groves. The rolling, swelling ocean of the tropic, with its glassy, greasy surface unruffled by the faintest air, rolled heavily on until it struck the coral ledge, when, with a dull, heavy roar, it broke over in creamy foam and came sluggishly in to the sandy beach. There the tiny waves lashed the shelly strand, and all was still again. No sun, no air; and even the birds and serpents and insects gasped for breath. The fish below the sea, the animated nature above, and the very leaves and vines of the forests and thickets knew what was brewing in the great vacuum around.

Slowly and painfully the man in the chapel regained his feet, and, with the child by the hand, moved on to the farthest corner by the rude altar, where he sank down again, and, clasping the boy to his heart, waited in breathless awe. As if the powder and flames had not done their destructive work, the wrath of Heaven was to be poured out over the devoted den of the pirates.

Then came a ballooning roar as a current of wind swept over the sea, cutting a pathway in the blue water and scooping it up in an impalpable spray, hurrying on to the low bench of the island, and tearing the sand and shells up in heaps—and then a lull. Now, as if all the demons of winds had let loose their cavernous lungs from the four quarters of the earth, and, like the shocks of artillery, volley upon volley, came the hurricane. The sea became one boiling, seething, hissing surface of foam, pressed as flat as marble by the weight of the tempest, which laid the black rocks bare on the ledge, and drove the water into both mouths of the quake, flat to the... mightier, and ... masses of never-ending ... down like dark midnight, as if hea... had come together. All through the gloomy day and through the night this elemental war, with its legions of careering demons, continued to lash the sea and smite the land; and then, as if satiated with vengeance, the clouds belched forth in red lightning, vomiting out peal upon peal of awful thunder as a parting salute, and then moderating down to a hard gale from another quarter, broke away. The blue sky appeared, and the glorious sun once more came up in his majesty over the distant hills of Cuba.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE VIRGIN MARY.

WITH the boy clasped to his heart the Doctor sat beside the altar of the chapel during all the direful strife without; shielding his little charge from the clouds of fine sand and rubbish that every few minutes came swirling within the sacred temple; dashing the Padre's candlesticks into battered lumps of brass on the pavement, and tearing to atoms the votive offerings hung around the walls by the pirates. But as if in mercy to the trustful souls lying there, the Virgin Mary still looked down in sweet pity upon them, and the little chapel stood unharmed.

When at last, however, the hurricane's back had been broken, and Æolus had reined back his maddened chargers and curbed their flying wings, and when all the demons of the winds had gone moaningly back to their caverns in the clouds, the Doctor arose, and with the boy beside him, knelt devoutly before the altar while he uttered a fervent prayer of thanksgiving.

"Come, my Henri! now we may go out and see if we can find something to eat and drink! You are weak and hungry, my poor little boy! But you shall not suffer much longer!"

That strong man, with the heart of a gentle woman, had no thought of how ill, and famished, and thirsty he himself was from the terrible torture he had endured! No, he only thought of the child who had saved him.

In front of the chapel the sand and bushes were piled up in ridge heaps, the coral wall around the cemetery had been thrown down, while the flat head-stones over the pirates' graves had disappeared entirely. Not so, however, with the white slabs near by where those poor ments, one a... ter in which he slaked his ... with his own, and afterward poured water over their bodies. Then, from a still smouldering beam which puffed out at intervals a thin curl of smoke from beneath one of the sheds, he lit a fire in the court-yard; and then from the wreck of the store-room he succeeded in rescuing some hard biscuit and a ham. This last he tore in shreds, and placing them on sticks before the fire, they were thus enabled to make a hearty meal, first providing for the wants of the child, however, soaking the biscuit for him, as if it were his first duty on earth. Again raising the boy in his arms, he passed from the ruined sheds and bent his steps toward Captain Brand's former dwelling. The road was heaped with shells and sand, strewed with shoals of dead fish and wounded or dying birds, while the wreck of a boat, mingled with the timbers and planks of the jetty to the basin, were lying pell-mell on the beach of the little cove. Casting his eyes around in search of the once spacious dwelling, with its vaults, verandas, and saloon, he could hardly at first trace a vestige of the structure. The powder, more destructive even than the hurricane, had tossed walls and building into a confused heap of rubbish; then came the wind and sand on top of the rocks which had tumbled down by the concussion of the first explosion, and then the water, packing all together as if no habitation had ever existed there. The Doctor walked slowly around until he came to the angle where the kitchen once was, and there, three-fourths hidden beneath a mass of blackened stones and charred timber, peered forth the white skeleton of a human being. The flesh had been seared and burned from the face and skull by the instantaneous flash of the powder, and there lay the remains of Babette, whitely bleached, as if she had been thrown a lifeless corpse on the seabeach. A few yards below this frightful spectacle lay a number of shattered boxes and trunks, now a confused bundle of clothes, and a sandy saturated collection of kitchen utensils and crockery. Yes, the poor dumb woman, the creature and witness of many a cruel scene, ignorant or uncertain of the warning given her by the master she loved, had fallen another tribute to his long list of victims.

BUILDING THE BOAT.

the early morning the man and the boy arose and took their way to the cove. The little fellow was clean and tidy now, dressed in a little loose calico frock and a queer contrivance of an old bonnet fashioned out of Babette's gear, and on his feet were a pair of little canvas slippers stitched for him by his protector. After a bath in the basin of the inlet the five were kindled and the simple breakfast prepared. Then, while the strong man hewed and sawed and hammered beneath a temporary awning which covered the open work-shop, the boy would pick up shells along the cove, or, with a little rod and line, seated on a flat rock near by, jerk out fish from the basin to serve for dinner. Sometimes he would wander about in search of nuts and spices for the boat, or gather sticks for the fire—but never out of hail, and never beyond the watchful eyes of his friend. Yes! those watchful, kind eyes followed his slightest movements; and while the hammer was going in vigorous blows on the planks, or the axe chopping away a timber, his pleasant voice sang Creole songs to the child or encouraged his innocent prattle. A bonded musket which, with some ammunition, he had dug out from the wreck of his old quarters, stood leaning against an upright post under the shade, and was to the man or beast that might have dared to approach the boy! In the burning heat of the tropical day the labor ceased, and the child either lay in his bunk on the soft sands beneath the awning, kicking up his little legs, watching the small gulls as they skimmed across the basin, or, with his brown, curly head resting on the Doctor's knees, slept sweetly. Happy and contented he was, too, with the return of health and strength; and if his budding memory looked back to her he had lost and the recollection of his faithful Bonne, it was only for a moment, and, like a childish dream, it passed away.

Every evening at sunset, when the work was done for the day, the Doctor, with Henri in his arms and the musket on his shoulder, would climb the crag and peer all around the island; but never a sail did he see from the hour the Centipede spread her canvas, while he lay helplessly bound on the trestle with the green moss around his neck. As the twilight faded the sole human occupants of the island returned to the chapel, and when they had said a simple prayer, kneeling before the Virgin, they laid themselves down on their canvas bed to repose till the dawn. Many a silent hour in the watch of the tedious night did the Doctor lie awake, while the cool, sweet breath of the child fanned his cheek as he lay nestling beside him, pondering and wondering on the fate of his charge. He knew absolutely nothing about his history, save that he had been pitched overboard from the brig the pirates were robbing; but what was the name or nation of the vessel, where from, or whither bound, he was in utter ignorance. He had questioned the tender, Gibbs, on that occasion after the chase by the corvette, after he had lopped off the brute's leg; but what with suffering and drink the ruffian had either forgotten the brig's name or feigned to, and all he could impart was the belief that she was an English craft. Even from the boy, the Doctor could elicit nothing of importance, though day by day he tried every means of lending the child's mind back to the past; but al...s with the same result.

"Ou, ou chire manan! Ban Bonne?" and "Ma petite cousine Zoradie?" These were the only words the little fellow had to link his fate with the future; and even the latter became fainter and fainter on his mind and tongue as the time passed on. With this delicate web around the destiny of the child, and that he spoke French, and had evidently been tenderly nurtured, the Doctor was forced to be content.

Well, so the days and nights went by, and so the work went on, and the little ark began to assume a wholesome look, and to be capable of plowing the distant main. Then, when she was planked up, with a gunwale on, and half-decked over forward, she was called and the seams payed with pitch. When all ready for launching one who had passed a lifetime on the ocean, from the China seas to the broad Atlantic, under the suns of the tropics as well as in the dim gloom of high latitudes—the Doctor studied the clouds and watched their course, noting the flight of the birds in the air and the track of fish in the sea. At last the trade-breezes began to blow regularly and steadily; the land winds, too, in the gray of the morning, fluttered timidly away out to sea, and the round pearly moon shone bright and mellow over rock and water.

"To-morrow, my brave boy, we shall sail away from the island. Ah! you clap your hands, eh? Yes, we shall go to find mama?" This was said as man and child stood for the last time on the lofty crag, while the former ranged his dark eyes scrutinizingly around the horizon. Nothing in sight!

Once more to their chapel of refuge, where, for the first time in all their association, putting the child to sleep by himself, the Doctor sat down on the trestle by the entrance, and, lighted by the brilliant moon, he caught up the tangled meshes of the lisle net which had bound him, and sedulously applied himself to a task before him.

Any one who has seen the effect produced by a violent gale upon the tattered shreds of a shivered main-topsail, bound up into the smart tortoise knots that it is possible to conceive of, and so hard and solid that you might saw the canvas bulls, like bacon, in slices, may form some idea of the task the Doctor had imposed upon himself to loosen the hide strands tied together by the furious fingers of the hurricane. Patiently and quietly, with no sign of temper, he applied himself to the work, and with nothing but a sharp-pointed spike to aid his hands, he began to unravel, bit by bit, the laced knots and bunches of rawhide—without ever cutting a strand—until, as the moon sank glimmering down, the tangled mass lay in clear coils beside him—though in several pieces, where it had been severed by the recoil of that little mouse purring behind the altar—and the task was done. Then raising the trestle he bore it within the altar, and with the now unraveled coil of hide, and the softer silk rope for a pillow, he again stretched himself upon what once had been his bed of torture.

For what possible object all this labor had been undertaken, or for what future purpose—vague they must have been—no one but the perseverying man who did it can tell; and there he lay—his sound comings from his oppressed lips—till the day dawned. Then he arose, and, kneeling over the sleeping child, he again solemnly repeated the oath he had before taken in his hut:

"Sleeping or waking, on land or sea, I devote the remainder of my wretched life to returning this lost child to his mother. So help me God!"

The little boy stirred, as if the angels and the sweet Virgin were whispering their protecting power over him, and, with a smile dawning upon his rosy, dimpled cheeks, he raised the lids from his bright hazel eyes, and put his fat round arms around the Doctor's neck. If few great drops fell upon that upturned innocent little face from the dark full eyes bending over him, they were not tears of sorrow! And, as if with the dew of hope and trustfulness falling from the soul of a repentant sinner relying upon an all-wise Providence.

"Come, my Henri, say your little prayer of the morning, and we will go!" The man had taught the child that little prayer which he himself had learned at his mother's knee.

Up again to the crag and down on the shelly margin of the shore; and a long look the man gave at the pain of shed and den as he gently placed the child on a stand-log in the stern sheets of the ark. Then he cast off the rope which held the vessel to the bared strand, hoisted the sail, and, as she bobbled along the inlet with the first sigh of the land-wind, he stood at the helm with his bare head lighted up by the beams of the rising sun, and his lips moved in prayer.

Now, wosiclessly, through the Tiger's Trap sailed the little pinnace till she bowed her

CHILTON ON THE CROTON, OR RIVER WATER.
The Diarrhœan Filter, manufactured by McKENZIE & O'HARA, is the kind of porous filter to which I alluded in my recent report to the Croton Board. I consider the article a most valuable one, and believe the filtering medium to be of excellent article for the purpose. The instrument is quite durable, and only requires to be reversed occasionally to insure its action.
JAMES R. CHILTON, M.D., Chemist.
Visit the sources of the CROTON RIVER, and observe the Dyeing Establishments, Stable Yards, and other causes of impurity, or send HARPER'S for March, on the "Inhabitants of the Croton and other River Waters," and you will not drink it unless filtered. Sold and Warranted by McKENZIE & O'HARA, 376 Fourth Street, New York.

To use the words of a leading American journalist and foreign correspondent, "scientific as well as practical observation convinces us that an all-wise Providence has supplied in the vegetable kingdom and in simple forms, remedies for every disease incident to humanity." The celebrated English reformer, Graham, says: "Man endeavors to effect his ends by multiplied and complicated measures, forgetting that God accomplishes the most mighty ends by simple means, most of which He has placed at the disposal of inquiring men." "It is because of their complicated prescriptions, and, ponderous machinery that people have lost so much faith in medical schools, and it is precisely because of their simple and natural methods of cure that the Graefenberg theory and practice has become so universally popular with the people, and is so rapidly gaining the entire confidence of the greatest medical intellects throughout the civilized world. The Graefenberg medical preparations, guided by true science, have achieved the most eminent success, and must ere long revolutionize the entire present system of treating disease. For a sixth of a century these medicines have been in practical use, and now there is no portion of the Christian world but what is familiar with them—simple but effective remedies, the discovery of which may well throw ordinary scientific and philanthropic advantages far into the shade."

THE GRAEFENBERG FAMILY MEDICINES comprise VEGETABLE PILLS for general family use, and for Fevers, Liver Complaint, Dyspepsia, Costiveness, &c. SALVES for Piles, Burns, Bruises, and all Inflammation. Syrups, invaluable in all cases of Bowel Complaints. SARSAPARILLAS and BITTERS for Scrofulas, Eruptions, Humors, Debility, &c. REMEDIES FOR CONSUMPTION, the most certain ever known. A PANACEA FOR CHILDREN, which is universally esteemed as superior to any other medical preparation in all the ailments of infancy, &c. The series consists of eleven valuable family medicines, and they are NOT CONTAIN ONE PARTICLE OF CALOMEL NOR ANY MINERAL DRUG WHATEVER, but are prepared from purely vegetable substances by the most skillful physicians in the various departments of healing for which they are designed.

Fifteen years of sample and varied experience has established beyond the shadow of a doubt that this Catholicon will restore functional and general health, freshness of complexion, and it will do this at all ages of female life, from the young girl languidly bedding into womanhood, to when the "turn of life" leaves the system enfeebled and unable to meet the demands of the change upon the system. It should be used in all cases attended with ANY of the following symptoms, AS THEY SPRING NAUSEA FROM THE SAME CAUSE.

THE SICILIAN INSURRECTION.

WE continue in this number our series of illustrations of the INSURRECTION IN SICILY. Besides the graphic picture below, the reader will find on page 420 two fine engravings of GARIBALDI'S CAMP and the ENTRY INTO PALERMO. Our last number contained splendid engravings of the DEPARTURE OF GARIBALDI'S FORCE FROM GENOA, and of the ROYAL PALACE AT PALERMO. In NOS. 180 and 181 will be found fine views of PALERMO, MESSINA, and NAPLES, a splendid PORTRAIT OF GARIBALDI, and a very accurate and valuable MAP OF THE KINGDOM OF THE TWO SICILIES, etc.

AWAY WITH YOU, BABY, AWAY TO THE GARDEN.

MUSA.

AWAY with you, baby, away to the garden,
And leave ugly Latin to Algernon, do:
He must learn the lesson, although it's a hard one,
But, darling, there's plenty of time before you.

Oh, if you but knew, dear, you'd run like the kitten,
And scamper away from a future that waits:—
If you knew the dry nonsense the big folks have written
On purpose to pester the little folks' pates.

We want all poor Algernon's deepest attention,
You see his sad case by the way that he frowns;
He's fighting a thing that they call a declension—
A sort of a regiment of soldiers called nouns.

He'll beat them, you know, for he's brave and he's willing;
And going to work at them, hammer and tongs,
And mamma knows who'll give him a splendid new shilling
As soon as he's perfect to—here, see,—"By Songs."

So don't interrupt him, my darling, with chatter,
He stops in his lesson to look up and laugh:
His fragile conception of datives you scatter,
And cut his poor ablative plural in half.

What, blue eyes wide open at hearing such tidings,
At being accused in such very long words,
And looking as wistful as if they were chidings?
No, darling, run off to the flowers and the birds.

Eh? you want a lesson? Well! count all those roses,
For each you leave out you must pay me a kiss:
And Al shall be free, too, the moment he knows his Musæ, musarum, mu—what, Al?—musis.

So off with you, baby, and O! be contented
That you've got no lesson to cloud that white brow,
Some day you'll wish Latin had not been invented:
Perhaps, in her heart, mamma wishes so now.

TORTURE IN SICILY.

THE papers are full of accounts of the fiendish cruelties practiced by the Neapolitan jailers upon political prisoners: we now engrave a scene of torture which will make the blood of many a reader run cold. The engraving represents the application of the tourniquet to a prisoner who is suspected of sympathy with Garibaldi. The tourniquet is a cord passed round the head, and tightened by means of a stick inserted in it till the skin cracks and the eyes start from their sockets. In the instances depicted in our engraving the torture is inflicted in the presence of the head of the police, Maniscalco, who stands at the table watching its effects and hoping to extort a confession from the writhing victim, who, previous to the application of the tourniquet, had been lashtanded on the soles of the feet.

M. Charles de la Varenne has lately published a detailed account of the tortures practiced on prisoners in Sicily. Many of the cases he describes are too horrible for publication.

"Every commissary, every jailer," says M. de la Varenne,

THE TORTURE OF THE TOURNIQUET, AS PRACTICED IN THE PRISONS IN SICILY, A.D. 1860.

"has his own method of applying torture. It is revolting to come to details, but they are unhappily exact, and confirmed by official authority. The famous Pontillo owes his reputation to the species of torture which he applies in his own commissariat, making the victim sit down in a railed arm-chair set with razor-blades, under which is placed a pan of burning coals. The inspector, Louis Maniscalco, the namesake of the General De Pestor, applies to the accused little iron hands provided with a closing-screw. This is called, in the language of the police, 'the agitation of conviction.' The jailer, Bruno, belonging to the police commissariat of the odious Carrega (there is a prison in each commissariat), tortures by stripping the victim of his clothes and binding his head between his legs. Others employ the torture of the tourniquet, drawing a cord with a stick round the left thigh round the head of the accused till the skin cracks and the eyes start from their sockets. Some have recourse to starvation, to blows, to the deprivation of light and breathable air. But the satellite of the Director-General who outstrips all others is the notorious Captain Chonnici, born a peasant in the village of Belmonte, a rubber by profession, and now an officer of police and a chief inquisitor."

There can be very little question of the ultimate fate of a régime which sustains itself by such atrocities as these.

A MUSICAL INSTRUMENT.

BY ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

I.

WHAT was he doing, the great god Pan,
Down in the reeds by the river?
Spreading ruin and scattering ban,
Splashing and paddling with hoofs of a goat,
And breaking the golden lilies afloat
With the dragon-fly on the river?

II.

He tore out a reed, the great god Pan,
From the deep cool bed of the river.
The limpid water turbidly ran,
And the broken lilies a-dying lay,
And the dragon-fly had fled away,
Ere he brought it out of the river.

III.

High on the shore sate the great god Pan,
While turbidly flowed the river,
And hacked and hewed as a great god can,
With his hard bleak steel at the patient reed,
Till there was not a sign of a leaf indeed
To prove it fresh from the river.

IV.

He cut it short, did the great god Pan,
(How tall it stood in the river!)
Then drew the pith, like the heart of a man,
Steadily from the outside ring,
Then notched the poor dry empty thing
In holes as he sate by the river.

V.

"This is the way," laughed the great god Pan, (Laughed while he sate by the river!)
"The only way since gods began
To make sweet music they could succeed."
Then, dropping his mouth to a hole in the reed,
He blew in power by the river.

VI.

Sweet, sweet, sweet, O Pan,
Piercing sweet by the river!
Blinding sweet, O great god Pan!
The sun on the hill forgot to die,
And the lilies revived, and the dragon-fly
Came back to dream on the river.

VII.

Yet half a beast is the great god Pan
To laugh, as he sits by the river,
Making a poet out of a man.
The true gods sigh for the cost and pain—
For the reed that grows nevermore again
As a reed with the reeds in the river.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 7, 1860.

THE IRISH AT HOME AND ABROAD.

IT seems that the Pope has not, after all, got such a bargain in his Irish recruits. By the latest advices from Rome Lamoricière is debating whether the sympathy of his Irish friends does not cost more than it is worth. At Ancona and some other places, it appears, the Irish levies not only quarrelled so fiercely among themselves as almost to demoralize the garrison, but insisted upon quarters, rations, and subsidies far beyond the capacity of the poor Papal treasury. Indeed, from all the accounts which reach us, it would seem that these new champions of Papal despotism are likely to prove even a greater nuisance to his Holiness than the Transteverini themselves. Unhappily for the Pope, they can not be got rid of without some trouble and expense. One regiment, after leaving their home against the protest of their Government, no sooner landed in the Papal States than they quarreled with the authorities, and forthwith appealed to the British Consul for protection!

If it were possible to regard these volunteers as isolated individuals their conduct would hardly justify comment. Every country contains a certain number of reckless ne'er-do-weels, who are ready to seek excitement in warfare as soldiers of fortune, caring nothing about the justice of the cause for which they fight. But the course of the Irish press, and the attitude of Irish leaders abroad and at home forbid the assumption that the Pope's Irish mercenaries belong to this class. Irish prelates bless the recruits as they march to battle under the banner of the law; Irish journals praise the enterprise, and invoke blessings on its issue. Irish gentlemen subscribe money, and proclaim their sympathy with the Pope's cause and with his new defenders. Even here, in New York, Archbishop Hughes accepts a standard of divine service to utter a violent appeal on behalf of the Pope's temporal sovereignty, and to denounce, with characteristic bitterness, the Revolutionists of Italy as the enemies of civil freedom for themselves and their children. Surely it is not unjust, in view of these indications, to assume that the Irish race must be largely responsible for the conduct of the Pope's Irish mercenaries.

To a philosophic mind these considerations are unimportant. We know very well that all the Irish in the world can not prevent the accomplishment of God's purposes in Italy. For the sons of Saint Patrick were there in numerous as they are, and ten times as valuable alike as they are proving, they could not long uphold the rotten, loathsome, hideous despotism which now burdens Central Italy as a tyrannous. The night must prevail in spite of man's wrongheadedness and priests' appeals to ignorance and superstition.

But the Irish demonstrations in favor of Papal tyranny should not be thrown away upon us. We, too, have our Irish with the Pope, not only in this city, but in the country at large. The Irish race in the United States is very powerful, far more so than its mere numbers would justify. It swarms most of the large cities, not only on the sea-board, but in the interior also. Our native population, and the bulk of our German, English, and Scotch settlers generally become producers and tillers of the earth; the Irish cling to the cities, and while generally remaining in a position of pecuniary dependence, domicile themselves, with the aid of universal suffrage and loose electoral laws, by usurping political predominance. Irishmen fill a larger proportion of the municipal offices: they direct our police; our mayors, aldermen, and councilmen: they are inspectors of election, commissioners of streets, contractors, wherever power and emolument are found. To a vice and fraud, you will generally find that the evil-doers are Teerness or Peddies or Mickeys. In this city, the metropolis of the United States, their influence is great enough to have honest school-teachers dismissed for the crime of reading the Bible to their scholars.

It is this Irish predominance, which is steadily on the increase, which renders the Irish sympathy with the Pope so instructive. For, as things will at present, the ruling classes in this country will soon be mainly Irish, and the power of Archbishop Hughes (who already declares himself above the Law) in the United States may presently be little less than that of the Pope in Central Italy. It is well that we should see betimes what sort of men these coming rulers of ours are likely to prove. This is a very uncertain world, and full of dramatic surprises: who shall say that the peculiarities of the Papal government which now distress of the old Irish government in Ireland may not be reproduced in this country? Things stranger far have been seen in past times. We should not let such a contingency find us unprepared.

THE JAPANESE BALL.

Now that the Japanese are gone, perhaps it may do no harm to talk a little about the truth about their reception here, and especially about the great ball on the 23d. We have all blushed for the brutishly which characterized the reception of our guests at Philadelphia and Baltimore; nothing, certainly, could have been better calculated to give intelligent foreigners a poor idea of our civilization. The utterly lowly conduct of the populace of these two cities on the occasion of their visit. But, after all, in New York we behaved much better than we deserved.

It was understood, long before, that New York was to give a grand ball in honor of the Japanese. A very large sum of money was appropriated for the purpose. Arrangements were made for an entertainment worthy of the city: no expense was spared to combine scenic effect with grandeur, elegance, and generous hospitality. The ball is over, and what is the public verdict? Decent people are all agreed that it was a monstrous failure.

There was a prodigious crowd there; but who were the guests? From all that we can learn the bulk of the persons present had no right to be there, and the men and women who should have represented New York on such an occasion were not there—many because they were not invited, others because they were afraid to trust their pocket-books in the society of the Aldermen, Councilmen, and their friends. The business of inviting guests was left to a joint Committee of Aldermen and Councilmen. They invited their friends, in the first place, and we need not describe the class of society to which friends of New York Aldermen and Councilmen belong; these supplied with tickets, the others were sold, and the money pocketed by some one. One man, a brother of an Alderman, sold tickets openly at a leading hotel; he insists that the business was extensively prosecuted by others. Tickets were freely offered by Jews in Wall Street at $20 and upward. One man—of course a city official—is said to have raised nearly half the sale of tickets. Having sold this much, need we add that gamblers, and other persons fully as objectionable, found their way to the ball? And that of the 3,000 spectable men who were invited, many shrank from availing themselves of the invitation to appear in such company?

The following is said to the press in the shape of the following letter:

"SIR,—In order to prevent unauthorized parties to represent the Press, the Committee of the Common Council have agreed upon issuing a note to each editor of their respective papers, to send a reporter with this note to be admitted to the grand reception of the Japanese Embassy. Hith inst., the same to be countersigned by the editor." &c. &c.

It is rather a pity some one had not "prevented" the Committee "to write" this letter, for it does not altogether conduce to a singular impression with regard to the working of our common-school system. "Each editor of their respective papers" is vague, to say the least; and that having a note to send a reporter" is perfectly bewildering. The last clause of this Delphic missive is still more puzzling. Was it the Embassy or not the reporter who was to be "countersigned by the editor?" We have heard of soldiers giving the counter-sign; bank-notes, too, have been countersigned by State officials. But who ever heard of countersigning an embassy or a reporter? If common report be true, the counter-signs which are most frequently countersigned by editors are the signs which hang over counters in liquor stores. Could any allusion to these have been intended?

Altogether, the Japanese ball places us pretty fairly on a par with our Philadelphia and Baltimore neighbors.

Henceforth, for pity's sake, let us have no more entertainments at the cost of the city. Let the Rodes entertain people, if they want, at their own expense. But it is time a stop were put to public entertainments at the city's cost which are managed by vulgarians and rogues, for the benefit of gamblers, Aldermen, and Common Councilmen, and to the sorrow and shame of all decent people.

OUR COLLEGES.

We are in the season of College Commencements. Fond mothers and proud fathers are marking the days with a white stone, for their sons are graduating. The boys themselves are realizing a triumph greater than they have ever known in their young experience. Now, for the first time, they are wearing manly laurels, and hearing words of praise from college authentic evidence of scholarship and learning.

How many of the graduates of 1860 have learned any thing that will be of use to them hereafter?

Men are such creatures of routine that he would confess himself a green-horn who would venture at the last moment with what our collegiate institutions cling to old traditions and mouldy examples. Our boys go on, year after year, through the same Freshman and Sophomore beating their brains to compose classics, muddling their poor intellects over metaphysics and prosody—all because boys did the same thing at Oxford and Cambridge in the days of George the Third, and before that. And, after all, perhaps, nothing is more natural. Even in business transactions routine is preferred to theory and reason; much more so in the matter of education, which is generally consigned to dusty old professors, carefully secluded from the light of civilization and the tenth of prognress. Of the heroes of the day some are college graduates; it is respectable to graduate at college. But what is graduation? Why, can it be pretended that a college education is not the right thing?

Of course it is. Every boy to be a lawyer, or a doctor, or an editor, or a merchant, or a broker, or an engineer, it will not avail him much to be able to write classics, to be familiar with the Descartes theory of the mind, to have read Æschylus in the original. It would be of use to him to be familiar with geography and the modern languages, but he can find excellent teachers who would be agreeable, and could not be hurtful for him, to be versed in the great writers of his own tongue. But as there is not time in the college course for a boy to learn all these things —prosody and German, Descartes and chemistry, Æschylus and the laws of trade—the collegiate law requires that the preference shall be given to those branches of study which young men in England one hundred years ago were taught to consider the elements of polite education.

If you say to Cotton Fork—and every honest college graduate will say so—that the farrago of monastic learning and classic trash which is pumped into boys' heads at college is absolutely worse than useless; that it is of no more benefit to them in real life than the Analecta Majora, and that it occupies a place in their minds which should be filled with sensible knowledge, that worthy citizen and farmer will be shocked, and will consider you a monster, a socialist, and an infidel. For he remembers what while he was at college he was always obliged to be content with a common-school education, his contemporaries of gentler birth, went to college, and domineered over him on the strength of it; whereupon he resolved that his sons should go to college, and domineer over their humble acquaintances in like manner. And so our colleges flourish, and turn out, year after year, some as pretty ignoramuses as even Oxford or Cambridge.

The cleverest man in England has defended the University of Cambridge on the ground that boys are taught to row a good oar there. 'Tis a merit which is shared by Yale and Harvard: give them the benefit of it. But, after all, is life nothing but a boat-race? and should the plastic years of youth be devoted to nothing but athletic nonsense and the art of pulling crickets? When will our teachers of youth take a lesson from Germany and Switzerland, and teach their scholars that which may serve them in after-life, and that only? We will vindicate outraged common sense by discarding metaphysics and prosody from our colleges? Where is the Professor with nerve enough to denounce Greek?

THE ORATION.

EIGHTY-FOUR years have passed. It has come again. It has created no hope, and it creating more. It is the only permanent national philosophy. It is written in the Declaration of Independence.

Our great day never dawned more prosperously. The world never so brightly shone with hope as now. The field never so richly waved with harvest as to-day.

If it were possible to sea with the eye the total celebration of this anniversary, as the heart of the Japanese reception was seen; if every where we could see the bright eyes beaming, the happy hearts beating, the glad faces smiling; if we could hear the multitudinous peal of bells sweetly jangling over all the continent, the deep bay of cannon between, as of national watch dogs, the loud bursts of music, the louder shouting, and beneath the external joy a sense of delight and festive relief, we could mark the heart-throbs of hope and faith, how our pride would swell! how our resolution would strengthen! how we should feel the task of American to be the title of the highest human purpose! How we should all, following our reverend fathers, pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honors to the cause in which they led the world!

At the end of the month of June, 1776, the headquarters of General Washington were in the city of New York. The colonial expedition against Canada had failed. The Indians were arming upon the border. The British army from New England, under Lord Howe, with reinforcements from beyond the sea, was daily expected. The city and neighborhood swarmed with Tories, who had formed a plot to seize Washington, and the whole serviceable force of American at his disposal was about eight thousand men, scarcely more than paraded the other day to receive the Japanese, with this difference, that the troops of Washington were all trained, provided, and officered, while the term of enlistment was constantly expiring. But the leader was serene and courageous, the cause was just and the heart of the army; and on the afternoon of the 29th of June, 1776, news was brought to him that forty sail were seen from Staten Island standing up from sea. Joining the ships of Governor Tryon in the harbor, and reinforced by the foreign troops, duplex, a fleet of one hundred and thirty men of war and transports anchored off the shore and landed their troops, which encamped in the sunset along the green slopes of the island.

On the 2d of July Washington called upon the troops to prepare for a momentous conflict, which was to decide their liberties and fortunes; and on the same day the Congress of the Colonies was assembling what John Adams called the greatest question ever debated in America, and as great as ever was or ever will be debated among men." It resulted in a unanimous declaration that the united colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States, and on the 4th it adopted by the Declaration of Independence, drafted by Thomas Jefferson, was adopted.

That is the simple story. But to ripen and round the single golden grain of harvest how all the forces of the elements have combined! If any American would know the lesson of the day, let him read the history of the war. It is so easy for malice to misinterpret, and meanness to misrepresent, the motives of men. Half of the politicians succeed by presuming upon popular ignorance of history. Then, the history of every country and of this war—either in the compact work of Hildreth or the more copious pages of Bancroft. But resolve, at any rate, to do it, and to teach it to your children; and although you may not have sent up a single rocket, or fired a solitary cracker, you will not have lost the Fourth of July.

THE PARK INQUISITION.

IT is a pity that so great a public work as the Central Park should be hampered at every step by the most petty impediments. The Legislature no pointed a Commission to investigate charges against the management. How much the Commission will cost has yet to appear. But the proceedings thus far have developed only the fact that one of the original Commissioners of the Park attempted to make some bargain, by which he should succeed to the Superintendency upon resigning his post that he did resign, after, as he supposed, the plan was perfect; that he publicly stated that the only reason for resigning was, that, as every thing was going so smoothly, he thought he could be released from his labors; that when his bargain failed to be uninformed it) was not fulfilled, he was exceedingly angry, and now prefers various charges of extravagance, inefficiency, and dishonesty—none of which can fairly be said to be sustained.

This is the net result of the investigation to the present hour. Meanwhile and nobody knows why imposed by it, except the gentleman who prefers the charges, and his motives for doing so. When he has openly avowed during the inquiry, that he wrote a letter containing sentiments which he did not hold—a letter "for the eye of the public, and to hide the real motive of the enquiries," why should he suppose that the public will believe him to be any more truthful or earnest now? It is a sorry business. The complainant should have leave to withdraw, and the Commission should dissolve upon the instant. The Central Park is the visible results are such as may be seen already certainly no damaging inquisition should be lightly made; and the personal feeling in which it seems to have prompted it, the matter should end there.

Suppose the work is arrested, or is intrusted to other hands? Nobody will have to wisely conducted it hitherto. Undoubtedly it may be completed cheaper and more hastily. But we suppose that the objections to its cost imply any real desire of economy? Solid, enduring, magnificent work is necessarily costly structure, and handsomer pending you can not have cheaply. The best things command the best prices. The question is, whether we will have the best, or the least thing? whether it shall be worthy New York and America; or whether it shall share the apparently inevitable fate of almost every municipal enterprise, of being poorly done and profusely paid for?

A city which pays twenty thousand dollars a-year for the Croton Aqueduct will not feel parsimonious about a Park; and if it say it does, will the people believe it?

ROGER WILLIAMS.

WHILE the land rings with the pean of the Fourth of July it is right to remember the earlier men who helped by the foundation upon which the goodly structure stands. Among these probably the least understood is Roger Williams, the founder of Rhode Island. He asserted in the Puritan colony of Massachusetts Bay the doctrine that the civil magistrate has no rightful control in religious faith, and Massachusetts tumbled his out, neck and heels, for daring to say it. Old Cotton Mather said that he had "a winded-shot in head;" and the old New England Hubbard declared that he had "a fly-blown imagination!" But neither Mather nor Hubbard can be later than the city upon Roger Williams. The Plymouth settlers in the cabin of the Mayflower had founded a free commonwealth, and remained for many years an actual democracy, or direct government by the people. But Roger Williams made the first great statement of the law of our cardinal Revolutionary principles in saying "Kings and magistrates must be considered as instituted with no more power than the people betrust them with." He was any thing but a visionary. No statesman has ever more precisely understood the limits of civil and religious duty than he. Yet he claimed toleration of opinion rather than absolute freedom of thought, and was almost as furious with George Fox as with the Boston Council.

The grave of Williams was lately opened in Providence, and the words of an applauding town found to have struck directly through his dust. His grave is upon the brow of the hill that overhangs the city upon the east. A committee of some sixteen well-known Rhode Islanders has been appointed at a late meeting to procure the erection of a monument to this most illustrious man. Could they do better than encrave upon it the words of Williams in a letter to the town of Providence, in which, under the figure of a ship's company, he sets forth so admirably the true doctrine of men in states?

BLONDIN.

M. BLONDIN, a slender Frenchman, is walking in sacks, and blindfolded, and rolling wheel-barrow amidst fire-works, and standing on his head, and hanging by his feet, all upon a tight-rope suspended over the chasm below Niagara Falls. There is a very general public conviction that there must be a point where a man can not walk, either on land or on a tight-rope—as, for instance, when he has both feet tied around his neck. But M. Blondin has not yet reached the point. He is still approaching it. Possibly he will yet cross holding himself in his right hand.

It is the conviction that when he reaches that point he will inevitably tumble into the gulf below and be drowned, which holds many people in the condition of the gentleman who solemnly and persistently traveled from town to town with the menagerie in which the heroic Smith put his head into the lion's mouth. Some day he will snap it off, reasoned the gentleman. If it inevitably, said he; and he packed his trunk, and finally saw it snapped off. So it is only a question of time with many, how soon they will read in the morning paper a telegram from Niagara: "Blondin fell from the rope this afternoon into the river. His body has not yet been recovered."

M. Blondin's philosophy is probably this: "I can walk any rope any where with a perfectly steady head. Walking across the Niagara chasm is illustrious walking. It pays. In the course of the summer I can cross twenty times. I can make at least two hundred dollars every time. Monsieur l'Yankee, can I make money more easily in any other way?" And he has. He has made in a single year's money in a few hours, than drudge all the year obscure."

So he airily takes the risk and the walk, and puts up his little pile. It is a pursuit involving danger, but it is perhaps as reputable as a great many safe pursuits which are not half so picturesque. There is no swindle; nothing unfair. Every thing is upon the line. Let Mr. Smith, therefore, "still be trusted, of course." But if he should make a million of dollars by it, I have no doubt his fortune would have an honest a foundation as a good many others.

HUMMING.

IT is amusing to observe the respect paid to a moral sense which is supposed to be somewhere in the community, although those who appeal to it are not much in the habit of consulting it in their own conduct. Public opinion is the most powerful of all existing influences. It is this respect which leads newspapers which first make a scandal, presently to denounce it in the name of virtuously indignant public. The moral health of the public being the particular care of the newspapers—the newspapers are constantly on the look-out for every tendency or a depraved taste in the public mind—in its proper condition of delicacy and purity—and the public from imputations which they have cast upon it.

Who, for instance, would ever think of holding the women of America responsible for the absurdities of an occasional sentimental boarding-school Miss? Or would any one imagine that the publication of notes to Mr. Tommy, of the Japanese persuasion, by some enthusiastic, or even designing ladies, implicated any of the sex in the vice? It is hypocrisy, for a moment, that the delight of the same Mr. Tommy in the performance of a pretty actress here or there could be construed into a charge, throughout the public itself. Public morality doesn't take cold upon such a slight exposure as that.

But while the public morality is thus very well, thank you, for all little Mr. Tommy's frowns or fancies, the public common sense does seem to have been left out of the account, known several things. It knows, for instance, that many reporters and editors, who delight in the ballet, who delights in prurient, and gloats over luscious details. It knows that such reporters and editors are very commonly not the writers of the articles that supposed taste short of offending that Abstract and Severe Public Moral Sense which requires the verbal knife to cut clean. It knows, and swiftest in their denunciations of the offenses which they print in one column and "pitch into" in another—that the writers of the one are the best method in which the reporter presents the news. That Public Common Sense, also, often sees that the public morality is not at all times at a virtue is not so much profound sympathy with outraged decency as a sly wink at a purely private hobby. If a newspaper has proved itself to be a moral power, the appeal to public morality is effective. But otherwise, it is a—a—a—a—a—Humming, whose price is well known, alluding to his honesty. Public Common Sense is painfully aware that there is a thing known as Humming.

In a certain year of this present century it befell that the sunny month of June overtook the Lounger in the city of Boston, where, having just been duly celebrated in the famous square of St. Peter's, and he beheld with all the world. The spectacle was splendid: it was the thing: the pride of the Yankee above: the colonnade: the pile of the Vatican and the massive front of St. Peter's around; and the living mass of the sides of the square overflowing fountains playing in the sun. The procession came on through the thing piled in gorgeous robes, with banners, music, and clouds of incense; and at last, with Rabella borne beside, and white-robed magnificence, they approached the altar, and the Pope kneeling in sight of the world and for the world, the Pope of Rome passed by. The people fell upon their knees; the cannon roared; the Lounger fell upon to their eyes. "Amico," whispered a friend, "what a lesson of humility for the world, the father of the faithful, the Supreme Maximus, prostrate upon his knees!" Then the train swept by, the singing priests, the perfume, the Pope upon his knees.

—Only he was not upon his knees. The festival occurs in last winter. Who ever would pay him a Pope actually kneel? So they made a comfortable frame, and by a skilful arrangement of something resembling drapery, they kneeling. The Pope could sit at ease and seem to be kneeling.

AT COURT.

"PRAY, cousin, where have you been?
I've been to London to see the Queen:
Pussy cat, pussy cat, what saw you there?
I saw a fine lady upon a white mare."

THE London Telegraph has been trying to ascertain who has the right to be presented to the Queen, or upon what the right rests, as it can hardly rank with one of the self-evident rights of which the Declaration of Independence speaks, but which are not formally acknowledged over the sea. It says:

"In common with hundreds of other English institutions presentation at Court have hitherto been governed by no written code of regulations, but by custom, which is something like precedent, or the license of the bar, or the unwritten law of the land. Persons may call it what they will, how far its powers and attributes extend, or where its limits are actually fixed. There are certain old families whose descendants claim the queerest of privileges in the Presence Chamber. The representatives of one ancient race assert the liberty of entering the royal presence with their hats on. Another patrician family have a right to the first dish from the Queen's table; another to the goblet from which the members of the royal household drink to the health of the reigning sovereign. Though we do not place entire credence in the legend, that the personal holder of an old baronetcy, who had fallen somehow, under the cold shade of the peasantcy, became threatened with the privilege of presenting his son his sinister by Henry V. for his bravery during a war with France, and of coming to Court without any pantaloons on, the founder of the family having, in the heat of haste, done valiant service to the crown without those necessary garments in the battle of Agincourt. There is a popular notion also among the subalterns of the army and navy, that when a soldier or her Majesty's service has a right to go to Court; but it would be troublesome, we are afraid, if one of her majesty's subjects were to appear in a marching regiment, and every lieutenant in a man-of-war, who would get leave from his corps or his ship, were to present himself at the levee at St. James's or Buckingham Palace.

Theoretically "trades-people" are not to be admitted to the august presence. But if a tailor becomes Lord Mayor, or a shoemaker, alderman, or lieutenant of a county?—or a baker carries up an address? It is profoundly perplexing, because all these have a right to be presented. Because the bourne, it appears, was condemned because he introduced Robert Owen; and no reader of the late memoirs of Sydney Smith can doubt that his lady was related by name as having been presented through "windowmen." This, again, is profoundly perplexing. Because the "windowmen" was understood to mean that the lady was an "improper character." That is, a lady of foreign, whose entree is unquestioned, a "proper" character? Or is it only female impropriety which can limit the atmosphere of the Drawing-room?

But the climax of perplexity, in the mind of the Telegraph, is who shall be introduced from the United States? Perhaps it is very short cut to the solution of this difficulty, however it may be with the others.

It is an established comity that all who are admitted to "the presence" at home may properly be introduced at all friendly courts, provided he will conform to the etiquette of the place. No matter upon going in his drawers, or in a black coat, if the local etiquette prescribes something else. If that etiquette requires a sword, a sword, or him properly apply to have it waved; and if his regimental trappings are not the court dress, and he does not care to appear in the costume, or is ordered by his government not to do so, then let him stay away. We believe, however, that by this rule any body who can go to a President's levee may claim, upon due local conformity, to be presented to the Queen. To any person who has no objection; for there is no question of receiving the envoy, and he is very likely to have been a tradesman. Jefferson Davis, Lincoln was a printer, and made a very tolerable embassador to the most exclusive and sumptuous court in Europe.

If the Lounger were consulted upon rule, then all of no Americans must be admitted. If it depend upon character, and Lord Cardigan and Company so conspicuously virtuous?

The truth is, that the theory of "a court" did not pervade the spirit of the republic like ours. And it is foolish to speak of "the error fallen into by Mr. Dallas" in presenting any of his countrymen who have not received a title—a reward, we have seen, and who conformed to the local etiquette.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE FUTURE OF THE FASHIONS.

THERE was a time when girls were born hoops of steel, and with grow and expand, whereas now they are born debauched their cheeks with rouge: white-lead, or steel, Adding to the world-known phrase of "born tired."

Whereof by contrast to enhance the grace,
Spread of court-plaster should be a female face.

That fashion passed away, and then were worn
Dresses which scarcely reached below the knee,
With waists girt round the shoulder-blades, and Scots
Grave spiced in the bosom for fancy.
When here and there some antiquated dame
Wore yards of silk, in the old manner,

Short waists departed: Taste a while prevailed;
Till ugly Folly's reign returned once more,
And ladies' limbs were again strapped-lashed.

And now they wear hoops also, as before,
Small, prudish, and not more than a cubit,
They'd wear as well, if France but spoke the word.

Young bucks and beauties, ye who now deride
The wearers of hoops, their fancy,
When Time your forms shall have puffed out or dried,
Ye will wear hoops, and think them the right thing.
And say what dowdies, frights, and guys you were,
With little waists and limbs like pipe-stems.

Perhaps, if you live till you are lean or fat,
You'll believe this verse, and be pleased with age,
Which you in full-length mirrors now admire.

CLERK OF THE WEATHER OFFICE.—Notice is hereby given that the Lightning Conductor, which is now being taken up for repairs, there will be no Summer or Autumn this year. The arrangements made on the understanding that the Seasons would go on as usual, brings of course a great deal of confusion. Persons intending to marry and the like, are null and void. The Winter quarters begin on the 1st of July, and terminate some time next year. (Signed) PRIMUM ATOLLO.

JACK THE GIANT-KILLER REDIVIVUS.—To think of finding the old fellow alive and well in fair case in the midst of the Neapolitan Police-tatterers in that island have for some time, it seems, been toiling the "cap of darkness." Garibaldi has now come down upon them with the "sword of sharpness," and the shirt of Bombaltes have found the "shoes of swiftness" to run away with.

A MAN having bought a sheep's head, had been to a friend for a direction to dress it. As he was returning, repeating the method, and holding the parchase under his arm, a dog seized and ran away with it. "Now, my dear boy," said the man, "what a fool you make of yourself! The dog will do it to you, so you don't know how it is to be dressed!"

LEAP YEAR.

Come, let us serve our bashful hearts,
And speak out each timid desire,
And raise our drooping hopes, and smooth
Our wrinkled features out;
And write thereon in letters plain,
That those may read who can—
"Proposals thankfully received
By eighteen sixty-one."

A quaint old gentleman, in a quiet drawing, and a theatrical allotments of men, by which some become useful citizens and others workhouse inmates, by way of illustration remarked, "So one sick of bachelors a useful door-keeper, while another becomes a long-term prisoner."

A cockney sportsman gave a high figure for a well-bred pointer, but the poor cockney did not know what pointers were. So he went to the dealer's and bought a setter, lifting a leg as usual, and standing motionless, our cockney friend declared he had got a wrinkle, and took him up in his arms and carried him home.

When Sir Humphrey Davy was in Sicily, he was struck by the geology, the fine and classical ruins, and the grazing about the rocks astonished the Calabrian peasants, who seriously believed that they told their fortunes. He charged from the mainiac, but Davy had seen the priest before him, and was nervous quietly intimated to the peasants that it was a foreign gentleman from a far-off land, who was perfectly harmless! Davy was then regarded by the Calabrians as a saint.

After Pope had written some little verses on Lady M. W. Montagu, he told a friend of his that he should soon have ample revenge upon her, for that he had set her verses in both a high and a low key, and would soon publish which he had written. "Be so good as to tell the little gentleman," they that I am not at all offended at the use of him; for if he acts me down in black and white, as he calls it, I can assuredly I will have him cut down in black and blue."

The late Mr. Murrell, whose death recently figured in the Dublin papers, had been known from England more than a quarter of a century. In the early part of his life, when starting for the bar, he had their good sense as quainted with an actress of exceeding beauty, named Mary, and determined that she would soon publish what

GARIBALDI IN SICILY.

We publish herewith two more illustrations of the events in Sicily. One of them represents the encampment of Garibaldi previous to the attack upon Palermo. It does not resemble the well-provided and regular camps of the French and Austrian armies in Italy, or those of the contending powers in the Crimea; there is a want of order, a want of tents, a want of every thing but ardor and patriotism. It reminds one of Garibaldi's speech to his followers. "If you are ready to march thirty miles a day regularly without stopping, except to fire at the enemy—to sleep any where, often without a meal—to start again before your night's rest is half over, march thirty fresh miles, and to fight bravely without stopping to rest—then follow me, and we shall be victorious."

The other picture will convey some idea of the scenes in the streets of Palermo before and at the entry of Garibaldi. Correspondents tell us that the streets were full of boys and young men, who, crazy with delight at the prospect of liberty, ran about the streets shouting Viva Garibaldi! Viva Vittore Emanuele! Viva Italia! without the least regard to the feelings of the Neapolitan troops, or the least concern for their own safety. Hundreds and thousands of these poor creatures were slaughtered in the bombardment; but the day of reckoning is now not very far distant.

The correspondent of the London Times thus describes the excitement prevailing at Palermo:

"Any one in search of violent emotions can not do better than set off at once for Palermo. However blasé he may be, or however milk-and-water his blood, I p ouise it will be stirred up. He will be carried away by the tide of popular feeling, or else the impetuosity and variation of this torrent will produce in him a sensation such as he rarely felt.

"The popular proverb has it that no day resembles its predecessor; here almost every hour changes the state of affairs, and with the state of affairs the feelings of 200,000 people change from one extreme to another almost without the slightest transition. One moment all is triumph and hope, and the next all is terror and dejection. One instant the town resounds with cheers, the next you see numbers prostrated before the shrines of Madonnas and saints which are to be found in almost every corner. Now and then, between the two fits, there is a short lull—a kind of exhaustion—which is soon followed by another attack of hope or fear.

* * * *

"In the afternoon Garibaldi made a tour of inspection round the town. I was there, but find it really impossible to give you even a faint idea of the manner in which he was received every where. It was one of those triumphs which seem to be almost too much for a man. The most wonderful thing I ever saw in this way was the reception of Napoleon and Victor Emanuel at Milan, just about a year ago; and I am almost inclined to think that the one yesterday was more extraordinary. The entry of the Sovereigns was something more formal, which prevented the full expression of popular enthusiasm. They were on horseback, and surrounded by their guards; while the popular idol, Garibaldi, in his red flannel shirt, with a loose colored handkerchief round his neck, and his worn wide-awake, was walking on foot among those cheering, laughing, crying, mad thousands: and all his few followers could do was to prevent him from being bodily carried off the ground. The people threw themselves forward to kiss his hands, or, at least, to touch the hem of his garment, as if it contained the panacea for all their past and perhaps coming sufferings. Children were brought up, and mothers asked on their knees for his blessing; and all this while the object of this idolatry was as calm and smiling as when in the deadliest fire, taking up the children and kissing them, trying to quiet the crowd, stopping at every moment to hear a long complaint of houses burned and property sacked by the retreating soldiers, giving good advice, comforting, and promising that all damages should be paid for."

Of the horrors of the bombardment the same writer says:

"One might write volumes of horrors on the Vandalism already committed, for every one of the hundred ruins has its sad story of brutality and inhumanity.

* * * * *

"All about the neighborhood of the Albergeria the air is charged with the exhalations of the corpses imperfectly covered by the ruins, and with that greasy smell occasioned by the burning of an animal body. If you can stand the exhalation, try and go inside the ruins, for it is only there that you will see what the thing means. You will not have to search long before you stumble over the charred remains of a human body—a leg sticking out here, an arm there, a black face staring at you a little farther on."

VIII.

BEFORE I had reached the turning which led out of the square, my attention was suddenly by the sound of a closing door in the row of houses behind me. I looked round and saw an undersized man in black on the door-step of the house, which, as well as I could judge, stood next to Mrs. Catherick's place of abode, on the side nearest to me. The man advanced rapidly toward the turning at which I had stopped. I recognized him as the lawyer's clerk who had preceded me in my visit to Blackwater Park, and who had tried to pick a quarrel with me when I asked him if I could see the house.

I waited where I was to ascertain whether his object was to come to close quarters and speak on this occasion. To my surprise, he passed on rapidly without saying a word, without even looking up in my face as he went by. This was such a complete inversion of the course of proceeding which I had every reason to expect on his part, that my curiosity, or rather my suspicion, was aroused, and I determined, on my side, to keep him cautiously in view, and to discover what the business might be on which he was now employed. Without caring whether he saw me or not, I walked after him. He never once looked back, and he led me straight through the square to the railway station.

The train was on the point of starting, and two or three passengers who were late were clustering round the small opening through which the tickets were issued. I joined them, and distinctly heard the lawyer's clerk demand a ticket for the Blackwater station. I satisfied myself that he had actually left by the train before I came away.

There was only one interpretation that I could place on what I had just seen and heard. I had unquestionably observed the man leaving a house which closely adjoined Mrs. Catherick's residence. He had been probably placed there, by Sir Percival's directions, as a lodger, in anticipation of my inquiries leading me, sooner or later, to communicate with Mrs. Catherick. He had, doubtless, seen me go in and come out; and he had hurried away by the first train to make his report at Blackwater Park—to which place Sir Percival would naturally betake himself (knowing what he evidently knew of my movements), in order to be ready on the spot if I returned to Hampshire. I saw this clearly; and I felt for the first time that the apprehensions which Marian had expressed to me respecting might be realized. Before many days were over there seemed every likelihood now that Sir Percival and I might meet.

Whatever result events might be destined to produce, I resolved to pursue my own course straight to the end in view, without stopping or turning aside for Sir Percival or for any one. The great responsibility which weighed on me heavily in London—the responsibility of so guiding my slightest actions as to prevent them from leading accidentally to the discovery of Laura's place of refuge—was removed, now that I was in Hampshire. I could go and come as I pleased at Welmingham; and if I should fail in observing any necessary precautions, the immediate results, at least, would affect no one but myself.

When I left the station the winter evening was beginning to close in. There was little hope of continuing my inquiries after dark to any useful purpose in a neighborhood that was strange to me. Accordingly, I made my way to the nearest hotel and ordered my dinner and my bed. This done, I wrote to Marian, to tell her that I was safe and well, and that I had fair prospects of success. I had directed her, on leaving home, to address the first letter she wrote to me (the letter I expected to receive the next morning) to "The Post-office, Welmingham," and I now begged her to send her second day's letter to the same address. I could easily receive it by writing to the postmaster if I happened to be away from the town when it arrived.

The coffee-room of the hotel, as it grew late in the evening, became a perfect solitude. I was left to reflect on what I had accomplished that afternoon as uninterruptedly as if the house had been my own. Before retiring to rest I had attentively thought over my extraordinary interview with Mrs. Catherick, from beginning to end; and had verified, at my leisure, the conclusions which I had hastily drawn in the earlier part of the day.

The variety of Old Welmingham church was the startling point from which my mind slowly reached its way back through all that I had heard Mrs. Catherick say, and through all that I had seen Mrs. Catherick do. At the time when the neighborhood of the town was first referred to in my presence by Mrs. Clements, I had thought it the strangest and most unaccountable of all places for Sir Percival to select for a clandestine meeting with the clerk's wife. Influenced by this impression, and by no other, I had mentioned "the vestry of the church," before Mrs. Catherick, on pure speculation—it represented one of the minor peculiarities of the story, which occurred to me while I was speaking. I was prepared for her answering me confusedly or angrily, but the blank terror that seized her when I said the words took me completely by surprise. I had long before associated Sir Percival's Secret with the concealment of a serious crime, which the Catherick knew of—but I had gone no farther than this. Now, the woman's panoramic of terror connected the crime, either directly or indirectly, with the vestry, and convinced me that she had been more than the mere witness of it—she was also the accomplice, beyond a doubt.

What had been the nature of the crime? Surely there was a connection between it and a well as a dangerous side—or Mrs. Catherick would not have repeated my own words, referring to Sir Percival's rank and station in such marked disdain as she had certainly displayed. It was a contemptible crime, then, and a dangerous crime, and the vestry was the spot in which it was associated with the vestry of the church.

The next question to be disposed of led me a step farther from this point.

Mrs. Catherick's undisguised contempt for Sir Percival's position and title was like murder as well. She had referred, with the bitterest sarcasm, to the great family he had descended from —"especially the eldest son." What did that this mean? There appeared to be only two explanations of it. Either his mother's birth had been base, or his own reputation was damaged by some hidden flaw with which Mrs. Catherick and Sir Percival were both privately acquainted. I was inclined, at first, to favor the supposition to the test by looking at the register of her marriage, and so ascertaining her maiden name and her station in society previous to further inquiries. On the other hand, if the second one proved to be the true one, what had been the flaw in her reputation? However, being the account which Marian had given me of Sir Percival's character, and of the part the suspiciously unsocial, secluded life they had both led, I now asked myself whether it might not be possible that the flaw might have been committed at all. Here again the register might, by offering written evidence of the marriage, prove true, at any rate, that there had been no concealment in truth. But where was the register to be found? At this point I took up the conclusions which I had previously established on the same mental process which had discovered the locality of the concealed crime now lodged the register also in the vestry of Old Welmingham church.

These were the results of my interview with Mrs. Catherick—these were the various considerations, all steadily converging to one point, which decided the course of my proceedings on the next day.

The morning was cloudy and lowering, but no rain fell. I left my bag at the hotel, to wait there till I called for it; and after inquiring, in the best way, set forth on foot for Old Welmingham church.

It was a wide, quiet scene more than two miles, the ground rising slowly all the way. On the highest point stood the church—an ancient, weather-beaten building, with heavy buttresses at its sides, and a clumsy square tower in front. The vestry, at the back, was built out from the church, and seemed to be part of the same age.—Round the building, at intervals, appeared the remains of the village which Mrs. Clements had described to me as her husband's place of abode in former years, and which the principal inhabitants had long since deserted for the new town. Some of the empty houses had been dismantled to their outer walls; some had been left to decay with time; and some were still inhabited by persons evidently of the poorest class. It was a dreary scene; and yet, in the worst aspect of the ruin, not so dreary as the modern town that I had just left. From there who was the brown, breezy sweep of surrounding fields for the eye to repose on; here the trees, leafless as they were, still varied the monotony of the prospect, and helped the mind to look forward to summer time and shade.

As I moved away from the back of the church and passed some of the dismantled cottages in search of a person of whom I could make my first clerk, I saw two men saunter out after me, from behind a wall. The tallest of the two—a stout muscular man, in the dress of a gamekeeper—was a stranger to me. The other was one of the men who had followed me in London on the day when I left Mr. Kyrle's office. I had taken particular notice of him at the time, and I felt sure that I was not mistaken in identifying the fellow on this occasion. Neither he nor his companion attempted to speak to me, and both kept themselves at a respectful distance; but the motive of their presence in the neighborhood of the church was plainly apparent. It was exactly as I had supposed—Sir Percival was already prepared for me. My visit to Mrs. Catherick had been reported to him the evening before, and those two men at my heels had been placed on the look-out near the church in anticipation of my appearance at Old Welmingham. If I had wanted any further proof that my investigations had taken the right direction at last, the plan now adopted for watching me would have supplied it.

I walked on, away from the church, till I reached some of the deserted houses, with a patch of kitchen garden attached to it, on which a laborer was at work. He directed me to the clerk's abode—a cottage at some little distance off, standing by itself on the outskirts of the forsaken village. The clerk was in-doors, and was just putting on his great-coat. He was a cheerful, familiar, loudly-talkative old man, with a very poor opinion of (as I soon discovered) of the place in which he lived, and a happy sense of superiority to his neighbors in virtue of the great personal distinction of having once been in London.

"It's well you came so early, Sir," said the old man, after I had mentioned the object of my visit. "I should have been away in ten minutes more. Parish business, Sir, and a good, oh long time before I'm all done, for a man at my age. But, bless you, I'm strong on my legs still! As long as a man don't give at his legs, there's a deal of work left in him. Don't you think so yourself, Sir?"

He took his leave whim while he was talking from a hook behind the fire-place, and locked his cottage door behind us.

"Nobody at home to keep house for me," said the clerk, with a cheerful sense of perfect freedom from all family encumbrances. "My wife's in the churn-yard there; and my children are all married. A wretched place this, isn't it, Sir? But the parish is a large one—every man has enough to do through the business as I do. It's learning does it; and I've had my share, and a little more. I can talk the Queen's English, Sir, as well as the Queen's—and that's more than most of the people about here can do. You're from London, I suppose, Sir? I've been in London myself, in a fine-and-twenty years ago. What's the news there now, if you please?"

Chattering on in this way he led me back to the vestry. I was about to see if the two spies were still in sight. They were not visible by me when, on having discovered my application to the clerk they had probably concerted themselves where they could watch my next proceedings with the greatest freedom.

The vestry door was of stout old oak, studded with nails; and the clerk put his heavy key in the lock with the air of a man who knew that he had a difficulty to encounter, and who was not quite certain of creditably conquering it.

"I'm afraid you'll find you this way, Sir," he said, "because the door from the vestry to the church is bolted on the vestry side. We might have got in through the church otherwise. This is a perverse lock, if ever there was one yet. It's big enough for a prison door; it's been hampered over and over again; and it ought to be changed for a new one. I've mentioned that to the churchwardens at times over at least: he's always saying 'I'll see about it'—and he never does see. Ah, it's a sort of lost corner, this place. Not like London—is it, Sir? Bless you, we are all asleep here! We don't march with the times."

After some twisting and turning of the key the heavy lock yielded, and he opened the door.

The vestry was larger than I should have supposed it to be, judging from the outside only. It was a dim, mouldy, melancholy old room, with a rafftered ceiling.—Round two sides of it, the sides nearest to the interior of the church, ran heavy wooden presses, worm-eaten and gaping with age. Hooked to the inner corner of one of these presses hung several surplices, all bulging out from their lower ends in an irreverent-looking bundle of limp folds, and wanting nothing but a pair of boots to suggest the idea of a cluster of neglected parsons who had committed suicide by companionably hanging themselves all together. Below the surplices, on the floor, stood three packing-cases, with the lids half off, and on, part of their contents profusely bursting out of their cracks and crevices in every direction. Behind them, in a corner, was a litter of dusty papers; some large and rolled up like architects' plans; some loosely strung together on files, like bills or letters. The room had once been lighted by a small side window; but this had been bricked up, and a lantern skylight was now substituted for it. The atmosphere of the place was heavy and mouldy; being rendered additionally oppressive by the closing of the door which led into the church. This door was composed of solid oak, and was bolted at top and bottom on the vestry side.

"We might be tidier, mightn't we, Sir?" said the cheerful clerk. "But when you're in a lost corner of a place like this, what are you to do? Why, look here now—just look at these packing-cases. There they've been for a year or more ready to go to London—there they are, littering up the place, and there they'll stop as long as the nails hold them together. I'll tell you what, Sir, as I said before, this is not London—we are all asleep here. Bless you, we don't march with the times!"

"What is there in the packing-cases?" I asked.

"Bits of old wood carvings from the pulpit, and panels from the chancel, and timber from the organ-loft," said the clerk. "Portraits of the twelve apostles in wood—and not a whole nose among 'em. All broken, and worm-eaten, and crumbling to dust at the edges—as brittle as crockery, Sir, and as old as the church, if not older."

"And why were they going to London? To be repaired?"

"That's it, Sir. To be repaired; and where they were past repair, to be copied in sound wood. That, bless you, the money pid for—and there they are, wasting for new subscriptions, and nobody to subscribe. It was all done a year ago, Sir. Six gentlemen dined together about it at the hotel in the new town. They made speeches, and passed resolutions, and put their names down, and printed off thousands of prospectuses. Beautiful prospectuses, Sir, all flourished over with Gothic devices in red, ink, saying it was a disgrace not to restore the church and repair the famous carvings, and so on. There are the prospectuses that couldn't be distributed, and the architect's plans and estimates, and the whole correspondence which set every body at loggerheads and ended in a dispute, all down together in that corner behind the packing-cases. The money dribbled in a little at first—but what can you expect out of London? There was just enough, you know, to pack the broken carvings, and get the estimates, and pay the printer's bill, and after that there wasn't a halfpenny left. There the things are, as I said before. We have nowhere else to put them—nobody in the new town cares about accommodating us—we're in a lost corner—and this is an untidy vestry—and who's to help it?—that's what I want to know."

My anxiety to examine the register did not dispose me to offer much encouragement to the old man's talkativeness. I agreed with him that nobody could help the untidiness of the vestry—and then suggested that we should proceed to our business without more delay.

"Ay, ay, the marriage register, to be sure," said the clerk, taking a little bunch of keys from his pocket. "How far do you want to look back, Sir?"

Marian had informed me of Sir Percival's age at the time when we had spoken together of his marriage engagement with Laura. She had then described him as being forty-five years old. Calculating back from this, and making due allowance for the time that had passed since I had gained my information, I found that he must have been born in eighteen hundred and four, and that I should safely start on my search through the register from that date.

I want to begin with the year eighteen hundred and four." I said.

"Which way after that, Sir?" asked the clerk. "Forward to our time, or backward away from us?"

"Backward from eighteen hundred and four."

He opened the door of one of the presses—the press from the side of which the surplices were hanging—and produced a large volume bound in greasy brown leather. I was struck by the insecurity of the place in which the register was kept. The door of the press was warped and cracked with age, and the lock was of the smallest and simplest kind. I could have forced it easily with the walking-stick I carried in my hand.

"I have considered a sufficiently secure place for the register?" I inquired. "Surely a book of such importance as this ought to be protected by a better lock, and kept carefully in a fireproof safe?"

"Well, now, that's curious!" said the clerk, shutting up the book again just after he had opened it, and smacking his hand cheerfully on the cover. "Those were the very words my old master was always saying, years and years ago, when I was a lad. 'Why isn't the register' (meaning this register here) 'put away by handsome in a safe and in an iron safe?' If I've heard him say that once, I've heard him say it a hundred times. He was the strictest gentleman, days, Sir, who had the appointment of vestry clerk to this church. A fine hearty old gentleman, and in some particulars quite learned. As long as he lived he kept a copy of this book in his office at Knowlesbury, and had it posted up regularly, from time to time, to correspond with the fresh entries here. You would hardly think it, but he had his own appointed days, once or twice in every quarter, for going down to this church on his old white pony to check the copy, by the register, with his own eyes and hands. How do I know? Why, he used to say, 'how do I know that the register in this vestry is kept in just the same way as the copy in my own there. Which year did you say, Sir? Eighteen hundred and what?"

"Eighteen hundred and four," I replied; mentally resolving to give the old man no more opportunities of talking until my examination of the register was over.

The clerk put on his spectacles and turned over the leaves of the register, carefully writing his finger on a thumb at every fifth entry. "There it is, Sir," he said, with another cheerful smack on the open volume. "There's the year you want."

As I was ignorant of the month in which Sir Percival was born, I began my inspection with the early part of the year. The register-book was of the old-fashioned kind; the entries being all set down on blank pages, in columns, and the divisions which separated them being indicated by ink lines drawn across the page at the close of each entry.

I reached the beginning of the year eighteen hundred and four without encountering the marriage; and then traveled back through December, eighteen hundred and three; through November and October; through——No! not through September also. Under the fifteenth of that month in the year I found the marriage!

I looked carefully at the entry. It was of the hottest on a page, and was, therefore, uncommon, compressed into a smaller space than that occupied by the surrounding entries. The marriage immediately before it was impressed on my attention by the circumstance of the bridegroom's surname being the same as my own. The entry immediately following it (on the top of the next page) was noticeable, in another way, from the large space it occupied on the record, in this case, registering the marriages of two brothers at the same time. The register of the marriage of Sir Felix Clyde was in no respect remarkable, except for the narrowness of the space into which it was compressed at the bottom of the page. The information about his wife was the usual information given in such cases. She was described as "Cecilia Jane, sister, of J. K. Wyvern, Esq., Knowlesbury; only daughter of the late Patrick Elster, Esq., formerly of Bath."

I noted down these particulars in my pocket-book, feeling, as I did so, both doubtful and disheartened about my next proceeding. The Secret, which I had believed, until this moment, to be within my grasp, seemed now further from my reach than ever. What suggestions of a mystery unexplained had arisen out of my visit to the vestry? I saw no suggestions any where. What progress had I made toward discovering the suspected stain on the reputation of Sir Percival's mother? The one fact I had unearthed hindered rather than facilitated research. Fresh doubts, fresh difficulties, fresh delays, began to open before me in interminable prospect. What was I to do next? The one immediate resource left to me appeared to be this: I might institute inquiries about Miss Eleanor Fairlie, and bury," on the chance of advancing toward the main object of my investigation, by first discovering the secret of Mrs. Catherick's contempt for Sir Percival's mother.

"Have you found what you wanted, Sir?" said the clerk, as I closed the register-book.

"Yes," I replied; "but I have some inquiries still to make. I suppose the clergyman who officiates here in the year eighteen hundred and three is no longer alive?"

"No, no, Sir; he was dead three or four years before I came here—and that was as long ago as the year twenty-seven. I got this place, Sir," persisted my talkative old friend, "through the clerk that was before me, Sir. They say he was driven out of house and home by his wife—and she's living still, down in the new town at Knowlesbury, and pockets the fees. They're all Liberals in that town, Sir, and I've been a Tory myself; all I know is, I got the place. Mr. Wansborough got it for me—the son of my old master that I was telling you about. He's a Tory, and a gentleman as ever lived; rides to the hounds, keeps his pointers, and all that. He's a many-clerk here now, as his father was before him."

"Did you not mention just now that the former master died at Knowlesbury?" I asked, calling to mind the long story about the precious gentleman of the old school with which my talkative friend had favored me before he opened the register-book.

"Yes, to be sure, Sir," replied the clerk. "Old Mr. Wansborough, the father of Mr. Wansborough and young Mr. Wansborough lives there too."

"You said just now he was vestry-clerk, like his father before him. I am not quite sure that I know what a vestry-clerk is."

"Don't you indeed, Sir?—and you come from London, too! Why, a vestry-clerk, you know, has a vestry-clerk and a parish-clerk. The parish-clerk is a man like me (except that I've got a deal more learning than most of them, though I don't boast of it). The vestry-clerk is a sort of an appointment that the lawyers get; and if there's any business to be done with the vestry, why there they are to do it. It's just the same in London. Every parish church there has got its vestry-clerk—though you may take my word for it, he's sure to be a lawyer."

"Then young Mr. Wansborough is a lawyer, I suppose?"

"Of course he is, Sir! A lawyer in High Street, Knowlesbury—the old office that his father had before him. The number of times I've swept those offices out, and seen the old gentleman come trotting up to the door on his white pony, looking right and left all down the street, and nodding to every body! Bless you, he was a popular character!—he'd have done in London!"

"How far is Knowlesbury from here, pray?"

"A long stretch, Sir," said the clerk, with that exaggerated idea of distances and that self-importance of information in getting from place to place which is peculiar to all countrypeople. "Nigh on four miles, Sir, by road."

I let this roll away in the forenoon. There was plenty of time for a walk to Knowlesbury and back again to Welmingham, where there was a person probably in the town who was fitter to assist my inquiries about the character and relations of Sir Percival's mother than the parish-clerk, than the local solicitor. Resolving to go at once to Knowlesbury on foot, I led the way out of the vestry.

"Thank you kindly, Sir," said the clerk, as I slipped my fifth present into his hand. "Are you really going to walk all the way to Knowlesbury and back? Well! you're strong on your legs, too—and what a blessing that is, isn't it? Here's the road, Sir, all the way; and I hope you was going your way—it's pleasant to meet with gentlemen from London in a lost corner like this! Good day, Sir, and thank you. Wish you good-morning, Sir! and thank you kindly, once more."

We parted. As I left the church the clerk looked back, and there were the two men again, on the road below, with a third in their company—that third person being a tall woman in black whom I had traced to the railway the evening before.

The three stood taking together for a little while—then separated. The man in black went away by himself toward Welmingham; the other two remained together, evidently waiting to follow me as soon as I walked on.

I proceeded on my way, without letting the slightest sign of my discovery be visible to me. They caused me no conscious irritation of feeling at that moment; on the contrary, they rather revived my spirits. There was the surprise of discovering the evidence of the marriage I had forgotten the inference I had drawn at first proceeding from it, and the misgivings of the vestry. Their reappearance reminded me that Sir Percival had anticipated my visit to Welmingham church, and the next result of my interview with Mrs. Catherick—otherwise he would never have ordered his spies thus to watch for me. Smoothly and fairly as appearances looked in the vestry, there was something wrong beneath them—something that required to be register-book, for aught I knew, that I had not discovered yet.

"I shall come back," I thought to myself, as I turned for a farewell look at the tower of the old church. "I shall trouble the cheerful clerk a second time, and examine the perverse book, and to open the vestry door."

THE RACER "NICHOLAS."

WE publish on page 428, from a drawing by Mr. T. C. Carpendale, a portrait of the famous race-horse "Nicholas," who won the 4-mile race on Friday. Nicholas has been so long before the public, and has won so many races, that he is well known to all lovers of sport. He is a bay horse, aged, and though, in the language of the turf, he classes as "aged," will probably win many a race yet. Having been beaten by Thormanby, a week previous, in the 2d-mile dash, the odds were rather against him before the 4-mile race began: but he vindicated his ancient fame. The following account of the race we take from the daily press:

FOUR-mile post stake.

John Hunter entered ch. h. Nicholas.....2 1 1
T. Morris entered gr. h. Throgneck.....1 2 2
Time, 8.18—7.54—8.07.

FIRST HEAT.—Throgneck was the favorite at $100 to $75, odds which were eagerly taken by the admirers of the once great four-miler, Nicholas, for they remembered his glorious victories in previous years over the track. Nicholas had the inside, and allowed Throgneck to take the lead. The latter made the running all the way round, and passed the stand on the first mile in 2.05. The second mile was done in the same time, and the third in 2.03. The horses still in the same position. In going along the far side the last time round they improved to a slapping pace, and got to the favorite's girths. In coming up the straight run in, Throgneck shook Nicholas off, and the latter answering severely to the spur, the former won by half a dozen lengths. Time, 8.05.

SECOND HEAT.—The odds were offered against Nicholas, and some offers of $100 to $10 on the gray horse were made to no eagerly. Throgneck again took the lead, and on the first mile led by a length; time, 1.59. The second mile was done in 1.58, the gray still leading. On the third round Nicholas was, but could not quite reach him, and on passing the stand on the first mile had to be satisfied with second place. In this position they ran to the Mansion House, when Nicholas made his effort, and passed his opponent, leaving the last lead at every stride, and won the heat by six lengths, in 7.54.

THIRD HEAT.—The last heat caused another change in the betting market, and Nicholas was backed to win at $100 to $75. It was admitted that he had not his fellow, and walked off rather lame; but this did not alarm the confidence of his friends. They got off well from the standing heat, the gray going on with the lead, and taking the inside on passing the quarter pole. The first mile was done in 2.00, the second in 2.0. On the third mile Nicholas laid at Throgneck's quarters to the Mansion House, when he collared and passed him, leading two clear lengths on the third mile when passing the judges' stand. In the course of the gray's career he has never evidently extinguished, as Nicholas went on with the lead, and won the heat and race by twenty lengths, in 8.05.

Nicholas is by "Glencoe," out of "Nanny Rhodes," by "Waggoner, and is at the present moment perhaps the best four-mile horse in the country.

MR. THORPE'S "NIAGARA."

ON Wednesday evening, June 20, Col. Thorpe's picture of "Niagara" was exhibited, and we give an engraving on page 428[1] was fitted up in the lower dining-hall of the Metropolitan Hotel, the Japanese Embassy having kindly granted a desire to witness it. Our readers should perhaps be informed that, with the invitation to view the picture, Mr. Warren Leland sent a circular of the books descriptive of the Falls, and illustrated by numerous engravings. To Tommy especially was intrusted the distribution of these circulars.

The painting was lit up at eight o'clock, and after it was announced that it was ready for exhibition the Hindoo Club orders commenced dropping in. First came eight or ten of the subordinates, who examined the picture a while, made their comments on it, and then departed, to be succeeded by other groups. Finally, Mr. Warren Leland came in with the Japanese Governor, the imperial interpreter, and two or three superior officers. The imperial interpreter, Nimoura Gohojiro, who was distinguished among the Japanese quietly bald, was imperial interpreter taking his place at the right side, and in the rear of the first Prince. Nimoura Gohojiro then proceeded to describe the picture in detail, and was listened to with the most quiet interest. The first Prince desired to call attention to the artist, and desired from him a description of the details. The Prince inquired about the height of the Falls, and the depth of the Lake Michigan. The quantity of water that came over them, if the water ran all the year round, the height of the Falls, and the depth of the water below the Falls. This latter query was several times repeated. He then asked if the ship they were to go home in was named after the Falls. Finally, the Prince desired to know if the picture was for sale? Upon being informed it was not, he asked if a copy could be made (which was answered in the negative). He then expressed a desire for a copy exactly like the one before him, which he said he intended to take, "as a great curiosity," to Japan. After some further conversation between the officials regarding the picture the three Princes made a more critical examination through their opera-glasses, pointed out particular parts, and, smiling their satisfaction, left the room. The rest of the Japanese attendants quietly retiring out of the way. We understand that the copy of the picture will be completed in a few days, and will be sent forwarded to Japan, care of our Consul-General, Townsend Harris.

THE "GREAT EASTERN" AND HER CAPTAIN.

WE publish on pages 424 and 425 a splendid engraving of the steamship Great Eastern entering the Bay of New York, on the afternoon of June 28. The great ship itself has been so fully illustrated in the pages of the Weekly that we need do no more at present than refer the public to our back numbers for pictures.

We may repeat here, briefly, that the Great Eastern is the largest ship in the world, being 25,000 tons burden, and 680 feet long. She is a side-wheel steamer, with two oscillating engines of 1000 nominal horse-power, and a screw of 1600 indicated horse-power, and four 60-inch cylinders; and a ship with six masts, spreading 6240 square yards of canvas. She is built wholly of iron. Ten thousand tons of iron, 2,000,000 plates and 300,000 rivets, were employed in the construction of her hull. Her masts (with the exception of the mizzen, which is a mast) are 60 feet high, and their rigging of iron wire. She can carry 10,000 soldiers, or 6000 passengers. Her crew is 400 men.

Her new commander is Captain John Vine Hall, whose portrait we publish on page 429.

Most of Captain Hall's life has been spent in the service of the East India and China Steam Service Steamship Company; he commanded successively their ships the Cruzus and the Golden Fleece. His conduct in the latter vessel, when she was a ship of 2700 tons, which, upon arrival at Sydney, was found to be frightfully leaky, many of the plates having started, gained him the appointment to Steamship of the late Mr. Brunel. There was no deck into which he could put his ship, and with great perseverance he succeeded in forming a basin, by driving two rows of piles around the vessel, filling up the space between them, then pumping out the water, and by this means he was enabled to repair and bring home the ship with a most valuable cargo. When the Crimea, and the troops and stores for the Crimea, was destroyed by fire off Genoa, his conduct received the highest approbation from the Government, and at the head of the Guards, with troops for India, he made the quickest voyage on record between England and Calcutta.

Of late years Captain Vine Hall has been superintendent of the Company's affairs at the Southampton and afterward at London. He is a man of great learning and science: a Fellow of the Royal Astronomical Society; and the first officer in the merchant service to take a theodolite observations in the steam examination under the "Mercantile Marine Act." Captain Hall is a brother of the Rev. Newman Hall, one of the Congregational of London, whose church on Blackfriar's Road, formerly belonging to the late Rev. Rowland Hill, is crowded to suffocation every Sunday.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

ON Monday, June 25, in the Senate, Senator Sumner presented a memorial of citizens of Massachusetts, praying for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law, the abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia, and the prohibition of the inter-State Slave-trade. At his request it was laid on the table. Mr. Pugh introduced a bill to lay and levy an additional duty on the exports of tobacco, and to provide for the collection thereof. It was read and referred. The House bill to amend the Consular act was reported from the Committee on Commerce, but laid over. Various other measures were proposed, but they were laid over. A message was received from the House, and stated the Senate that they receded from their amendments to the Post-office appropriation bill, and asked a conference. The customary committee was appointed to act in conference with those of the House. Mr. Bigler moved that Congress was ready to adjourn; and after a vote of thanks to Mr. Mason, President pro tem. of the previous session, the Senate was declared adjourned.—In the House, another message was received from the President against the proceedings of the Cowde Investigating Committee. The message was referred, and after a few executive communications, and its consideration was postponed until the next session. The House refused to concur in the Senate's amendments to the Post-route Bill, and it was referred to a Committee of Conference. Numerous business, and the usual preliminary ceremonies, the House adjourned sine die.

EXTRA SESSION OF THE SENATE.

At noon on 26th the Senate met in extraordinary session in compliance with a proclamation of the President. A large number of appointments were sent in, and were confirmed. Mr. Green, Senator elect from Missouri, Vermonts were ratified.

On 27th the treaty with Spain was rejected, and the Mexican treaty was postponed till December next. Mr. W. T. Russell was confirmed as Minister to Austria, and Mr. York, and Colonel Wright as Superintendent of the Indian Affairs.

On 28th Lieutenant-Colonel Joseph E. Johnston was confirmed as Quartermaster-General of the Army, and Mr. Churchill as Minister to Guatemala. The Senate then adjourned sine die.

HOW THE SPANISH TREATY WAS REJECTED.

A motion was made in the executive session of the Senate on Thursday, to have the treaty made by the United States and Spain, for the settlement of claims, the claim to pay for the Cuba ransom, &c., laid upon the table. Upon it, it is understood, was made by Mr. Sumner, but disposed of by the Senate in the question of adjourning, by four voted in the affirmative and eighteen in the negative—Messrs. Bigler and Pugh.

SENATOR FITZPATRICK DECLINES.

A special dispatch to the Philadelphia Press, dated Montgomery, June 25, says: "Senator Fitzpatrick has written on to-day by a Committee, which officially informed him of his nomination. Mr. Fitzpatrick has had his letter of acceptance would be prepared in a day or two. It is known, however, from Senator Fitzpatrick's reply to a question whether he would accept or not, he replied that he acted until to-morrow morning. The Committee said they wanted an immediate answer, as they had to report to the Convention at once. Fitzpatrick replied that, if he must answer now, he would be forced to decline. He will accept at once declining."

The Southern delegates to the Baltimore National Convention met at Charleston, and organized a permanent body, which has been called the Southern Democratic Convention. It has recommended the name of Governor Herschel V. Johnson, of Georgia, for the National Convention, for the next term, and which was empowered by the Convention to fill any vacancies. This recommendation was adopted by a number of delegates, who, at a meeting this evening, unanimously nominated Governor Johnson, in place of Senator Fitzpatrick.

THE PRESIDENT FOR BRECKINRIDGE AND LANE.

The National Democratic Committee, favoring the nomination of Breckinridge and Lane, held a meeting at the residence of Secretary Cobb, paid a visit to the President on the 27th. Colonel Wright, one of the Committee, in behalf of the Committee, expressed that they had called before parting to tender their respects to the President, and to express their gratitude, and of regard for his character and public services. The President made a brief and appropriate reply, thanking them for the honor of the visit, and declaring the entire approval of the principles which had been proclaimed and the nominations which has been made by the National Democratic Convention. He wished them God speed, and entire success in the efforts they were then called upon to make on returning to their respective homes. The whole interview was of a most cordial character. The President and Cabinet freely interchanging courtesies with the members of the committee, each of whom separately subsequently shook with the President's hearty concurrence in their action.

THE RECKENRIDGE AND LANE COMMITTEE.

The Breckenridge and Lane National Democratic Committee is composed of the following members:

John J. Stevens, of Oregon; George W. Hughes, of Maryland; John W. Stephenson, of Kentucky; Wm. Winn, Jas. G. Barrett, Walter Lenox, and Gen. W. Biggs, of Washington, D.C.; Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi; Thomas F. Bayard, of Pennsylvania; J. R. Thompson, of New Jersey; Augustus Schell, of New York; A. B. Meek, of Alabama; J. D. Leigh, of Indiana; Thomas Johnson, of Arkansas.

THE ARRIVAL OF THE "GREAT EASTERN."

The Great Eastern arrived at this port on 28th, reaching the light-ship at 7.30 A.M. There she anchored; at 9 P.M., slip-keeper, she crossed the bar, and proceeded up the city, arriving at her dock at 6 P.M. The event created the greatest excitement throughout the day, and business was generally neglected, and thousands of people thronged the wharves and roofs to obtain a glance at the vessel.

THE VOYAGE.

She left the Needles at ten A.M. on the 17th. With the exception of a very severe storm she experienced last night, she passed the entire passage, ranging from 254 to 315 miles per twenty-four hours. The engines were not stopped until she was off George's Shoal, for soundings. She came in a most splendid, direct to the lightship, where she was boarded by the ship news collector and Mr. John Scott Russell, the great Englishman, who is a business partner of Admiral Murphy, who went out to Southampton for the trip. He drew twenty-seven feet of water, but was trimmed to an even-keel before crossing the bar. The following is the number of miles made per day:

Date	Miles
June 17, ...	129
18, ...	276
19, ...	276
20, ...	282
21, ...	280
22, ...	315
23, ...	254
24, ...	289
25, ...	315
26, ...	313
27, ...	317

The highest speed obtained was fourteen and a half knots. The ship's bottom is very foul, and an allowance of at least two knots an hour should be made on account. The distance from Southampton is 3190 miles, but to avoid the ice she went 3340 miles.

CROSSING THE BAR.

A person is now on board these describes the delicate operation of crossing the bar:

"The order is finally given by Mr. Murphy, under whose command she is, and who has now stepped, to 'Go on.' The engineer waves his hand, the officer below repeats the order to the next forward, and the steam is put on at that great wheels commence their revolutions. The stupendous fabric moves slowly; a mighty power vibrates in her, and moving slowly on its way, unconscious, is it were, a triumphant sense of power and the city. Whistles and cries of danger is opened. The pilot is on board. Speed is increased to eight miles an hour. Mr. Murphy himself sits silently gives his orders. A simple elevation or depression of the hand indicates to the helmsman the course they are to pursue, and the ship under this skillful guidance steers with the ease and almost the readiness of a well boat, proceeds on her way.

THE HALL AT THE BAY.

"Passing Fort Lafayette, a salute was fired, which was promptly acknowledged to from the fort and from the Great Eastern, and from this time onward, until her arrival in North River, it was one continual salute from the distinguished stranger. Cannon boomed, steam whistles shrieked, solid answered solid, heavy, deep cannon in powerful welcome, people hurralled, handkerchiefs waved, and flag-staff yachts dashed along in her wake or shadow under a cloud of canvas, as if bowing in acknowledgment of her superior being to every other craft, and demonstrations of a kindly nature came from every quarter. All the way up the city, as far as the docks were in New York and all its suburbs were thronged with people. The docks were all black with the crowds, and the wharves, shipping, and every other foothold commanding a view of the scene, presented the same animated appearance.

"As we neared the city the interest, if possible, increased. Hundreds of little craft shot out into the stream and fell in with the escort of the Great Eastern, coming from her fore-top—an elevation almost equal to that of the tallest ordinary mast—the several flags of Mary soverelgn. Below was the beautiful outline of the largest steamer in the world, gliding so majestically and serenely through the water that her motion was hardly perceptible, while behind, as far the eye could see, was a fleet commencing with a few fast steamers at the stern—spread out the second in the shape of an immense fan—the rear of which was quivering with beautiful life.

"When about off the Battery the citizens of Trinity Church were heard across the water, playing 'Rule Britannia.' Many others were free from all the usual forms, but not excepting, of course, the Canadians at Jersey City, which, as the procession advanced, did extra honors.

MOORED AT LAST.

"Before landing the Great Eastern proceeded up the North River as far as Forty-fifth Street; but the current was hardly perceptible. Here, after some difficulty, she was turned round, and with down stream for the first time contrary to general expectation, she was at once moored.

"The moment that this was done there arose the highest credit upon Mr. Murphy, the pilot; and the reader can imagine the darting of the understanding as being informed that the immense ship was carried alongside by him, to the most astonishment of every one individual on board, including the officers, with as much ease, apparently, as he would handle his own yacht, and governed alone by her own impetus, and without the aid of a single tug-boat from a starting point, where the turn was made to touch the dock in a gentle way, clipping off only a trifling comparatively, so she appeared, and when all hawsers were got out, the passengers' luggage was inspected and landed, which by the way will be done by a company deputed for their respective destinations, and the Great Eastern entirely settled herself for a two months' rest."

HER PASSENGERS.

Forty-three passengers were all that could be found in the year 1859 for the "venture" on the first and only most splendid ship on the ocean. Here are their names:

General Wilkins; Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton; Major F. Balfour; Captain Drummond; Captain Cormorge, R.N.; Captain Hewlett, R.N.; Captain Gamble, R.N.; Captain Morris, R.N.; Captain H. Corryton, R.N.; Mr. and Mrs. D. Gwynn; Dr. J. S. Cockerell; Mr. S. Cockerell; Mr. George Wilkes; Mr. N. A. Woods; Mr. F. B. M'Kenzie; Mr. and Mrs. Archbishop; Miss M. A. Herbert; Mr. Alfred W. Barber; Mr. C. F. Field; Mr. R. Morson; Mr. George Hawkins; Mr. J. Simpson; Mr. F. B. Hamilton; Mr. T. C. Bostley; Mr. W. S. Taylor; Mr. G. D. Brooks; Mr. Thomas Brassey; Mr. H. Brassey; Hon. Percy Herbert; Mason; Mr. H. M. Wells; Mr. W. Cave; Mr. M. Jourdan; Mr. J. Barnwell; Professor P. Bennett; Mr. D. Kennedy; Mr. G. E. M. Taylor; Mr. Zerah Colburn; Mr. S. Russell; Mr. John B. Heaton; Mr. Hall; Mr. Murphy; Mr. Thomas Reid.

THE PUBLIC EXHIBITION.

The Great Eastern is undergoing the necessary renovation, painting, deck-covering, spar-scraping, brass-scouring, and whatever else is preparatory to the reception of visitors. On Tuesday, the 3d day of July, she was thrown open to the public; one dollar is the price of admission for adults—children under twelve years fifty cents. Thousands of citizens have visited the neighborhood daily to view the outside of the monster ship.

DOUBLE MURDER IN NEW YORK.

On Saturday night, just before twelve o'clock, two persons were assassinated in the Eighteenth Ward, under circumstances which render the case a most singular one that has transpired since the murder of Dr. Harvey Burdell. They were unknown to each other, and both were gentlemen of some prominence in the business community; one, Mr. John Wilkes, having been engaged for some years in conducting the Continental Saloon, and the other, Mr. John W. Mathews, being a railroad contractor by profession. The perpetrator of the double murder eluded arrest, and, in fact, is not certainly known, although the proceedings at the inquest which was held on Sunday upon the bodies of the murdered men tend strongly to implicate the two sons-in-law of Mr. Wilkes, named Charles and Edward Jolliet, for whom warrants of arrest have been issued. The double tragedy of Mr. Wilkes with the mother of the respected parties, has led an acrimonious feeling to the existing difficulties between himself on one side, and his wife and her sons on the other, and Mr. Wilkes has instituted a suit for divorce, in which he was plaintiff. Since the commencement of the proceedings in the Special Term in the Supreme Court, Mr. Wilkes's life, it is said, had been threatened repeatedly by his wife and her sons, and until at last he was afraid to venture in the streets without a companion. He resided with his wife and family in the Eighteenth street, near Third Avenue, accompanied by his cousin, he was shot dead, as related, and Mathews had the wound but a few hours. It was in attempting to overtake the flying assassin that Mr. Wilkes, in the prime of his life, the fugitive having turned upon him, and fired with an iron as also Mathews, the murderer scarcely knelved afterward.

THE JAPANESE.

The Japanese Princes, with their interpreter, censor, and attendants, visited the Astor Library on Thursday, and were received by Superintendent Cogswell, assisted by Chairman, Mr. Griggs, welcomed them in an appropriate address. They spoke in their native tongue, and there were—some in their own language—with which the library is stored. On leaving they were presented with three superbly-bound volumes, containing the catalogues of the library, as far as it is printed. They expressed themselves highly delighted with their visit. The Embassy also received the freedom of the Institution of the Ethnological Society, and several visits from various public bodies and distinguished citizens, and on Saturday they embarked on board the Niagara, and sailed for Japan.

CONFESSION OF HARDEN.

Governor Olden, of New Jersey, has received the execution of Jacob S. Harden for one week and a day, beginning to Friday the 6th inst.

It is stated that Harden is even now writing his confession, and that he has already completed a large portion of it to the jailer and one or two others.

The astonishment of Harden at his wife recommenced on her return to Beaufort, and it was given to her while sitting on his knee, every indication of recognition of apparently loving wife. He kindly invited her to partake of the food on his plate, but she declined. She unsuspectingly ate it, remarking that it appeared to have something gritty on it. Dr. Peyton said it was "nothing."

There are statements said to have been made by the prisoner involving his criminality with others who shared his affections.

His purchasing the arsenic at Easton, and his using that widely-known fact to throw suspicion upon his children's own words. What is most astonishing is the statement that the perpetrator of the horrible deed of which he does not seem to have had the slightest compunctions. He did think enough of his own thinking that he was doing any thing very dreadful.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

LORD PALMERSTON ON THE BOMBARDMENT OF PALERMO.

LORD PALMERSTON'S letter, which is as follows in the House of Commons: "We understand that the government of Naples has refused to receive the British fleet which, we may be expected to arrive here in a few days, for the purpose of making friendly visits to this city by governor of France and England. No doubt that, in our communications with the Neapolitan government, with these feelings which her Majesty's Government, in common with every body of Englishmen, entertain with regard to the barbarities which have been practiced in Naples (Hear, hear.) In the meantime, we have thought not ago and its vivification that these things should have ceased. Considering, however, the state of Naples, we must say that any such representation, in the way of friendly remonstrance, as the British government could make, would have any very beneficial effect in the future conduct of the government of Naples. I can not venture to lead the House to entertain any very sanguine expectations of that kind. (Hear, hear.) At the same time, I am afraid, that that which happened after the sacking in a manner of every house in the city of Palermo, and it is more likely, I am afraid, that the naval and military power who exhibited such barbarities in Palermo may receive, instead of reprimand or punishment, promotion and reward. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) (Hear, hear.) With regard to the last question, we know that the Neapolitan government has given the strictest orders to its foreign allies to guarantee the integrity of the Two Sicilies, and to discountenance any attempt which might be made to interfere in the affairs of Naples. (Cheers.) We have reason to believe that the French government has given a similar answer to that of Austria. (Cheers.) I need not say what the feelings of her Majesty's government are upon the subject, but, upon a matter of that kind. (Cries of 'Hear, hear.') I am afraid that the communications between those of Rome and Naples that when, by the crucities and the misconduct of the government of Naples, the provinces have been driven to desperation and have revolted, that they appeal to all Europe for sympathy and support, to remove the authors of those revolutions. Those governments forget that the Neapolitan people are not the original authors of the revolt—(cheers)—and of all those revolutionary proceedings which, if they had been carried or granted, to accomplish it in first and necessary step would be that of dethroning the King." (Loud and long cheers.)

REAR-ADMIRAL MUNDY'S REPORT.

The following papers, relating to the affairs of Sicily, have been presented to Parliament:

REAR-ADMIRAL MUNDY TO THE SECRETARY OF THE ADMIRALTY.

"Her Majesty's ship Hannibal, Palermo, June 2, 1860.

"From various sources I derive the following account of the extraordinary events which have taken place in consequence of the city. The scene is reported as most horrible, the whole district of the Quattro Canti, Piazza Bologni, Porta de son hundred wide, is in ashes, families have been burned alive with the houses, and the streets are strewn with the royal troops have been frightful. In other parts, contrary to expectation, the insurgents have been overpowered by the shells, 1100 of whom were thrown into the city from the citadel and ships, and the Strada Toledo and the bastions, and the streets are strewn with the dead. The Neapolitan troops have been driven to the Marina, and they repose Crown will interpose to prevent further bloodshed. The Neapolitan troops, I understand, both during the hostilities and since their suspension, have been noble and generous foes. The Garibaldians have been ordered to evacuate Trapani and Termini, and it is reported they are to receive the garrisons of those places.

SALE OF LORD BYRON'S HOME.

On Wednesday, 13th ultimo, the Ancient Abbey and domain of Newstead, in the County of Nottingham, indissolubly associated in the public mind with the early life of Lord Byron, whose patrimony they constituted, were put up for sale. The largest offer was £100,000; the property, however, was bought in at the reserved bidding of £160,000.

BADEN.

THE ROYAL CONFERENCE.

The Royal Conference at Baden has attracted considerable attention. The Emperor Napoleon left Compiègne there on the 14th inst., and the Emperor Napoleon on the following day.

The Nord refers to the interview between the Emperor Napoleon and the Prince Regent of Prussia: "The interview . . . . . between the Emperor Napoleon and the Regent of Prussia, which our correspondent at Berlin first announced, and an announcement which has been since confirmed by our correspondent at Paris, will certainly take place this week. It is even probable that other German sovereigns will meet at the same time at Baden-Baden, and will then form a congress of Princes, of which the first and most important result will be a general reconciliation, and the adoption of a line of future sterile agitations which have recently troubled Germany. It is a correspondent of the Indépendance says, the initiative in this reunion was taken by the Emperor of Austria. His object was to endeavor to restore to harmony and to Europe a pacific and a very important servant. The Emperor of Austria is not remembering a recent cause, and without any definite object, but one which threatened to lead to serious collision between two great neighboring and friendly nations."

The Conference opened on the 15th, and its results are said to be eminently satisfactory. Both the French and the English papers declare that the peace of Europe is now consolidated and insured.

ITALY.

THE LATEST FROM SICILY.

At latest dates Garibaldi was actively engaged in organizing his reserve forces, and it was expected that he would not make any new movement before next week.

A late despatch from Palermo, dated 11th inst., says that the inhabitants of the Royal troops are determined that the town is still barricaded.

The extradition convention question had seized two ships conveying volunteers and arms to Sicily still each confirmation.

Garibaldi being triumphant, Count Cavour now requests the Liberals to remain quiet, and not to disturb Sicily, the pulse followed in reference to Tuscany, Parma, Modena, and the Romagna. This request has only been confidentially made to the Progressists.

It is this diplomatic intrigue which has caused the France will not in any way interfere in the affairs of Sicily. It is the opinion of Napoleon that the principle of non-intervention in Italy, as contained in the celebrated note of Count Walewski, is definitely accepted by the French Government.

The capture of Capua, with 600 prisoners, by the Neapolitan frigate Partenope, is likely to cause the Government to adopt a severe line of action. Garibaldian Minister has demanded their restitution and the release of the officers and had proposed to exchange. In this demand the Sardinian Minister is supported by the English Minister, and it is said the required steamer is stated to have displayed American colors.

THE PROPOSALS OF ROMBA.

Prince Piombino has addressed a letter to Count Walewski, received by courier an autograph letter from his Sovereign, on the subject of Italian unity:

To call to his Council men enjoying public confidence.

To reconstitute a government for guaranteeing the faithful and conscientious execution of the laws, as well as the suppression of abuses.

To re-establish the national guard.

His Majesty hopes that, in consideration of these guarantees, Europe will not any longer refuse to interfere in his favor against the revolution.

THE ARMISTICE.

The following is the text of the recent proclamation issued by Garibaldi:

"Brethren, the enemy has proposed to us an armistice, which, in a generous war, such as that in which we fight, I thought it my duty not to refuse. . . . . At the dying of the dead, the care of the wounded—in a word, every thing that is the duty of a civilized people, has always honored the valor of the Italian soldier. Morover, the Italian soldier has set an example of valor, although they are acting with cruel hostility, and are at present struggling with a desperate energy, but I will not be long before the light of the national flag will shine upon the whole of Sicily. I am happy to say that the terms of the stipulated convention may be strictly maintained in every respect. Here, we publish the following:

ARTICLES OF CONVENTION BETWEEN THE GENERALISSIMO OF THE ARMY OF ITALY, AND THE FERDINANDEAN ARMY.

"1. The suspension of hostilities will be prolonged during three days, to commence from Saturday, May 26, to the termination of which his Excellency the Generalissimo will make known his intentions, which will be established by mutual agreement the hour for the resumption of hostilities.

2. The Royal Bank shall be placed in the care of the representative Consuls of the Court of Sicily, under their discharge; the detachment now in possession to proceed to Castellamare, and there to embark.

3. The embarkation of the wounded and of families will continue, under the superintendence of the Consuls above whatever.

4. The transport of provisions shall be free to both parties at all hours of the day, the suitable dispositions shall be taken to that effect without delay.

5. It will be agreed to exchange the prisoners Monte Rotondo, Milazzo, Francavilla, Colonna, and Spinazzola for others, Captain Grossi.

For the Provisional Government of Sicily, FERDINANDO PIETRI. Generals-in-Chief.

GARIBALDI'S FIRST DECREE.

The official Journal of the Provisional Government of Sicily publishes the following decree:

STALE AND VICTOR ENACTED.

Joseph Garibaldi, Commander-in-Chief of the national forces in Sicily, in virtue of the powers conferred on him, decrees:

Art. 1. A Committee of Defence is instituted, which will have authority to direct, in the name of Italy, all the construction of regular barricades throughout the city, and for the defence of the bastions. The commander of the brave men that have come from other Italian provinces to help us.

Art. 2. The barricades constructed will be formed at the distance of two hundred paces from each other, and in their construction the paving-stones will be used, the gutter, thanks, and the earth of the road to be placed under the direction of intelligent persons accustomed to such labors.

The articles required for the movable barricades will be procured at once by requisition, and the proprietors shall receive an indemnity for the loss of their carts, sacks, etc.

Art. 3. The committee will keep as large a supply as possible of sacks, which it will have filled with earth without delay.

Art. 4. The barricades are to be defended by the most courageous persons, who will be stationed in the streets where they are raised.

Art. 5. The doors and windows of the houses must be left open day and night, for affording shelter to the persons whom they are destined, and for other purposes maintaining the defence.

Art. 6. The committee will also organize a central corps de garde, which, if possible, will establish itself near the residence of the Dictator, and a secondary corps de garde, which, by means of small patrols, will keep up communication with the central corps, and whose duty it will be to send a party every half hour to inquire into the state of the defence, and report the condition of every house in order to give the necessary assistance to the persons who may be in need of it.

Art. 7. The committee will also organize a central depôt of ground arms, in order to be able, if required, to furnish reinforcements to the points most threatened.

Art. 8. It will be the duty of the committee to watch, and especially of the so-called "revolutionary powder," if

REWARDS TO THE BRAVE.

ITALY AND VICTOR ENACTED.

Joseph Garibaldi, Commander-in-Chief of the National Forces in Sicily, in virtue of the powers conferred on him, decrees:

Art. 1. Out of the funds of the communal estates to be divided, in conformity with the law, among the citizens of the commune, every one, without drawing lots, shall have a allotment who shall have fought for the country. In case of the soldier's death, this privilege shall pass to his heir.

Art. 2. This allotment shall be equal to that which shall be sent apart by drawing lots for every head of family. Nevertheless, if the lands of a commune are greater than the population wants, the soldiers or their heirs shall obtain a share twice as great as the other persons shall.

Art. 3. If the communes have no land of their own, they shall be indemnified by the Treasury, according to the terms of the law.

Art. 4. The Secretary of State is charged with the execution of the present decree.

HORRORS OF THE NEAPOLITAN PRISONERS.

An Englishman writes to a London Journal: "On the morning of the 29th of February, 1860, during the forenoon, and the only Englishman present, when the cell was made known to me by the Governor. The facts were these:

"About forty of the shirri had been captured by the revolutionists, treated by them with kindness, and placed in security until the time should be ripe to release. Careful precaution to prevent their being murdered by the indignant mob, who had seen their bodies into the palace, and cost the books and furniture from the windows. A portion of the number were placed in the Vicaria, prison, to be inaccessible. Windows and loop-holes there were in it, but no opening to admit an entire view of the premises, hence.

Presently, on removing one of the huge book-cases, some fresh-plastered wall appeared concealed behind it. A passage was made, and the bodies found to be strewn were almost overpowered by the steaming effluvia which issued from the place. Some were discovered sitting with each other, where, upon clearing the loop-holes, a service of sense of horror was before us—some of the best testimony to be believed. There lay human bodies, and the bodies of the shirri were found in all stages of death and decay; hordes of rotting rags, mingled with bones, and the whole filled up with the foul and noisome stench; some being riveted to the walls above, whence some of them had fallen in the act of death, and become mingled in their fron grasp the arms or ankles of their fellow-victims. Skeletons and bodies, or even joint-ends, others which were quite so, and placed six stone skeleton, which was a soldier, black and pulpy, were hidden beneath others more decomposed. Here was the body of a soldier, another horror still, two human bodies, intermingled with the rocking, blood-stained bones of the shirri, and before we were permitted to the contents of the chest of others which had been so suspended, and still retained the appearance of human bodies from the effects of which the interior portions had dropped, and lay in heaps beneath.

"Shreds of clothing and horror arose from the infernal crowd, a portion of which were found in the pieces of cloth which were found. Some were accused, brought them to the prison, and the bodies were found in the interior, which, on being examined, were found among the bones and bodies, examining minutely the contents of the pockets, and the bodies of which have been their fellows, brothers, or kindred, who had long been dead, and whose bodies they knew.

"One of the shirri, whose life I tried in vain to save, was recognized by his wife, who was immediately after, but were not credited while alive, but nailed there to augment the torments of the living prisoners."

OPINIONS OF THE FOREIGN PRESS.

It is amusing to compare the various epithets applied to Garibaldi by the foreign journals. We take the following as specimens:

Gazetta di Napoli.—"The monster in human shape, Garibaldi by name, the chief of the band of attack, at the head of a band of murderers, the dominions of his majesty the King of the Two Sicilies. Against all this measures are taken by the government of the Two Sicilies, which will punish the criminal and the latest undertaking."

Gazetta di Roma.—"The Antichrist—for it is impossible to give a person possessed of the devil any other appellation—has landed at Marsala with a band of thieves, and effected a landing with the assistance of the goddess and of Protestant England."

Munich Volksblatt.—"The bandit Garibaldi is about to enslave the most liberal people of Italy, the most murderer in the happy and peaceful island of Sicily; but the curses vengeance of God will fall upon the guilty."

Vienna Gazette.—"The professional rebel hopes to continue his former calling in Sicily; but he will be pursued everywhere by the curses of mankind, and finally frustrated, by the courage and loyalty of the brave troops of the King of the Two Sicilies."

Leipziger Zeitung.—"The pirate Garibaldi is, of course, sailing for Sicily, with the flag of Piedmont."

Leipziger Zeitung.—"The adventurer Garibaldi will soon find out that he has undertaken a task to an unlucky end."

Basel Zeitung.—"The parvenu Garibaldi, not content with having kindled the flames of revolution in his own country, is now about to visit the same evil upon the in his hitherto happy kingdom of Naples."

Hamburg Nachrichten.—"Garibaldi is steadily advancing in his bold and dangerous career."

Gazetta di Augsburg.—"The heroic son of Italy, whose name no true Italian can pronounce without the most profound admiration and enthusiasm, is now engaged in the most important campaign of his glorious life."

Florence Gazette.—"The redeemer of Italy is about to attack the enemies of his country, and every Italian heart beats with hope for the success of his sublime undertaking."

Giornale di Milano.—"The genius of Italy has at last found a leader in the person of the hero destined to rescue his country from the last remnant of tyranny."

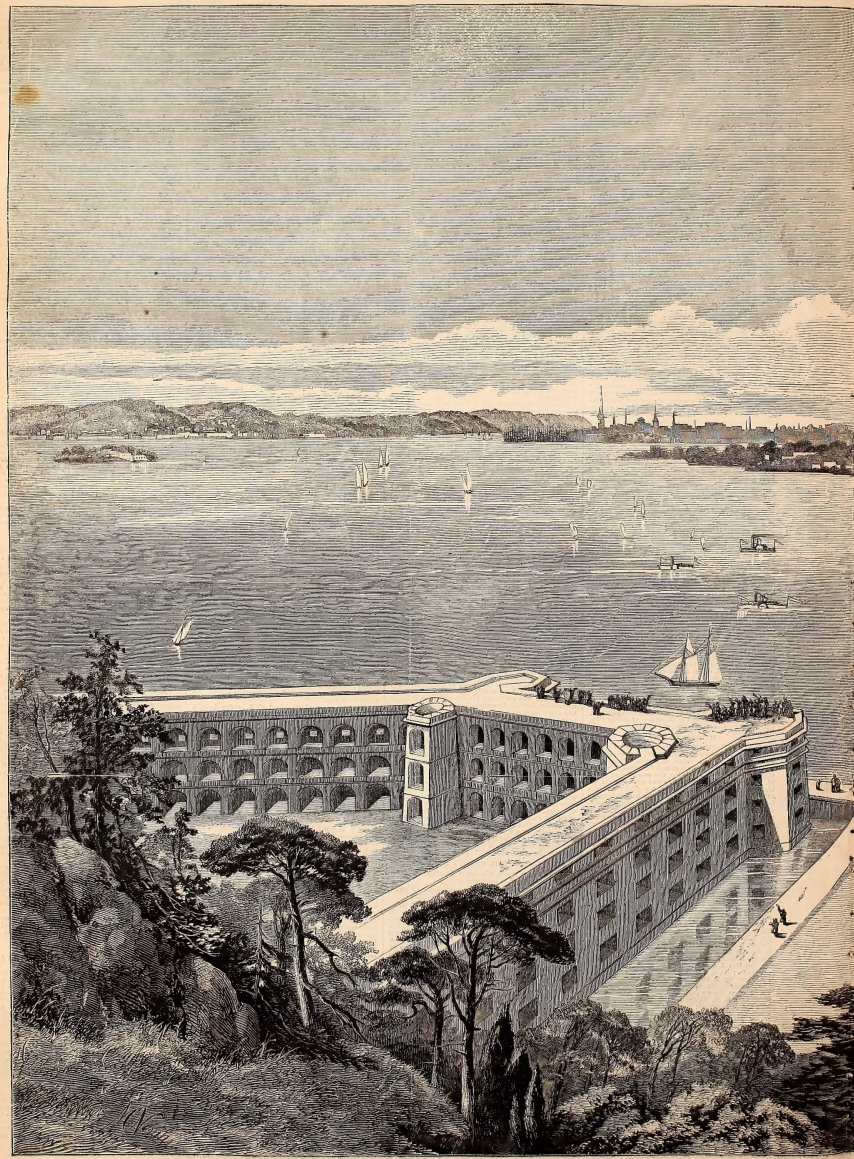
Turin Gazette.—"The Italian people have appealed in human shape on earth, in the person of Garibaldi, to sustain the holy cause of Italy, and Victor Emanuel offers to the cowlgn punishment they deserve."

Gazette di Genoa.—"The expedition of the renowned citizen of the King's troops in Sicily has signed a capitulation with the Neapolitan General Lanza at Palermo."

THE IRISH IN THE PAPAL ARMY.

The Wanderer, of Vienna, publishes a letter from Ancona, dated the 6th ultimo, which says:

"The Irish regiment has had a fight among themselves, and wounded some of the officers. Those interfered to separate them. One delegate has hitherto treated the Irish like prisoners of war, but yesterday one, in consequence, was ordered. Every soldier insists on having his own room, to which he is entitled by law; but, after all, the Papal Government will be under the necessity of requesting the Irish to go once again."



TURKEY.

THE SULTAN SNUBBED AGAIN.

Sir Henry Bulwer has firmly pointed out to the Porte the necessity of suppressing abuses, and said, that upon such repression would depend the support of England. The Sultan has previously received these representations, and has sent his portrait to the ambassador.

ANOTHER RELIGIOUS WAR.

The civil war in Turkey, up to last accounts, still continued. Thirty-six villages of Mount Lebanon are stated to have been destroyed, and 3000 persons, have been the victims. The Turkish authorities have not interfered, and the soldiers of the Porte have joined with those Christians had joined the Druses and participated in the massacre.

VANITAS VANITATUM.

BY W. M. THACKERAY.

How spake of old the Royal Seer?
(His text is one I love to treat on)
This life of ours, he said, is sheer Mataiotes Mataiotaon.

Oh, Student of the gilded Book,
Declare, while musing on its pages,
If truer words were ever spoke
By ancient or by modern sages?

The various authors' names but note,*
French, Spanish, English, Russian, Germans;
And in the volume polyglot
Sure you may read a hundred sermons!

What histories of life are here,
Mose wild than all romancers' stories;
What weird transformations queer,
What homilies on human glories!

What theme for sorrow or for scorn!
What chronicle of Fortune's doings—
Of Fate disastrous nobly borne,
Of crimes, changes, rises, ruins!

Of thrones upset, and sceptres broke,
How strange a record here is written!
Of honors, dealt as if in joke;
Of brave desert unkindly smitten!

How low men were, and how they rise!
How high they were, and how they tumble!
Oh, Vanity of vanities!
Oh, laughable, pathetic jumble!

Here, between honest Janin's joke
And his Turk Excellency's firman,
I write my opinion the book:
I write my name—and end my sermon.

Oh, Vanity of vanities!
How vain the decrees of Fate are;
How very weak the very wise,
How very small the very great are!

What mean these stale moralities,
Sir Preacher, from your desk you mumble?
Why rail against the great and wise,
And tire us with your ceaseless grumble?

Pray choose us out another text,
Oh, man morose and narrow-minded!
Come, turn the pages—I read the next,
And then the next, and still I find it.

Read here how Wealth aside was thrust,
And Folly sat in place exalted;
How Heroes found in the dust,
While lackeys in the saddle vaulted.

Though thrice a thousand years are past
Since David's son, the sad and splendid,
The weary King Ecclesiast,
Upon his awful tablets penned it—

Methinks the text is never stale,
And life is every day renewing
Fresh comments on the old, old tale
Of Folly, Fortune, Glory, Ruin.

Hark to the Preacher, preaching still!
He lifts his voice and cries his sermon,
Here at St. Peter's of Cornhill,
As under on the Mount of Harmon:

For you and me to heart to take
(Oh, dear beloved brother-readers)
To-day, as when the good King spake
Beneath the solemn Syrian cedars.

INDEPENDENCE DAY.

[From a new Work by A. STUART HARRISON, now in the Press of the Harpers.]

"YOU all know I went to America without much money to spend. Well, I managed somehow to get to Buffalo—worked my passage as sailor. Well, I was desperately hard up, was in debt for a fortnight's board when Independence Day arrived. I had got nothing on earth to do, and had done nothing for a week previously, so I sauntered about, and looked at the people hurrying to and fro, till about ten o'clock, when the militia companies began to assemble and march. The officers mounted, and among them the chaplain, Dr. Thompson. Well, that amused me for a quarter of an hour, and then I went to the lecture hall and took my place among the audience to hear the oration of the day. I heard it, and felt that, next to being an Englishman, I should like to be an American. That was over, and not a soul in the place knew me to me: I grew sick of solitude in a crowd, and wandered out into the outskirts of the town.

"I grew sick of that, and went to the boardinghouse to dinner—every morsel of which half choked me, for I hadn't the slightest idea where the money was to come from to pay for it. I went to my bedroom; tried to read, couldn't for the noise, guns firing, people shouting, etc. Went to some drawing-room; found that I was not wanted; persons who are a fortnight's board in arrear, and wear shabby, worn clothes, are not the ways wanted in society. Then out into the noisy streets again, then away into the country again—no rest! All around me brimful of joy. I a stranger in a strange land! Not a creature, out of the tens of thousands in the streets, had a word for me. I never felt before or since such a miserable feeling of loneliness.

"Well, the day went on, and then came the fireworks for the evening. Of course I went. There was a tolerably large crowd, some sitting on the grass, some standing; and strange their joyous faces, lighted by the last rays of the setting sun, looked to me. At last the ghost-like shapes of the fire-work lighters were visible, in a dim blue light, and the crowd gathered a little nearer. I had previously noticed two girls, one about twelve, the other about four, in front of me; but the whole of the performance was quite hidden from them: so I said to the little one, 'Here, sis, sit on my shoulder. Sit here, sis.' So I took the little one on my shoulder, and the other by the hand, and contrived to get them a better place.

"Well, the fire-works went off, as all fire-works do, and I noticed the little hand pressed more firmly to my neck, as after blaze after blaze of rockets rose into the air, till the last batch were off; and then, when I put the little thing down, I felt all the old feeling of solitude come back. The half-extinguished remains of fire-works, looking like gigantic spiders' webs stretched over a gallows, are not cheerful objects at any time; now, they were dismal in the extreme. I wanted something to drive that horrible feeling away. The crowd had almost gone, and I held the little child by the hand till then; but now she must go: so I stooped down in the dark to kiss her before she left, when, just at that moment, a breath of wind blew into flame a fragment of the last fire-works, and—yes, I saw that the little face lifted up to mine, and felt the two little arms round my neck, and the sweet little lips against mine. I've seen things, and felt some things that exercise an influence on me now; but I never, in my life, felt any thing like that. It was the first kiss I'd had since I left my mother and sisters, nearly a year before, and a whole crowd of the tenderest memories came back to me. I was no longer alone; there were those who cared for me, loved me; never did the nectar which brought back youth to old age produce more effect —a greater change.

"I rose that morning indifferent whether I lived or died. I thought how nice it would be to lie dead during the day, but the night found me a man, with hopes and aspirations that cling about me still—hope will till say Hope day.

"I wonder," said Jones, after a short pause, "whether that little girl recollects the shabby, haggard, care-worn man, who held her on his shoulder, and kissed her on Independence Day, four or five years ago."

THE GIRL WHO TROD UPON BREAD.

YOU have doubtless heard of the girl who trod upon bread not to soil her pretty shoes, and what evil this brought upon her. The tale is both written and printed.

She was a poor child, but proud and vain. She had a bad disposition, people said. When she was little more than an infant it was a pleasure to her to catch flies, to pull off their wings, and maim them entirely. She used to contrive somewhat cliefly to take lady-birds and beetles, stick them all upon a pin, then put a large leaf or a piece of paper close to their feet, that they might hold fast upon it, and turned and twisted in their endeavors to get off the pin.

"Now the lady-birds shall read," said little Inger. "See how they turn the paper!"

As she grew older she became worse instead of better; and she was very beautiful, and that was her misfortune. She would have been punished otherwise, and in the long-run she was.

"You will bring evil on your own head," said her mother. "As a little child you used often to tear my gowns: I fear that when you are older you will break my heart."

And she did so sure enough.

At length she went into the country to wait on people of distinction. They were as kind to her as if she had been one of their own family; and she was so well dressed that she looked very pretty, and became extremely arrogant.

When she had been a year in service her employers said to her:

"You should go and visit your relations, little Inger."

She went, resolved to let them see how fine she had become. When, however, she reached the village and saw the boys hurrying to and fro, till about ten o'clock, when the militia companies began to assemble and march. The officers mounted, and among them the chaplain, Dr. Thompson. Well, that amused me for a quarter of an hour, and then I went to the lecture hall and took my place among the audience to hear the oration of the day. I heard it, and felt that, next to being an Englishman, I should like to be an American. That was over, and not a soul in the place knew me to me: I grew sick of solitude in a crowd, and wandered out into the outskirts of the town.

"I grew sick of that, and went to the boarding-house to dinner—every morsel of which half choked me, for I hadn't the slightest idea where the money was to come from to pay for it. I went to my bedroom; tried to read, couldn't for the noise, guns firing, people shouting, etc. Went to some drawing-room; found that I was not wanted; persons who are a fortnight's board in arrear, and wear shabby, worn clothes, are not the ways wanted in society. Then out into the noisy streets again, then away into the country again—no rest! All around me brimful of joy. I a stranger in a strange land! Not a creature, out of the tens of thousands in the streets, had a word for me. I never felt before or since such a miserable feeling of loneliness.

"Well, the day went on, and then came the fire-

Old Woman of the Dogs than that, when the meadows and the ground begin to reek in summer, it is the old woman below who is brewing. Into her brewery it was that Inger sank, and no one could hold out very long there. A cesspool is a charming apartment compared with the old Dog woman's brewery. Every vessel is redolent of horrible smells, which would make any human being faint, and they are packed closely together and over each other; but even if there were a small space anywhere for the body to one might creep through, it would be impossible, on account of all the slimy toads and snakes that are always crawling and forcing themselves through. Into this place little Inger sank. All this nauseous mess was so icecold that she shivered in every limb. Yet she became mistier and mistier, and the cold crack fast to her, and it drew her as an amber bead draws a slender thread.

The Old Woman of the Dogs was at home.

She beheld Inger, put on her spectacles and looked at her.

"That is a girl with talents," said she. "I shall ask for her as a souvenir of my visit here. She may do very well as a statue to ornament my great-grandchildren's ante-chamber." And she took her.

It was thus little Inger went to the infernal regions. People do not generally go straight through the air to them: they can go by a roundabout path when they please, as Inger did.

It was an ante-chamber in an infinity. One became giddy there as looking forward, and giddy as looking backward. There were stood a crowd of anxious, pining beings, who were waiting and hoping for the time when the gates of grace should be opened. But that time long to arrive. Hideous, large, waddling spiders wove thousands of webs over which the souls of the blessed were like grins or fost-screws, and held them as fast as chains of iron, and were a cause of disquiet to every soul as a painful remembrance.

"This comes of wishing to have clean shoes," said she to herself. "See how they stare at me!"

Yes, they did stare at her; their evil passions glared from their eyes, and spoke, without sound, from the corner of their mouths: they were frightful.

"It must be a pleasure to them to see me," thought little Inger. "I have a pretty face, and am well dressed." And she dried her eyes. She had not lost her conceit. She had not then perceived how her fine clothes had been soiled in the brew-house of the Old Woman of the Dogs. Her dress was covered with dabs of nasty matter; a snake had wound itself among her hair, and it dangled over her face; and from every fold in her garment peeped out a toad, that puffed like an asthmatic hog-doctor. It was very disagreeable. "But all the rest down here look horrid too," was the reflection with which she consoled herself.

But the worst of all was the dreadful hunger she felt. Could she not stoop down and break off a piece of the bread on which all these were standing? No; her back was stiffened; her hands and her arms were stiffened; her whole body was like a statue of stone. Nothing but the eyes could move, and these she could turn entirely round, and that was an ugly sight. And flies came and crept over her eyes backwards and forwards. She rolled her eyes; but the intruders did not fly away, for they could not—their wings had been pulled off. That was another torture added to the hunger—the gnawing hunger that was so terrible to bear!

"If this goes on I can not hold out much longer," she said.

But she had to hold out, and her sufferings became greater.

Then a warm tear fell upon her head. It trickled over her face and her neck, all the way down to the bread. Another tear fell; then many followed. Who was weeping over little Inger? Had she not a mother up yonder on the earth? The tears of anguish which a mother sheds over her erring child always reach it; but they do not comfort the child—they burn, they increase the sufferings. And all these torments Inger had yet not to be able to snatch one mouthful of the bread she was treading under foot! She became as thin, as slender, as a rush. Another trial was that she heard distinctly all that was said of her above on the earth, and it was nothing but blame and evil. Though she thought only, and was in speechless affliction, she still said,

"Pride goes before a fall. That was your great fault, Inger. Oh, how miserable you have made your mother!"

Her mother, an' all who were acquainted with her, were well aware of the sin she had committed in treading upon bread. They knew that she had sunk into the Old Woman of the Dog's brewery, and told that, for he had seen it himself from the brow of the hill.

"What affliction you have brought on your mother, Inger!" exclaimed her mother. "Ah, well! I expected no better from you."

"Would that I had never been born!" thought Inger; "that would have been much better for me. My mother's whimpering can do no good now."

She heard how the family, the people of distinction who had been so kind to her, spoke. "I am a wicked child," they said; "they valued not the gifts of our Lord, but trod them under her feet. He will be difficult for her to get the gates of grace open to admit her."

"They ought to have brought me up better," thought Inger. "They should have taken the whims out of me, if I had any."

She heard that there was a common ballad made about her, "the bad girl who trod upon bread, to keep her shoes nicely clean," and this tolled was sung from one end of the country to the other.

"That she should have to suffer so much for such as that—to be punished so severely for such a trifle!" thought Inger. "All those others are punished justly, for no doubt there was a great deal to punish; but ah, how I suffer!"

And her heart became still harder than the substance into which she had been turned.

"No one can be better in such society. I will not grow better here. See how they glare at me!"

And her heart became still harder, and she felt a hatred toward all mankind.

"They have a nice story to tell up there now. Oh, how I suffer!"

She listened, and heard them telling her history as a warning to children, and the little ones called her "ugly!" "ugly!" "ugly!" and that was right, so they said, "so very wicked, that she deserved to suffer."

The children always spoke harshly of her. One day, however, that hunger and misery were gnawing her most dreadfully, and she heard her name mentioned, and the whole story told connected with —a little girl—she observed that the child burst into tears in her distress for the proud, finely-dressed Inger.

"But will she never come up again?" asked the child.

The answer was—

"She will never come up again."

"But if she will beg pardon, and promise never to be naughty again?"

"But she will not beg pardon," they said.

"Oh, how I wish she would do it!" sighed the little girl, in great distress. "I will give my doll, and my doll's house too, if she may come up! It is so shocking for poor little Inger to be down there!"

These words touched Inger's heart; they seemed almost to make her good. It was the first time any one had said "poor Inger," and had not dwelt upon her faults. An innocent child cried and prayed for her. She was so much affected by this that she felt ashamed to weep like a child for another, and this was an additional pain.

Years passed by in the realm above; but down where she was there was no change, except that she heard more and more rarely sounds from above, and that she herself was more and more isolated. At last one day she heard a sigh, and "Inger, Inger, how miserable you have made me! I foretold that you would!" These were her mother's last words on her death-bed.

And again she heard herself named by her former employers, and then all else was still.

"Perhaps I may meet you once more, Inger. None know whither they are to go."

But Inger knew full well that the excellent mistress would never come to the place where she was.

Time passed on, and on, slowly and wretchedly. Then once more Inger heard her name mentioned, and she beheld, as it were, directly above her, two clear stars shining. Those were two mild eyes that were closing upon earth. So many years had elapsed since a little girl had cried in childish sorrow over "poor Inger!" that child had become an old woman, whom our Lord was about to call to himself. At that hour, when the thoughts and the actions of a whole life stand clearly before the parting foul, she remembered how, as a little child, she had wept bitterly on hearing the history of Inger. That same Inger, who belongs, stood so prominently before the old woman's mind in the hour of death that she cried, with intense emotion,

"Lord, my God! have not I often, like Inger, trod under foot Thy blessed gifts, and placed my shoe on them? Have I not often been guilty of pride and vanity in my secret heart? But Thou, in Thy mercy, didst not let me sink; Thou didst hold me up. Oh, forsake me not in the last hour!"

And the aged woman's eyes closed, and her spirit's eyes opened to what had been formerly invisible; and as Inger had been present in her thoughts during her whole life, so beyond and how deep she had been dragged downward. At that slight the gentle being burst into tears; and in the kingdom of heaven she stood like a child, and wept for the fate of the unfortunate Inger. Her tears and her prayers sounded like an echo down in the hollow form that confined the miserable, miserable soul. That soul was overwhelmed by the unexpected love from those realms afar. One of God's angels wept for her! Was she not worthy safed to her? The tortured spirit gathered, as it were, into one thought, all the actions of its life —all that it had done—and it shuddered at the violence of its remorse—remorse such as Inger had never felt. She thought that for her there could be no help. She thought that for her the gates of mercy would never open, and as in deep contrition and self-abasement she thought of all that the heights mens penetrated into the dismal abyss—a ray more vivid and glorious than the sunbeams which thaw the snow figures that the children make in their gardens. And this ray, more quickly than the snow-flake that falls upon a child's warm mouth can be melted away, changed to nothing, it seemed afraid and shy of every thing around it; it felt ashamed of itself, and appeared unwilling to avoid all living creatures, it sought, in haste, concealment in a dark recess in a crumbling wall. Here it sat, and it seemed into the farthest corner, trembling all over. It could not sing, for it had no voice. For a long time it sat quietly there before it ventured to look out and behold all the beauty around. Yes, it was beauty! The air was so fresh, yet so soft; the moon shone so clearly; the trees and the bushes smelled so sweetly; and in and was so comfortable where she sat—her feather garb so clean and neat! How the birds sang—and how and glee! The grateful thoughts that awoke in the bird's breast she would willingly have poured forth in song, but the power was denied to her. Yes, gladly would she have sung as do the cuckoo and the nightingale in spring. Our gracious Lord, who hears the mute worm's hymn of praise, understood the thanksgiving that lifted itself up in the tones of thought, as the psalm floated in David's mind before it resolved itself into words and melody.

As weeks passed on these unexpressed feelings of gratitude increased. They would surely find a voice some day, with the first stroke of the wing, to perform some good act. Might not this happen?

Now came the holy Christmas festival. The peasants raised a pole close by the old wall, and bound an unthrashed bundle of oats on it, that the birds of the air might also enjoy the Christmas, and have plenty to eat at that time which was held in commemoration of the redemption brought to mankind.

And the sun rose brightly that Christmas morning, and shone down on the sabbath, and upon all the chirping birds that flew around the pole; and from the wall issued a faint twittering. The sweeling thoughts that at last found vent, and that he sound was a hymn of joy, as the bird flew forth from its hiding-place.
